Crossing the Pacific Ocean, nearly half of the world, your kind letter of Seventh Month 1, 1916, has reached us not long ago. We are very glad indeed to receive such a nice letter as this. It was translated to us when our Monthly Meeting met a week ago, and every one of us was deeply interested in it.

The spirit of your letter is very good, and we appreciate it very much. We cannot tell you how glad we are to hear all you told us which is thousands of miles away from us.

We have been always thinking and talking about you since you left us last year. Your effect and influence left upon us did not wear out with your going away. We expect you can still remember all you saw at Chengtu, and you are thinking about us either in the city or outside in the University. We are constantly in need of help; if you are ready to help us in any case you can, we shall be very grateful, for this is what we mean by to live in a Christian life, and it is exactly the same thing that our Lord came to teach us and gave us example that we must help one another.

We are interested especially in the kind of work that you have done to those black people in America. We suppose they are willing to receive and to welcome you when you go to their houses to visit them. We are exceedingly glad to see your way of establishing the Kingdom of God on the earth. We cannot be a perfect Christian unless we start to help those poor people around us.

Christianity is an ever unfinished religion and we all should be willing to make fine progress. There is no better way to do this than to go to our neighbors and try to make their conditions better, for in God we are all in one and there is no limitation in Him.

You spoke about our political changes that had occurred in past time. True we are thankful that Yuan-Shi Kai died; but we are still looking for the future that China will be led by the spiritual guidance of our Lord, so that she can be as strong both physically and spiritually as she can be. China cannot be strong unless she is enlightened and strengthened by the everlasting Gospel; and, on the other hand, she will get worse if she is still in trouble with her political struggles.

We hope America is not going to get into war with Mexico. It does seem awful to think of so many nations already at war with one another. We earnestly hope that because of your good persons in your country, and your good President's steadfast efforts you will stop fighting with your neighbor. We are praying, as a nation, to be delivered from the world war. We cannot see the end of the present struggle and it does seem as if the nations have gone wild in this tumult of bloodshed and revenge.

The work that we are keeping on at the University is just as usual. We are still having a nice Primary School inside the city in the Chin Lung Kai. There are about one hundred boys in this school. With regard to the University outside, there are more students this term than there were last term. There are about eighty in the University and one hundred and eighty in the Middle School, which stands in the University grounds. Besides these, there are Normal and Theological students in both, which there are more than fifty. We are sorry that our University buildings are very few at present, so we cannot take in a great number of students. We think you can remember very well all about the University plant.

We are always glad to hear from you if you will have time to write. Please think on us, when you see some rare object worthy of notice in your country, and wish us partakers of your happiness.

With the love of Christ we are always your Chinese friends.
On behalf of the meeting.

THE SUPERSTITION OF FRESH AIR.

The popular idea that there is something peculiarly beneficial or invigorating about outdoor air has been effectually dispelled by the experiments carried on during the past few years under the auspices of the New York State Commission on Ventilation. The latest results of this investigation given in School and Society for Fifth Month 6th and Eighth Month 12, 1916, show that the children in a school-room provided with a liberal supply of outdoor air do no better work and make no more progress than those in a room where the air is partly recirculated. The experiments ran for three months at a time, the teachers exchanged rooms, and a very elaborate system of mental tests devised by Professor Thorndike of Teachers' College was used to test accuracy, speed, memory and improvement. The results in the fresh air room came out practically the same as in the recirculated air room, what little difference there was being mostly in favor of the latter.

It appears then that if air is kept to the proper temperature, humidity and composition it may be breathed again and again without deleterious effects. The matter of composition, which used to absorb the attention of sanitarians, is the least important of the three, for it has been found by experiment that a considerable increase in the percentage of carbon dioxide or decrease in oxygen makes comparatively little difference.

In accordance with this theory some of the most modern and best constructed gymnasiums, that of the International Y. M. C. A. College of Springfield, for instance, have no open windows. The air is continually being drawn through an apparatus that washes, cools or warms it and gives it the amount of moisture proper to its temperature. Of course, without such purification and rectification the air of a closed room would soon become intolerable, so those of us who live in houses not provided with a circulatory system of this type had best keep our windows open.

A TRANSITIONAL PERIOD.

Individual experiences are instructive and suggestive, but they should never be authoritative. We are living in a transitional period, when there is no genuine church upon the earth, except that which is ultimated in the good deeds of the daily life. There is nothing authoritative, because we are in the midst of the breaking up of all authorities, so that the Lord may establish His personal government among men. Every soul must discover its own duty, and do it without reference to other people. The Lord leads us all differently and by ways unknown to ourselves or others, until we look backward and see what He has done for us. Consult your own conscience and reason, analyze your motives fearlessly and profoundly; act from the principle of use and for the benefit of others; look constantly to the Lord and His word, keep your heart always open to Him by faith and prayer, try all things, prove all things, put charity always in advance of faith and He will lead you aright.

BETTER to strive and climb,
And never reach the goal,
Than to drift along with time—
An aimless, worthless soul.
Ay, better to climb and fall,
Or sow, though the yield be small,
Than to throw away day after day,
And never strive at all.

A BOY'S THOUGHT OF WAR.

The best part of the day I know
Is after all the whistles blow,
When down the street, and up the lane,
Come all the fathers—from the train.

We children leave our play for this,
And run to get a smile or kiss,
And mothers—looking trim and sweet,
Are watching—up and down the street.

But then—the thought just comes to me,
Of all the boys across the sea,
Who stand and watch, beside the door,
For fathers who will come no more.

How can a war be right and fair
Which kills the fathers everywhere?
When wives and children need them so,
That's one thing I should like to know.

THE ROMANCE OF A PEN.—As fascinating as a fairy tale is the story of the boyhood of Platt R. Spencer, the originator of the Spencerian system of penmanship, who from his early childhood was possessed with an intense longing to put his dreams and poetic fancies into tangible shape.

He was born on the seventh of Eleventh Month, 1800, in a typical log house in a remote mountainous section of New York, and his earliest environment helped to develop the love of nature which in later years amounted to positive passion. His parents were people of small means, but abundant culture, and the old quill pen so frequently used by his father was always an object of abounding interest to the little boy, though his beauty-loving nature abhorred the grotesque characters which it formed, and led to his determination to learn from the beautiful curves and lines of nature to make beautiful characters which could be used in writing.

With indomitable purpose, and untiring patience, the little lad of six began his self-imposed task. The first crude characters were traced with a sharp stick in the snow piled high on the mountain side. Undaunted by repeated failures and disappointments, he persevered until the last snow bank melted away with the advancing spring, when a sudden inspiration sent him to renew his efforts upon the smooth bark of the ever-friendly trees. About this time he received permission to practice on bits of leather in a shoemaker's shop, and a little later the fly-leaves of his mother's Bible were found to be covered with his quaint little characters.

Up to this time the little fellow had never owned a whole sheet of paper. But one golden day a visiting relative gave him a penny, and a mountaineer, about to set out on a journey to a distant town, agreed to spend it for him for writing paper. Platt watched the clumsy sled lumbering down the steep mountain trail, and felt that its return would mean for him the opening of a new world. The days which passed during its absence seemed almost interminable, and when finally the jangling bells announced the home-coming at midnight, the child's entreaties prevailed, and he was permitted to dress and await its arrival at the gate. The coveted paper was delivered into the eager little hands, and carried reverently into the house, to be dreamed about until daybreak brought the opportunity to try his skill upon its dazzling white surface. But he failed to realize his ideal, and this failure caused him the bitterest tears of his childhood.

When the boy was about seven years of age his parents removed to Geneva, Ashtabula County, Ohio, near the shores of Lake Erie, and here Platt began his school days in a primitive country school, and here, too, he spent every spare moment writing in the smooth white sand on the lake shore, and making remarkable progress toward the realization of his consuming ambition. Years later he wrote of this period of his life in the following beautiful lines:

Evolved mid nature's unpruned scenes,
On Erie's wild and woolly shore,
The rolling wave, the dancing stream,
The wild-rose haunts in days of yore.

The opal, quartz and ammonite,
Gleaming beneath the wavelet's flow,
Each gave its lesson—how to write—
In the loved years of long ago.

I seized the forms I loved so well—
Compounded them with meaning sives,
And to the music of the swell,
Blent them with undulating vines.

Thanks, nature, for the impress pure!
Those tracings in the sand are gone;
But while the love of thee endures,
Their grace and ease shall still live on.

Very soon after his arrival in the new home Platt made the acquaintance of a hermit scholar whose rude hut stood in the wilderness some twenty-odd miles from the village. When he had exhausted the fount of knowledge in the country school-house, he obtained the consent of his parents to place himself under the instruction of the hermit, who agreed to become his teacher upon condition that he take up his abode in the wilderness until his course of instruction should be completed. This the boy readily consented to do, and there, remote from all distracting influences, he mastered Greek and Latin, and studied the master minds of literature. At sixteen he returned to his village home and devoted himself to teaching and to perfecting his system of penmanship, which was now taking definite shape in his mind. It was not, however, until he reached his twenty-first year that the Spencerian system of penmanship, together with the Spencerian pen, became a factor in the world's work.

From the primitive log cabin in which he taught, on the southern shore of Lake Erie, the new system was disseminated, and became the prevailing style of penmanship in America, adopted by the leading schools and colleges, and welcomed for its beauty of light, shade and form.

To the memory of Platt R. Spencer—poet, educator, author, benefactor, philanthropist—a noble library has recently been dedicated in the one-time straggling village, now the thriving young city of Geneva, Ohio, where this "servant of genius" lived, and loved, and labored.

The floating clouds, the sun's bright beam,
The ocean wave—bud, leaf and sky,
The opening flower, the rolling stream—
Are letters to the enraptured eye.

NEWS ITEMS.

A FRIEND writing from Pasadena, California, under date of Twelfth Month 10th, states that Wm. C. Allen was most acceptably with them. His visit at this time was in part due to a request that he attend the Ministers' Union of Southern California, representing almost all denominations, where opportunity was afforded to advance the interests of Peace.

At the session of Concord Quarterly Meeting, held last month, the request, which had its origin among the younger members, that a Conference be held specially in their interests, received the favorable endorsement of the meeting. A Committee of older and younger Friends was appointed to arrange for it, and on the afternoon and evening of the 16th, the Conference was held in the meeting-house at Media; between 125 and 150 were present, the younger members largely predominating. In the afternoon session, George L. Jones, of Westtown, gave

MEXICAN-AMERICAN LEAGUE.—When relations between Mexico and the United States were severely strained last summer, after the tension was released, Dr. Starr Jordan of California, Manuel Rojas, Director of the National Library in Mexico City, Dr. Atl, Modesto C. Rolland and representatives of the Peace Societies and social interests, met in Washington and New York, and formed the Mexican-American League with the following aims:

1.—To help bring about a new and constructive era of friendship between the people of Mexico and of the United States.

2.—To interpret and promote joint negotiations between the two governments with respect to border control and all other questions of public policy.

3.—To promote common understanding between the peoples of the two countries, by giving publicity to the facts about Mexico and American relations with the Mexican people.

4.—To secure an exchange of teachers and students and to encourage the American Universities and Colleges to grant scholarships to Mexican students.

5.—To promote industrial and agricultural education in Mexico and institutions for the training of competent teachers and leaders.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—There were 54,061,400 bushels of wheat harvested in Pennsylvania this year, or 750,000 bushels less than in 1915. This is the estimate of the Bureau of Statistics of the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture, which announces also that there were approximately 50,880 less acres harvested this year than a year ago.

It is announced that Princeton University wants the type of man who has the grit to earn his way through college, and of late years has been doing a good deal to make it possible for more of that kind to come there. The Bureau of Student Self-Help was organized several years ago to aid the needy students in obtaining and keeping remunerative positions while in college, and has found several ways of creating and maintaining organizations which afford permanent sources of income to a certain number of students.

Sheldon W. Funk, farm adviser on fruits for the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture, says: "Thousands of bushels of fine apples are ruined each season simply because the growers harvested them in a careless manner; and then they wonder why they do not keep in storage during the winter months."

GENERAL.—A noted figure in the world's petroleum industry was removed when John Dustin Archbold, president of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, died at his home in Tarrytown, N. Y., on the fifth, after a two-weeks' illness subsequent to an operation for appendicitis.

Orville Wright has filed application for a patent on a stabilizing device that, he says, will make the flying machine as safe as an automobile. The new attachment enters the domain of electricity. By a unique arrangement of batteries, augmented by a pendulum swinging in a liquid bath and a minor propeller, placed almost directly over the pilot's head, absolute, unswerving, automatic stability is said to be possible.

The United States Public Health Service tells of an alarming spread of smallpox in nineteen States, and the health boards of New York State and city have issued warnings that those who have not been vaccinated within five years should be revaccinated as a precaution.

Opposition to military training in the public schools was embodied in a resolution submitted to the Federal Council of Churches in St. Louis by the committee on peace and arbitration. The committee also urged the American Government to invite European belligerents to state the basis upon which they would be willing to begin peace negotiations.

The Yosemite Valley will soon be lighted by electricity, as a result of an appropriation of $150,000 made by Congress at the last session for the erection of a power plant at that national park. The plant is under construction.

Not a single national park in this country has an adequate sanitary system, says R. B. Marshall, Superintendent of National Parks, in his first annual report. Indeed, Superintendent Marshall declares that he shudders at the probability of an epidemic in any of the country's natural playgrounds which are being visited annually by increasing thousands of citizens and tourists.

A declaration of war on the butter and egg and mercantile exchanges was made at New York by John J. Dillon, State Commissioner of Foods and Markets, in his efforts to cut the high cost of food. The trading on some of the New York food exchanges, he declared, is done merely among the members, not with outsiders, and less than twelve men make food prices for the entire country.

Sole leather at $1 a pound, a record level which a year ago would have been deemed impossible by American tanners, last week became a reality. According to an authoritative report, a special lot of all No. 1 secured oak bents was sold in the Philadelphia market at $1.06, the purchaser being a large shoe manufacturer from the West.

The Federal Bureau of Navigation announced that 1115 vessels had been turned out in eleven months with a gross tonnage of 521,711. All but forty-nine were for the American flag. This more than doubled the tonnage of last year's output.

Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, with 1903 regular, all the year enrollment, is the largest women's college in the world.

FOREIGN.—On the twelfth the German Government made a decisive move for Peace, but as it was on the basis of "being conscious of victory," it did not seem likely the Allies would respond.

More than 100,000 Belgians have been deported from Belgium by German military authorities according to information presented to the State Department at Washington by Minister Havenith. Deportations, the minister said, are continuing at the rate of 3000 a week and are especially severe among railway workers taken to man military roads now being laid.

Engineering contains an interesting article by Professor Luiggi on the utilizing of volcanic heat for power-production purposes. The idea of utilizing volcanic heat to drive an important electric power-house of 15,000 horse-power might have been considered Utopian in ordinary conditions. It has, however, become a reality—and a successful one—in these hard times, when the price of coal has reached in Italy incredible figures.

WISDOM AND SUCCESS.

It sometimes happens that a short phrase contains a large suggestion, and a word or two may furnish a theme or a text for a discourse. The person who drops such hint or thought may have little idea of its value to the one into whose ground the seed falls, or of the potential harvest—whether thirty, sixty, or an hundredfold—hidden away in the heart of the grain.

In a brief letter recently received from one of our subscribers, the writer remarks upon the enjoyment that she derives from THE FRIEND, and she concludes with wishing us "wisdom and success" in the management of it. The wish is a beneficent one (proceeding from a Christian interest that is more than personal in its scope), and a ripened experience appears in the order of the words "wisdom and success."

No explanation or analysis follows; but we shall have no difficulty in understanding that the success which our friend desires for us is such as falls within the sanction of wisdom, and that this wisdom is of the kind that comes from above. If success, either immediate or ultimate, is in any sense a sequence of wisdom, the amount of it to be expected must be commensurate with the accuracy or the fulness with which the behests of wisdom are obeyed, whether this term be used to describe an active quality—a grace bestowed—or to represent the Source whence the quality or grace is derived.

But success is the accomplishment of a purpose, the attainment of an end. In so far, then, as a high purpose has been joined with sanctified talent and enlightened understanding, we might fairly expect a resultant service (if nothing more) that could rightly be esteemed success. As to the extent to which THE FRIEND has hitherto, and on this ground, justified its existence, its career of almost ninety years may furnish some testimony at least; yet none of those who are now concerned in the management of its affairs, and responsible in some degree for its character, would for a moment feel that they had attained all they desired, nor be disposed to abate their efforts in the direction of attainment. Neither could they hope for that success which is measured in service from any smaller endowment of "pure wisdom" than was needful for those who planned and launched the enterprise. The first editors acknowledged themselves "chastened with a sense of their responsibilities." Can we meet ours without something of the same chastening? They felt that an important part of their work was to uphold and defend the truth, in a spirit of "fairness and fidelity." Shall we do less in a constructive way with the opportunity and the "challenge" of our own times?

The prospectus which appeared on the front of the first number of this journal in 1827 gave promise of considerable variety in the contents to be chosen for succeeding numbers. Periodical literature was scarce in those days, and it was desired to provide a "fireside companion" for the families of Friends. To this end, history and literature, science and religion were to contribute; and as we look through some of the old volumes, we shall hardly doubt that THE FRIEND was a welcome and instructive visitor in many homes, even though doctrinal controversy received some share of notice and of space. As time went on, the prospect which "animated" the founders—namely, that of "an honorable and useful career" for the journal—came to be in good measure fulfilled.

The needs and the interests of the present day, however, are obviously not identical with those of several decades ago; yet every paper that undertakes to be, to any considerable extent, a "fireside companion," must minister to various tastes and conditions. THE FRIEND is no exception to this rule. Its patronage is greatly diversified and widely distributed; and it would be no easy matter—especially in these "stirring times"—to keep in the paths of judgment, and yet make the paper equally acceptable to all classes.

Like the husbandman in the figure employed by the prophet Isaiah, we may find use for the fitches and the cummin and the spelt, while putting in the wheat in rows and the barley in the appointed place. But when the harvest is gathered in, divers instruments and processes are required to dislodge the seed from its husk and convert the "bread grain" into meal or fine flour. Efficiency in all these procedures is attributed by the prophet to Divine instruction. "This also cometh forth from Jehovah of hosts, who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom."

If this may be rightly applied to ordinary husbandry, for example, much more may it be to those undertakings which claim a purpose other than secular. THE FRIEND, if we mistake not, has still a mission somewhat different from that of most journals—even of the distinctly religious ones. Otherwise it has no sufficient reason for continuing. But the burden of performing this mission does not rest solely with the editors; and it is essential that all who have a part in it should act in the counsels of wisdom, with patience and consideration, if success of a high and worthy order is to be achieved or maintained.

WHAT WILL THE JUDGMENT MEAN?

In the silence of the evening hour
When all is hushed and still,
Save the rushing of the mighty wind
Obeying His sweet will,

I seem to see the millions
As they stand before the throne
In that solemn, awful moment,
As He makes His judgments known.

Oh! my war-mad brother falter,
Think of what that day will be,
Pride and greed and selfish honor,
What will they mean to thee?

Will it signify, my brother,
That He'll say to all who fought,
"Bravely done, my valiant soldier,
My will first has been thy thought?"

Nay, my brother, though it grieve Him
And His heart of love be torn,
Words like these will fall on only
Those who to Him have been borne.

Those who fought not for their country,
Those who fought not for their own,
But to those who sought His glory,
Who to Him their deeds have sown.

Thers has been a war, my brother,
Not of strife and sin and shame,
But a war to bring the sinner,
To our Lord through His dear name.

PORTSMOUTH, R. I.

"PEACE, PERFECT PEACE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The above is a quotation from a well-known hymn and comes home to me linked with the words of our Divine Lord and Master, Christ Jesus, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

"Ye have heard how I said unto you, I go away, and come again unto you. If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father; for my Father is greater than I."

"And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass, ye might believe." (John xiv: 27-29.)

The same Holy Spirit that brought the saints of old into that tranquility of mind by Christ's indwelling is able and willing so to gather us to Himself, if we are willing and obedient in the day of God's grace and power. There are those to whom God's mercy has been reached forth in early life that can gratefully acknowledge in old age He hath not forsaken them who feel a tender care for all who are following after, who may be in early or middle life, that the world and the spirit thereof may not obscure that purer and heavenly vision of a holy life, devoted to God and His service. Only thus can we know that freedom in the temple of God that makes joyous in the house of prayer.

Childhood and youth have been passed, also middle life, and now having reached four-score years I thus once again put pen to paper, not I trust to glorify myself, but, if may be, to bear witness to God's Truth, calling us away from trust in ourselves and in one another, and to daily seeking for the Bread of Life that keeps us in life by communion with God by the One Spirit of promise by Christ from the Father, who leads into all Truth. Christ, who is the Light and Life of the new-born soul, has promised the fuller unfolding of the Father's will, even as He prayed when here on earth, that they all might be one by the law of Divine love keeping and purifying them, and of them, by the one baptism to be made by the One Spirit, the baptizers of others into the like communion of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. We are to be transformed by the Spirit and to be co-workers with God for the transformation of our fellows upon this the Lord's earth. It is an high and holy calling doubtless, but we are not sent on the spiritual warfare on our own charges, or in our own strength, but are to be clothed with the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left. There will be the early shoots, the blossom, and the ripe fruit in due season, only let us not grow weary in well-doing, for in due time we shall reap if we faint not. Let us eye the Master, keep close at his side, and cease not in secret to lift up our hearts unto Him in prayer, not aiming at great things, but keeping low before Him, seeking to do the little or the much as we are clothed and fitted by the Good Master. The reaping will come, and the happy harvest, and in the many mansions there is abundant room. Let us not too much dwell in the past, neither over much on the future, but seek now to live in the will of our Father, and as from day to day we tread the heavenly road in His presence, each day and everyday will we find a haven of rest and peace to the soul as we travel on, finding in ourselves, though not of ourselves, the fullness of the promise, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Truly the Lord is our helper and slavish fear and dread will in the mercy of God be put far from us. Yes, we may know, here on earth, "Peace, Perfect Peace," that peace the world cannot give, and possessing, the world cannot take away.

CHARLES WATT THOMSON.

BECKY'S BOOK.

A GLIMPSE OF QUAKER LIFE IN HOMESPUN DAYS.

The sun was near its setting on a sultry summer evening in the year 1714, when two travelers, weary and dust-covered, were plodding along the narrow Surrey lanes. Far too rough and narrow for wheels were many of these lanes, so that riding on horseback was the inevitable mode of traveling, even for elderly people, and this couple were mounted on horses so strong and good as to proclaim them in comfortable circumstances, although their quaint raiment was of Puritanical plainness with no pretension to gentility about it.

Benedictus Martin was a yeoman; honest, thrifty and much respected, with a ruddy, sun-tanned face, straightforward grey eyes and Saxon fairness of hair. His great roan mare carried besides his portly weight, a well-filled pair of saddlebags, but their pace was but slow, and for lesser journeys she was well accustomed to the pillion saddle, with the mistress mounted behind the master; but as they had just accomplished a journey to London—full thirty miles away—the second rider was now mounted on an equally good horse by herself.

A remarkable woman was Susannah Martin, in spite of the homely simplicity of her bringing up. A gentle placidity made the face beneath the plain riding hood motherly and attractive, but the broad forehead and keen brown eyes told of an intellect far beyond the average; the combination of qualities making her the "Mother in Israel" in her little circle which she is recorded to have been in a quaint book of religious memoirs, published in 1735 under the title of Piety Promoted.

"We are almost home now, wife," said Benedictus, "I can spy the Hunts Green chimneys between the elm-trees," adding, as his wife looked eagerly forward, "Ah, thy heart has been here all the time, in spite of the fine friends and fine things we have seen in London town. Thou art ever anxious lest harm should come to thy two chicks."

"Nay, Benedict," said the wife smiling, "not unduly anxious, for I have ever felt a strong sense of the Divine protection being over our dear daughters—and Aunt Mary Martin guards them well, but I feel some natural impatience to see them again, and I know that thou dost the same."

A turn of the lane brought them into full view of a comfortable red farm-house, its gabled roof covered with the picturesque stone slabs common in the district, mossy and lichen-stained, with a goodly array of well-thatched barns and sheds behind it.

Two slender, girlish figures who were busying themselves among the herbs, and sweet-scented, old-fashioned flowers in the low-walled garden before the house, paused to listen as the sound of hoofs fell on their ears. Then recognizing the riders, they flew to open the gate with such eager haste that the prim linen cap of the elder girl fell to the ground, showing an abundant crop of fair hair. Molly Martin was her father over again, honest, sturdy and practical; while Rebekah, who was but sixteen, was slender and dark like the mother, but with a dreamy, unsatisfied look in her soft brown eyes. Both gave a warm welcome to their parents, and if the embraces, after the travelers had alighted at the horse-block of massive mossy stones, were more formal and reverential than modern parenthood exacts, they were none the less hearty. Benedict Martin followed the lad who came to take the horses to the stable to give special directions for the welfare of the animals, after a journey which seemed to these simple country folk as great an undertaking as a trip across the Atlantic would be now-a-days. Busy Molly flew off to make some addition to the supper table, while Becky clung to her mother, and went up the wide oak staircase with her to see that all was ready for her comfort in the quaint bed-chamber above. By the time that Molly's ham and eggs were ready, a goodly group was gathered round the massive oak table in the large, low-pitched farm kitchen, for man and maid ate with the master's family in those primitive days.

Aunt Mary Martin, a vigorous old dame who had taken charge of the household in the absence of her nephew and his wife, had the place of honor, while "below the salt" were modestly grouped a white-haired old retainer, Peter by name, who had faithfully served three generations of Martins; two stout, red-armed maids, and several bashful, shock-headed lads.

A farm in the eighteenth century was almost self-supporting, and little upon that homely table came from other sources. The big brown loaf was of home-grown wheat, ground at the windmill on the neighboring heath; the bacon, butter and cheese, and also the mead and cider which were the universal beverages, were all produced and manufactured under the watchful eyes of the good yeoman and his wife. The farm being freehold, they were accounted to be well supplied with this world's goods, and their two daughters as somewhat of heiresses.

The talk over the supper table brought out strongly the characters of the two maidens—Molly was eager to tell the home news; Rebekah to hear all her father and mother could tell her of the great world which lay beyond the hedgerows of Hunts Green.

"It is good to be home again," said Benedictus, "it feels so sweet and quiet after the sulphurous air and racket of London; and just now, because poor Queen Anne lies at the point of death, all the tongues are wagging as to who will be her successor."

"Ah, poor Queen," said the gentle voice of the mother, "not one of all her many children lives to take her place on the throne. I doubt me there is too much both of pampering and restraint in the life of a Court to be wholesome for the little ones."

"And who do they say will be king, father?" asked Rebekah eagerly.

"The Queen's second cousin, George of Hanover, I expect," said Benedictus, "but they say he is but dull, and speaks only German—I cannot say that I fancy him as a ruler."

"But thou wouldst not wish to see the Stuarts back, father?"

"Nay, nay, Becky, we must have a king who is no papist, and who will allow liberty of conscience and keep his given word, which the Stuart kings could never do. I only trust that the question will be settled without bringing war and bloodshed on our poor country," and Benedictus poured out a second cup of cider with a grave face.

The pause was broken by Molly. "Father, neighbor Bonwick wishes to buy the sorrel colt; he has been here twice about it. Thou won't sell him, wilt thou? He will make a beautiful nag for Becky and me when he is broken in!"

The father laughed and gave no promise, but proceeded to ask various questions as to how the farm had fared in his absence, concluding with:

"Had Peter sheared the sheep?"

"Indeed he has," answered Aunt Mary Martin, "and what do you think this good Molly of yours has done? She will never let the grass grow under her feet! The fleeces were barely off the sheep's backs when she went to work with the maids, washing and drying and carding and spinning, until they have yarn enough for the couple of large blankets which were needed before winter."

The parents commended the blushing Molly and she further explained to her mother: "Thou knows that Becky and I both needed new tuck aprons, so we span the black sheep's fleece first of all, and have already taken it to weaver Miles to make into linsey woolsey for us, and when it comes back we mean to make our old aprons into a warm gown for widow Bates' little Nance."

This project being cordially approved, the great-aunt went on to commend Rebekah, for she was a just woman, although Molly was decidedly her favorite.

"And Becky here has been spinning some of that very soft flax. I never saw a finer or even thread. It will make a beautiful lawn for kerchiefs or caps. She has also stilled enough peppermint and other strong waters to dose the neighborhood, and they both manage the dairy and the cheese like two old women! They are a credit to thy training, niece Susannah!"

The mother colored with pleasure, but only said simply, "The Lord has granted them good understanding and strong, healthy bodies. I trust that they will ever use their powers in His service."

VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

First-day, Eleventh Month 5th.—While for the region about Philadelphia, as we afterwards learned, the weather was cool, cloudy and threatening, at Woodland, N. C., it was far otherwise. The morning broke in great beauty, bright and summer-like was the day that followed; our hearts were filled with gratitude, so many had already been the proofs of our welcome, and we realized afresh that we were in the "Sunny Southland." Three meetings had been arranged for the day at Woodland where many households were astir with guests, and where outward food was so abundantly supplied the longing could not be suppressed that in a spiritual way there might be a like blessing.

The morning and the afternoon meetings were held in the "Cedar Grove" house, used for the Yearly Meeting. Let us see if we can picture for our friends at home the scene. From without it is the plain little white meeting-house by the roadside, within its grove of cedar, oak and southern pine. The air is still, the soft genial rays of an autumnal sun bathe all things; across the road it falls upon the peanut shocks of the adjacent field and beyond where the cotton gleams pure-white from the wide expanding bolls; in the hazy distance the horizon is ringed with woodlands bronzed by the hand of the retreating year. Within the house this same light falls upon the faces of those—men, women and children (some of these babes in their mothers' arms)—who in the days they have already sat together in the meetings, in social intercourse in homes and by the wayside, have learned to know each other better in what most deeply affects their lives and life's service. The spiritual exercise of the meeting so far as vocally expressed, seemed to be the commendation of the soul of the believer seeking relief from the stress of outward things to that heavenly quietude implied in the words of Scripture: "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus. The meeting held in the afternoon seemed a continuance of that of the morning, both as to attendance and spiritual refreshment.

The meeting First-day evening was held in the auditorium of the commodious building erected by Friends for educational purposes, which goes by the name of Olney School. The occasion was meant especially for the youth, and proved one of much interest and Divine favor. Two of the visiting ministers were enabled to speak in a lively manner concerning the temptations, and the opportunities of those in the morning of their years, but especially of the love of God to their souls. One of the speakers alluded in a striking manner to the young men and women, and even children, who in the early days of the Society were eminently useful in the service of Truth, some of them undergoing great suffering even unto death rather than yield to that which their conscience set them against.

Second-day morning the Yearly Meeting again convened in joint session. These periods of worship in which the men and women together sought strength from the great Head of the Church before entering upon the business of the meeting, seemed to the visitor unaccustomed to the practice solemnizing and efficacious. In this instance perceptibly so, for the session that followed was particularly lively, and from this time on the interest of the younger Friends deepened. The outstanding exercise of the period of worship just referred to, seemed to centre in an impressive communication delivered by a visiting woman minister from the text: "Beware of covetousness, which is idolatry."

The business which claimed the attention of this sitting was the reading and answering of the nine Queries which this Yearly Meeting has designed for the help of its membership in attaining the standard of discipleship established by Christ and His Apostles for the Church. Following the Queries the Advices were read. The matter of these when prepared was largely collated by selecting the best and most pertinent expression covering the various subjects as found in the Books of Discipline of a number of Yearly Meetings. As a whole, they bear the impress of hands that must have entered into their preparation with a fresh and lively sense of the doctrines which they are intended to exemplify and the testimonies which they are designed to uphold.

The Query adverting to the subject showed that one new meeting had been established within the past year, that of West Grove, in Alamance County. The meeting recorded the loss sustained through the decease, at the age of seventy-two years, of one of its widely-known ministers, Cyrus W. Harvey; also of a much esteemed Elder, Margaret A. Outland, who had occupied the station for twenty-two years and deceased aged eighty years.

Second-day evening, by request of two visiting ministers, a deeply interesting and largely attended meeting for worship was held in the Methodist house in the town of Woodland. The outstanding message of the occasion, as chiefly handed forth by these two Friends, was that of the peaceable nature of that kingdom which the Lord Jesus came into the world to establish in contradistinction to that which obtained under the earlier covenant of the Lord with His people. The old was not simply intended to be amended or improved upon—it was abolished. It is the failure to recognize this great truth of the Scriptures which hinders the progress of Christianity in the world to-day and has been the direct cause of the continuance of war throughout all these so-called Christian centuries since the Prince of Peace came to establish His Kingdom in the hearts of men. The doctrine preached seemed to be well received and the attitude of the people towards the visitors that of sincere and affectionate kindness.

Third-day Morning Session.—The letter of London Yearly Meeting, addressed to all Yearly Meetings of the Society of Friends, asking co-operation in the work of peace by the appointment of delegates to represent them at a general conference, was read and favorably received. It was decided to appoint two men and two women to communicate with the Clerk of the English committee, also to get in touch with similar organizations in America. The beautiful spirit of harmony which prevailed in the meeting during the consideration of this subject, as well as the interest manifested, seemed a fitting prelude to entering upon such peace work as that proposed.

A report on education showed that there were over one hundred children members of the Yearly Meeting of school age, and that there was an increased interest in the subject. A committee under appointment with regard to influencing the Legislature on the subject of capital punishment made report of its work and was continued.

Third-day Evening.—By request of two of the visiting ministers made to the Yearly Meeting in joint session in the morning and freely granted, a meeting for worship was held at Rich Square, about four miles distant from Woodland, where Friends have a very attractive and commodious house of worship; this was well filled, chiefly by people of the town not in membership with Friends, who, as at Woodland, appeared to receive the Gospel message with open gladness of heart.

The Friends who had felt the call for the above meeting held at Rich Square were very hospitably entertained over night at the home of a young couple residing in the adjoining neighborhood. The morning following, a visit was made to the aged parents of these which will long be remembered. A short automobile ride brought us to the comfortable homestead, which stood at the end of a lane and was surrounded by its many acres of carefully-tilled soil. Nearly a century had elapsed since the erection of this house, and many, we thought, had been the number of those who like ourselves had been welcomed at its great, cheerful fireside in that sunlit room where we gathered for a while in social converse and for the asking of the Divine blessing, especially upon the dear mother of that household whom invalidism and the advancing infirmities of age had long kept from mingling abroad with her friends. We could have lingered longer amid such engaging hospitality, but we had to hasten back to Cedar Grove, for this was Fourth-day morning and already Friends would be gathering ere we reached the place for the mid-week meeting for worship. This was well attended and the people eager to hear the Word as handed forth by its messengers. When those who sat at the head of the meeting moved to close it the people so inclined to remain that it was continued for a considerable while longer in life and power.

Fourth-day Afternoon.—The Meeting of Ministers, Elders and Overseers again assembled. Instead of being the rather select and tense group of individuals to which some of us had been accustomed when thinking of such a meeting, there was here a marked freedom and that without any discernible hindrance to its dignity or spirituality. Other concerned persons were freely admitted to the deliberations, and the babbling of babes in arms here, as in all other meetings, was not absent. The Queries and Answers, with the Advices for those holding these important stations in the Church, on being read, it was observed with what frankness Friends had been willing to search themselves as to their high calling, and where weakness was thought to exist, to admit it.

Fifth-day morning the closing session was held. A committee appointed at a previous session to nominate Friends to constitute a Visiting Committee, made report. The work of this Committee during the past year had been briefly presented at a previous sitting, at which the impression prevailed that owing to the smallness of most of the congregations constituting the Yearly Meeting and the isolation of several of the members there remained a lively concern for the continuance of the service, the motion for which arose in the women's meeting of one year ago, and was worded as follows: "That a committee of concerned Friends be appointed to visit the meetings and families of this Yearly Meeting with power to appoint meetings or enter into any service which, in their judgment, will advance the cause of Truth by arousing our membership to more zeal in the work of the church."

Report was made of a Committee to Assist those Traveling in the Cause of Truth. Their work was commended and directed to be continued. The minutes of the Representative Meeting were read and its proceedings approved. The work appeared small in comparison with that of a large body such as Philadelphia Representative Meeting. A deep impression was made, however, by the feeling which was expressed that owing to the general world condition and the alarming spread of militarism in our country, this meeting might have work to do which would ally it more closely in name to that formerly applied to such meetings, i. e., a Meeting for Sufferings.

The Epistolary Committee produced letters to each of the Yearly Meetings with which this is in correspondence, viz.: Kansas, at Emporia; Iowa, at West Branch; Western, at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Ind.; Ohio, at Stillwater, near Barnesville; New England, at Westerly, R. I.; Canada, at Pickering, Ont.; also one for Fritchley General Meeting, Eng. To those of us members of a Yearly Meeting not thus officially associated with other bodies bearing such designation there arose a feeling akin to one of isolation, but this was happily allayed in the remembrance that all who truly follow Christ in the essentials of Gospel unity, "are living epistles written in the heart, known and read of all men." The interest of these epistles was intensified by the information that some of them were the work of young people not members of the Committee, in whose hearts had arisen what they believed to be a message for the hour. The reading of these epistles was followed by that of the minute embodying some of the exercises prevailing in the meetings of Ministers, Elders and Overseers. Returning minutes were presented for all the visiting Friends attending the meeting with credentials, and directed to be signed and delivered on behalf of the Yearly Meeting. Soon after this announcement was made by the Clerks that the business appeared to be concluded. Then came, to some of the visitors, at least, that for which all that had preceded had been prepared, and to which it had been steadily leading. The closing event of a week of many interests was at hand. Many and varied were the occasions on which some of us had been blessed together, in meetings, in homes where we had been welcomed by kindly faces there had been created a renewed sense of the value of human souls and how all in their moments of sincerest and best desire were seeking for the same thing, even their preservation from corrupting influence and their enlargement in the faith of the Lord Jesus. A visiting minister arose and with much feeling quoted the words of the intercessory prayer of the Saviour: "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are;" affectionately commending those he was about to leave to this sanctifying influence. A young woman of the membership adverted to a message of the day before wherein the purifying, stimulating influence of the love of God was compared to the ocean upon some parts of the Atlantic coast where all may, according to their strength and religious experience, find the depth that suits them—the babes in Christ may find their delight in the safety of the comparatively shallow water close to shore; those stronger in religious experience may venture into the surf, while others may feel safe in still deeper waters beyond which there lies the extended ocean of infinite love to which the soul must approach with deepest reverence.

Another young woman arose and repeated the text: "Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am." Next, from the young woman acting as Assistant Clerk to the Women's Meeting, came words that in full, rich tones fell like a benediction upon the assembly—"Return unto thy rest, O, my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee!" The Clerk of the Men's Meeting now read their closing minute, directly followed by that for the Women's Meeting, a few minutes of weighty silence ensued, and the Yearly Meeting for the year had ended.

MILITARY TRAINING.

[The Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have collected expressions of judgment touching military training in schools from many prominent men and women in the United States. These have come to them as answers to definite questions mailed from the headquarters of the Committee. It is the expectation to issue many of these in pamphlet form and to give them wide circulation. For breadth of grasp of the subject we cannot imagine anything more fair or concise than the following.—Eds.]

Militarism is not only a system, but an attitude of mind. It is a survival of days when men failed to see the might of the Spirit of Jesus and the good sense of love. Doing one another injustice, both intentionally and in ignorance of the laws of social welfare, they felt the need of soldiers to defend and enforce their policies. Thus history revolved in a vicious circle. Bad internalism demanded military establishments, and military establishments diverted attention from Christian ideals in national policies.

To my mind military training in schools will serve to consolidate this same attitude of mind in growing generations. Military training cannot fail to make impressionable lives feel the justice of militarism as a spiritual attitude toward other nations. It will divert attention from ideals of justice and friendship in the same proportion as it is defended and enforced. Pride and suspicion are indispensable accompaniments of military preparation. Why should boys and girls be given such lessons? As far as real military preparation is concerned military training in schools is of no real value; but as developing a bent of mind, an accustomedness to military thinking and a respect for war it is liable to be a psychological suggestion which will make sanity and justice more difficult in all dealings of future public opinion with international relations.

Schools should look to the future and not to the past. If preparation for war must ever come, let it come as a consciously confessed evil, rather than as an expression of attitudes engendered and justified in the midst of a formative educational process. Boys and girls should be taught that war can be averted by giving justice and that fighting is a survival of a lower civilization rather than an expression of truest patriotism.—SHAILER MATHEWS, President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

TRAINING FOR WHAT?

From the many expressions of parents of high school students in favor of military training that have come to my notice the following stand out pre-eminently:—

1st. It is much to be desired because it trains the boy to prompt obedience and a quick response to demand for action.

2nd. It is a fine form of physical discipline resulting in erect carriage and a certain physical hardness that makes for endurance.

3rd. It gives the boy a definite means of expression for his feelings of patriotism and prepares him to serve his country in her hour of need.

4th. It makes possible the speedy organization of a latent force in the nation which if unorganized is almost futile to withstand the advance of a possible foe.

IN REPLY—

1st. Did you ever consider that there is a training which begets something even more to be desired than what you call "prompt" obedience, which in reality in military training is usually blind obedience. I mean the training which makes for prompt understanding action, and which allows room for initiative and makes men think for themselves. Such a training is an absolute necessity for the citizen of a democracy.

2nd. This statement has been successfully refuted by too many pedagogues of note for us to spend time upon it. The very fact that the nations of greatest military prowess to-day have refused such training in their schools is an unanswerable argument.

3rd. That depends upon your interpretation of the meaning of "preparation" and "patriotism." Our boys need to be trained in a patriotism that declares its willingness to live rather than to die for their country. They need preparation in those finer qualities of "brotherhood" and "neighborliness." It takes great courage and supreme faith to live up to the ideals of good will towards men.

4th. You may be surprised to know how ardently I am with you on this point, only the "force" to which we refer is not the same. Herein lies the crux of my opposition to military training in the schools. It is preparing for the use of and the reliance upon a force which has proved itself ineffectual in the past in bringing about conditions desired. Military training as a means to meet the needs of the age seems a deliberate setting of our faces backward.

There are indications of Divine stirrings on all sides today pointing to the vaster, subtler energies of mind and spirit, the very power of which lies in their independence of force. "A power which bids the strong man not to use his strength; which tells the muscled arm not to strike back! Which strips its soldiers of their weapons of violence and clothes them instead with forgiveness, trust and love."

This I believe to be the upward push of life toward something finer than man has yet tried. As his experiments in the physical world are lifting him from the solid earth to launch him in the air, so the untried forces of the spirit challenge his powers.

Therefore if we are to train our boys for that which will result in a richer, fuller civic consciousness let it be in the development of those forces which make for Love not Hate, for Life not Death.—MARY V. GRICE, President Philadelphia Home and School League.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE AT ARCH STREET CENTRE.

On Sixth-day, Eleventh Month 17, 1916, a small conference of young Friends was held at the Arch Street Centre to consider various aspects of the "Young Friends' Movement" in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Edward C. Wood presided, and after a brief period of silent waiting, the afternoon meeting was opened by a short history of the movement and its present status. A little over a year ago a small group of Friends at Eaglesmere originated the idea of such an organization, and since then it has proceeded slowly along organized lines. There is at present a central Executive Committee of nine, forming the nucleus of the general or large committee, with representatives as far as possible from each of the twenty-nine Monthly Meetings. It is desired not to duplicate other Friendly organizations but rather to bring them together, so that young Friends may be able better to work through the group in which they are most interested. This organization is distinct from that of the Race Street Friends, but we desire to co-operate with them as way opens along lines of Peace, study groups, etc.

Henry J. Cadbury spoke on the purpose of a Young Friends' organization. The movement, he said, was already here, and the purpose of an organization was simply to serve the movement, in correlating, so far as possible, the various activities of Young Friends throughout the Yearly Meeting. Such an organization would not be amalgamated with Young Friends' organizations in other Yearly Meetings, but would be a medium through which our common aims and purposes could be realized. A group consciousness would be expressed and we could undertake new tasks as we see them. With the unusual advantages of education and solidarity possessed by our Yearly Meeting, there are great possibilities for us to proclaim our united message to the world, but this can be done best only through individual consecration to the service of our Master. The afternoon session closed with a short devotional period, in which we were drawn very earnestly to seek the guidance of our Father in Heaven in furthering this organization, that it may be of service to our Society, and an effective means of carrying the Quaker message to the world.

Supper was served at the Centre, after which the evening meeting was held, devoted to the consideration of the practical side of the movement, as distinguished from the inspirational side of the afternoon.

Emma Cadbury, Jr., spoke on the subject of Study Groups. In the development of fellowship we need to work, think and pray together and the study class or "round table" furnishes us this opportunity. Co-operation is made, more efficient, for the group is often the centre of a strong nucleus for working with other Yearly Meetings and other Christian groups. There is greatest liberty in the method of organization, as in subject matter for study. With a class not larger than fifteen as a basis, such subjects as Peace, Social Service, Mission and Bible Study, History of Quakerism, etc., may be taken up. Let a secretary of Study Groups be appointed who with the help of a committee shall have programmes and bibliography ready for any group who may apply for them.

Anne G. Walton had a definite way for us to help in the spread of the Peace Message. There are four subcommittees in connection with the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee which need help.

(a) The Governmental Relations Committee, which is endeavoring at present to promote Friendly relations between the United States and Mexico. Become experts on the Mexican situation, and in this way you can help them more than you know.

(b) The Meetings Committee you can help by offering your services as speakers, in mill districts, granges and other places where people seem especially open-minded.

(c) The Committee on Schools and Churches can be helped by distributing literature on Military Training in the Public Schools and Churches.

Emmor Roberts, a member of the New Jersey Legislature, spoke on the opportunities of Friends in Politics. Christianity and politics are not often consciously combined, he said, but as in America the people rule, there is opportunity for every one to assert himself in the right way to help mould public opinion on such vital questions as temperance, peace, etc. By writing to the United States and State Senators about bills to be passed, Friends exert more influence than they realize.

Thomas A. Sykes, said that we must so live that everything we do or say shall reflect personal contact with the living God. Friends have a great opportunity to minister to the community along lines of social work. This was similar to the line of thought taken up by Margaret R. Carey, who spoke on "Our Opportunities Among Those of Other Sects and Faiths." We ought to stop going so much to committees and take time apart to think and pray. Having known God we should go forth and proclaim our Quaker message to the world, in schools, in industrial groups, wherever we feel the call and especially on the foreign field, where the Quaker message has a unique appeal.

The last speaker of the evening, Benjamin S. De Cou, emphasized the value of the meeting for worship. It is an activity where work must be done, and if it is what it ought to be, we must work and take time to prepare ourselves for it. The "morning watch," Bible study and Daily Living up to the best we know are three important ways in which to help our meetings. With the "inflow" through such channels as these, there will be opportunity for the "overflow" to others. We must first of all yield our gifts of intellect and ability to Christ, that He may energize us, that His living personality may work through us.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

MOSCOW AND THE REFUGEES.

Moscow is in its spring beauty. Gilded domes and spires gleam in the sunshine against a dull blue sky suggestive of the tropics. Ten days ago not a flower was to be seen in the public gardens, but under long days of sunshine in this sweet air, brown beds have blazed into color with astonishing rapidity. The lawns are now brilliantly green, tulips are in their glory, and the gray-brown branches of ash, elm, poplar and maple are decking themselves in their summer tints.

The city is built on an eminence formed by seven hills and has, at present, with soldiers and refugees, an inflated population of nearly three millions. Though Petrograd was the official capital up to the days of Peter the Great, Moscow is the natural capital of Russia. It is the seat of the oldest university, the chief industrial and commercial city, and the centre of the railway system.

We felt the charm of human vitality of Moscow before we reached our hotel. Petrograd is formal, artificial and fading, Moscow is varied, natural and fresh. Possibly a triumphant bargain with a cabman to pay five roubles* instead of ten, increased our appreciation. The sun shone brightly, the cruel sting had gone from the air, and our rooms at the Hotel National looked delightfully clean and inviting after twelve hours in the train.

After ten days here, I doubt if there is another city in the world like Moscow. The grace and beauty of Paris fascinates, as the splendor and whirl of New York astomishes one. London is too vast and many-sided to create any one impression. But Moscow is at once so natural yet devout, so homely yet so comely, that one loves her instinctively.

Among the churches and historic buildings of the Kremlin is the Bell Tower of Ivan Veliki, completed in 1600 and restored in 1813. Every time I see it I experience a fresh thrill of delight. The tower rises to a great height, 320 feet, and crowned by dome and cross, is one of the most beautiful objects in Moscow. Napoleon and his Marshals gazed from its summit in 1812, and the original cross was torn down by the French soldiers in the belief that it was made of gold. The view is well worth the long climb up the spiral staircase. The city looks so pleasant and so varied with the domes and spires of its churches, its Imperial Palace and municipal buildings and the vast block of the Foundling Hospital. Lines and patches of verdure contrast with buildings of varied colors and through the sunny landscape the river Moscua winds like a silver thread.

It is noticeable that this city, which best expresses the national life of Russia, is full of churches. "Moscow," the people say, "has forty times forty churches." Churches, shrines, ikons, revered with devout kisses and bowed heads and countless crossings of the breast, are everywhere. The street corners, public buildings, railway station, hotels, private houses, all have their ikons, often of imposing appearance and with a sacred picture of artistic merit. The room in which I write has a small gilt-framed picture of a haloed saint, and I saw a little ikon on every soldier's bed in the Anglo-Russian Hospital at Petrograd.

In Russia the churches are popular places of worship, they and their ritual seem to meet the need of the people, and even in the great cathedrals, the poor worship with the rich on an equal footing. In one costly church of rare beauty a comparative beggar stood by the side of the official who read the service.

The short services held before a shrine are intimate and devout. Some of the worshippers stand with bowed heads, others cross themselves or kiss the floor. One priest intones the amens in a voice so deep and unearthly one can hardly believe it comes from a human throat, another reads the service and holds the cross to be kissed. Prayers are handed up written on slips of paper, and little yellow tapers are lit and erected before the shrine. There a handsome old peasant with flowing beard and long hair stands devoutly crossing himself. He is wrapped in a long black cloak reaching to his high leather boots. Here a woman lifts up her little girl to kiss the glass covering the precious relics. A better dressed woman hands a coin to the priest to be blessed and laid for a moment on the shrine, possibly for a son going to the front.

One dwells on the religious side of Moscow, because, to a visitor, it is the noticeable feature of the city, but education is not forgotten. There is a university for 12,000 men students, and we visited one for 4000 women, where in a huge hall, surrounded with galleries, girl graduates walked or talked in groups. Here a woman may be educated for 100 roubles a year and be lodged and fed for 250 more. Board and education for £35 a year!

The countess who has so kindly introduced us to the philanthropic work of the city is a delightful type of the advanced woman. Her English is fluent and incisive, her strength and kindness inexhaustible. With her hands bare of gloves or jewelry and dressed in a striped cotton blouse and black skirt and coat, she might be the wife of an English country parson. As the car jolted over the cobbles she assured us that while England is aristocratic, Russia is democratic in its temperament. The simplicity of her own manners, and still more the absence of fear or constraint among the poorest persons who spoke to her, seemed to confirm this. When in the huge distillery now turned into a clearing hospital for the sick and wounded, she spoke to a soldier, she was not a countess, a philanthropist, a widely educated citizen of the world, but just a Russian woman with boys fighting and girls nursing at the front, and the man with the tiny silver cross on his neck, the wide-jawed peasant face and big hands, answered her as such.

Showing us over a cheerful little residential home for refugee boys, she spoke with vehement scorn of the patronizing charity which regards the poor as so many puppies whose business in life is to educate the finer sympathies of the upper classes.

Moscow is famous for its churches, the public spirit of its merchants, its 800 benevolent institutions and its theatre, which claims to be the best in the world. It is becoming famous for its eager spirit of reform and its civil administration.

How has this great city borne itself in this overwhelming crisis of war, when two or even four million people have been driven from their homes?

As a submarine volcanic eruption hurls a tidal wave, so the war, last autumn, burst beneath the peoples of ten provinces, and loosening them from the land where they had been rooted for generations, flung them eastwards in a vast surging wave of refugees.

There are not many roads in Russia, but there is a great highway running northeast from Poland to Moscow. Half-way it branches southward to Kiev. In Eighth, Ninth and Tenth Months last year, this road became a human river flowing into the centre of Russia—a countless multitude of men and women, children and frail old people, horses, cattle and carts filled with cherished possessions and every sort of chattel. As it flowed on the people became poorer day by day, women got nervous and irritable, children had not the heart to cry, the men pressed on hopelessly, not knowing their goal. The inhabitants of the country were charitable, they gave and they gave freely, but the needs of the crowd were inexhaustible and dire necessity knew no law. The weather became colder, many of the refugees were footsore and rheumatic. Dysentery was raging. There was typhoid, bronchitis, pneumonia. Scarletina broke out among the children. At Rostavl, a quiet little town in the Province of Smolensk, the flood of drifting humanity encompassed the village, whirled round it, finally submerged it. It was late in Tenth Month and though dry, the weather was getting colder, and the people had become so poor and so exhausted that they could go no further. Necessity drove them to sell their horses at Rostavl and go on by train.

To the moujik who has been driven from his home, lost his crops, seen wife or child buried under a little wooden cross by the roadside, this parting from his horses was the last drop in his cup of misery. Without a horse the moujik scarcely feels himself to be a man. The war had changed a valiant, striving personality into a beggar without hope—a mere human driftwood. So the beloved horses were sold for a fraction of their value, and the moujik took the train.

And still, careless of individual suffering, the river of refugees flowed on. Part of the stream set southward towards Kief, the other part by circuitous railway routes flowed round Moscow and spread and lost itself in the eastern provinces. Thousands of the exiles went southward to the inhospitable mountains of Turkestan, or were transported by train into Siberia, some even reached the sea at Vladivostock.

Though but a small portion of the war victims came to Moscow, numerically that portion was great. Trains poured refugees into the railway stations, hopeless, starving, ill-clad people, some of whom had been traveling for weeks and even months. They suffered terribly from cold, many were ill, some were lying dead in the trains. Families were separated, scores of little children had lost their parents.

Moscow was not ready, but she rose valiantly to the emergency. In six months, by dint of municipal liberality, individual self-sacrifice and untold kindness and perseverance, they had reduced a chaos of despair to the successful organization of refugees which we ourselves have seen in Moscow.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON.

When the slaves were freed in 1865, W. J. B. in the Journal of Education says a nameless negro boy about six years old went to work in a coal mine in West Virginia to support his mother and himself. The story is told that the child was so fond of books that he was called a "booker"—hence his first name. When after many cruel disappointments and denials he was allowed to go to school, he was asked by his teacher for a last name as well as for a first name, and, as he afterward said, he chose a good one, "Washington." Thus starting in life without a name he made one for himself which will never die.

With an unquenchable thirst for knowledge he began while working in the mine to study such books as he could find. One day hearing two miners speak of Hampton Institute, he started at once, walked five hundred miles, and after untold hardships that would have utterly crushed one of ordinary mould, he was finally admitted to the classes of this great school. He did all manner of chores for a meager living, and finally got the rudiments of an education, became a teacher at Hampton, and while there was selected by General Armstrong to take charge of what was to be a normal school for colored people in the little town of Tuskegee, Alabama.

While Tuskegee Institute must ever remain Booker T. Washington's greatest monument, he achieved distinction in other lines of human endeavor. As an orator he had few equals, and as an author his books alone would have brought him fame. His principal publications are his autobiography, "Up from Slavery," "Working with the Hands," "The Man Farthest Down," "The Story of the Negro" and "Character Building." All of his writings are characterized by a high and definite purpose, by sane judgment, good taste and pure English. For every word he uses he gives the reader an idea. "Up from Slavery" and "Character Building" are two books that should be in every library, and young people as well as old should be encouraged to read them.

Dr. Washington tells us in his autobiography that in literature Lincoln was his patron saint. Doubtless his own simple and forceful English was greatly influenced by his careful study of the great emancipator's writings.

Dr. Washington, in addition to his other high qualities, was the possessor of a very keen and capable business brain. To illustrate this, it is related that some years ago Andrew Carnegie sent him a check for a comparatively small sum to use in his educational work. Upon receipt of this check Dr. Washington reasoned thus: "Andrew Carnegie is not fully aware of the work Tuskegee is doing—else he would have given us a greater sum—which we very much need. If it goes out to the world that the amount of this check is his measure of Tuskegee it will influence others to belittle our work and to limit their aid to small amounts." But what was to be done? After careful consideration Dr. Washington returned the check with a frank statement for so doing. He took the risk. Andrew Carnegie afterwards made a personal investigation of the work done at Tuskegee, and has since given more than half a million dollars to the Institute, and placed at interest a large sum for the support of Dr. Washington and his family—"so that, in carrying on his great educational work Dr. Washington might always be free from financial care and anxiety of a personal character."

Harvard University bestowed upon him the degree of Master of Arts, and Dartmouth College honored him with the degree of Doctor of Laws. In his visits to foreign countries Dr. Washington was received with such distinguished attention and honors as are accorded to but few men. The fame of the man had preceded him, and without racial prejudice and with great enthusiasm he was received at his true value and honored accordingly.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"THE LAND OF ANYHOW."

Beyond the Isle of What's-the-Use,
Where Slipshod Point is now,
There used to be, when I was young,
The Land of Anyhow.

Don't Care was king of all this realm—
A cruel king was he!
For those who served him with good heart
He treated shamefully!

When boys and girls their tasks would slight
And cloud poor mother's brow,
He'd say, "Don't care! It's good enough!
Just do it anyhow."

But when in after life they longed
To make proud fortune bow,
He let them find that fate ne'er smiles
On work done anyhow.

For he who would the harvest reap
Must learn to use the plow,
And pitch his tent a long, long way
From the Land of Anyhow!

THE KNOCK-BOX (Be Polite—Perhaps Your Family Won't Mind if You Practise it on Them).—There was more than average contentment and general "get-alongness" in a Connecticut family where I visited one summer. Back of the politeness and pleasant attitude of each to the other lay a secret of some sort which was joked about and laughed over, but never divulged to the general public. The mystery hovered about a slitted box which stood on the parlor mantel. It resembled a mail box, and when it was emptied each evening, notes were handed around to mother, father, brothers and sisters. Sometimes they were read with quiet gravity, sometimes with a smile. One morning a missive fell on my plate. Here is the message it held:

"If our company would be good enough to 'phone when she decides not to return for luncheon, the cook would be exceedingly grateful."

I re-read it, mystified a trifle, also a bit ruffled, I confess, and a laugh went round the table.

"Mother," cried one of the girls, "explain to the company about our knock-box. It was not exactly fair to discipline her without a warning."

That forenoon while I fated to empty a damning basket I suggested, "Now tell me about the knock-box."

"The knock-box," explained my hostess, "is an ancient and honorable institution of this family, but it was not fair to initiate you as we did."

"It was perfectly fair. I felt guilty enough yesterday when I found you had waited luncheon for me. Now for the story."

"When we were married," she began, "I was a fault-finder, a petty, fussy housewife, picking on somebody about something all the time. One evening my husband took me to task and I suddenly realized that if I did not take heed I might develop into a genuine nagger like a woman next door, who is the terror of our neighborhood. He suggested as a cure that instead of blurting out every little fault I found in him I should write it down each day and drop my criticism in a box. He said he would do the same thing with me. We christened it the knock-box. Two rules were made: That complaints should be politely worded and read over several times before being mailed. If they seemed too trivial for utterance they were to be destroyed. I remember the first time we emptied the knock-box. I found a suggestion that coffee ought to be served steaming hot and that when a man loaned his knife to a lady he expected it to be returned."

"My husband had one solitary knock to read. I had destroyed ten or twelve during the day; on a second reading they had sounded petty. This one was about a man who left his belongings scattered all over a house when he dashed out to catch a car. It was seed sown in good ground. The work grew lighter each day after that, because my husband became tidier. It is years since he found a complaint in the knock-box about careless habits. When the children were old enough to read and write they found little reminders in the box. They were also allowed to send knocks to us, and some of them were very funny. I remember one from Bobs about hanging the key of the preserve closet where he could not reach it. At the age of eight Margaret objected strenuously to wearing pinafores. Each one agreed that eight o'clock was much too early to go to bed. You have not an idea of how the knock-box saves a family from snarls. One little bit of fault-finding is capable of stirring up a storm of recrimination. Besides, a written hint sinks in as no amount of nagging can."

Can you imagine what my first task was on reaching home? I instituted a family knock-box. It works; oh, it has worked like a charm.—ISABEL GORDON CURTIS.

NEWS ITEMS.

The last message from our friends, Alfred and Grace Lowry, of which we have knowledge, is dated Eleventh Month 12th, from Munich. It will be remembered that Alfred Lowry, Jr., gave up his position as German teacher at Westtown and in the late summer started with his wife for Germany to work under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The letter alluded to says:

"Friends have so little of what is called church work that one feels somewhat at a disadvantage when it comes to seeing the things that need to be done and the most practical way of doing them. The Serbians are the most needy of all [the prisoners], some of them have been in one war after another for five years now and haven't seen home or family in all that time." He also says, "I hope THE FRIEND may be on its way, I always miss it here also."

His home letters are of course written for the censors, and contain little of detail. Prior to going to Munich he was in Berlin, doing secretarial work. His address is care C. V. Hibbard, No. 124 E. Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.—[Eds.]

NOTES FROM HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.—This meeting was held at Moorestown, Twelfth Month 14th, with about the usual attendance, which means that the large house had the pleasing inspiring appearance of being well filled. A conspicuous feature, however, was the almost entire absence of visiting "public Friends," though not a few other visitors were in attendance. The meeting for worship proved a Bethel to many hearts, wherein there was refreshing from the Day Spring from on High. One of its striking features was the remarkable unity of the religious exercises which early settled down upon it; the one theme which was brought repeatedly to the fore being that conveyed by the Scripture expression (though not quoted), "He hath shown thee, O man! what is good, and what doth the Lord require of thee but to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God."

This seeming message of the hour and place was well and impressively presented by a visiting minister who referred to the deeply instructive incident recorded in the New Testament where the amiable young man came to the Saviour with the burning question of his soul, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" Other vocal expression on the same line followed until the meeting was baptized as one into a remembrance that the salvation of the soul of man is a definite work to be carried on between the individual and his Maker.

Always and in all places our religion teaches us to raise the question, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do," rather than the easier one, "And what shall this man do?"

The business meeting was held throughout in joint session, so many important subjects claiming its attention that the Quarterly Meeting as a whole was nearly four hours in length. Three reports of committees were presented, all referring to activities of the meeting. These were that of the Committee having the oversight of the Atlantic City meeting, that of the one having a similar care over the Merchantville meeting, and that of the large Committee, now under appointment for about three years, and known as the "Religious Service Committee." The report of this last Committee was of such nature as to show that the work in which it is engaged is of a highly important kind—that of endeavoring to strengthen the smaller meetings and of increasing the zeal of all in the work of upbuilding the Church. The effort put forth with this objective had largely been in the line of holding "appointed meetings," a number of which had been held to the satisfaction of many people not in membership with Friends, but seeking the "way of life" as held forth in the Gospel of Christ.

It was, then, a disappointment, and of the nature of a surprise to the body of the Quarterly Meeting, when a Committee appointed three months ago for the consideration of the work of the Religious Service Committee, and the making of nominations for its continuance (the present Committee having desired in a previous report to be released) made report, that the subject committed to them had been carefully and prayerfully considered, but that it did not find the way open "to make any recommendations to the Quarterly Meeting." The effect of this report, as hinted above, was to throw upon the meeting what proved to be a very helpful discussion of the subject in all its bearings, and rarely has there been in the sessions of the Quarterly Meeting a more lively, instructive, and, as it were, "heart to heart" consideration of a weighty matter than upon this occasion. It was shown that the times called for zeal rather than apathy, that ever, as the blessed Master said, "the fields are white unto harvest," that now as then, "the laborers are few," but it was also shown that so important a work must proceed with an enlightened sense of continued fresh anointing, though, as quoted in the meeting, "For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind," being Paul's exhortation to his beloved Timothy, in that stirring passage wherein the latter is enjoined, "to stir up the gift of God, which is in him."

The subject was finally and with much unity disposed of by the continuance of the nominating committee for its reconsideration in the light of the discussion which had followed their report. As the meeting was passing away from this important matter, which for so long a time had held its interested attention, very sweetly and powerfully were brought to remembrance the incident of the two disciples of the Lord Jesus, who, after He had made Himself known to them in that resurrected personality which made their "hearts burn within them," as they talked by the way, constrained him, saying, "Abide with us, for it is towards evening, and the day is far spent."

WALTER L. MOORE.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., Twelfth Month 18, 1916.

ANNUAL REPORT OF BOARD OF MANAGERS OF FRIENDS' INSTITUTE FOR 1915-1916.—During the past year approximately 12,000 persons have used the Institute rooms and about 400 Committee-meetings have been held, with several thousand people attending them. Several Committees which meet regularly at the rooms continue to contribute to our Treasury in return for the opportunity given them.

The present membership is 880. These figures indicate in some degree the usefulness of the Institute.

Two matters of vital interest have claimed the attention of the Board during the past year. Our late friend, T. Wistar Brown, provided that the income of $20,000, of a larger fund placed by him in the hands of Trustees for educational purposes, might, under certain circumstances, be used by the Institute to make it "a more efficient and helpful auxiliary to the progress of our Society."

The Managers suggested to the Trustees of the Fund that the income be used toward paying the salary of a General Secretary who should devote his time to the building up of the Institute and extending its lines of usefulness; the Trustees have granted the income; the services of Harold M. Lane have been engaged to act as General Secretary and he entered upon his duties on Ninth Month 15, 1916. Harold M. Lane is a graduate of Penn College, Iowa, and of Haverford College, Penna., and comes well-fitted for the tasks before him.

In an undertaking of this kind it is not easy to formulate with precision the labors to be performed. They depend in large degree upon the individual, but there is much that the members of the Institute can do by way of suggesting lines of work which will develop the Institute into the sort of an organization that will be more helpful than it now is in promoting our Friendly interests.

As the income from the T. Wistar Brown Fund will not become available until Seventh Month 1, 1917, a special appeal has been made to friends of the Institute to furnish the money needed for the added expense until that time. This appeal has met with generous response, although not enough money has yet been pledged to meet the requirements of the treasury.

We cannot close this brief report without once more appealing for wider support of the Institute.

There are fixed charges to be met each year for salaries, heat, light, magazines, etc., and the Managers feel that many Friends who more or less regularly use the rooms are not aware that it is dependent on membership fees and contributions to meet its running expenses, which amount to a considerable sum annually.

We sincerely hope, with the wider opportunities for service now available through the offices of the General Secretary, that more Friends will become members and share in the expense of maintaining this Friendly centre.

On behalf of the Board of Managers.

JONATHAN M. STEERE.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Jane Deeter Rippin, has been made chief probation officer of the Municipal Court in Philadelphia at a salary of $5000. It is said she owes her nomination to herself and to the good work she has done, whereby her eminent qualifications have been demonstrated.

The Pennsylvania State Grange at the final session of its forty-fourth annual convention passed resolutions to ask city and town agencies and clubs to co-operate in securing from urban centers young persons to help plant and harvest crops, pick berries and aid in preserving during the coming year to offset the shortage of farm labor. The State Employment Bureau will try to interest the Boy Scouts in the plan.

The following awards have been made in the boys' corn-growing contest in Bucks County: First prize—George Harris, Newtown, white dent corn, yielding 94.3 bushels per acre. Second prize—Albert Mason, Yardley, white dent corn, yielding 96.8 bushels per acre. Third prize—Howard Moon, Morrisville, yellow dent corn, 101.2 bushels per acre. The average yield of corn in the United States is 26 bushels to the acre; in Pennsylvania, 38 bushels, and in Bucks County, 40 bushels.

The problem of extravagance in college is not peculiar to Wellesley, but Wellesley is probably first in trying to devise ways and means to stop it. That most college men and women spend much money needlessly is of course beyond question. That there is a certain joy in spending money needlessly is also too true. The problem, then, is not easy of solution. A simple appeal to the students will not suffice. There must be a campaign to work a fundamental change in human nature. Men and women in college must be made to appreciate unconsciously that extravagance has no place in the new doctrine of world fellowship and that waste is wicked while suffering and distress are rampant in so many countries.

The swamp huckleberry, converted by scientific selection of strains, hybridizing of varieties and new methods of cultivation into the large and luscious "blueberry," soon to be made a staple commercial crop, will give the pine barrens and the swamps of central New Jersey a product as important and profitable as its relative the cranberry, according to reports brought to the New Jersey State Horticultural Society, which held its forty-second annual convention in Burlington.

GENERAL.—Resolutions requesting the Administration to protest against the "outrages and violations of the rules of war deliberately perpetrated" by the German Government against the Belgians were passed at a great mass-meeting in Carnegie Hall on the 15th after speeches denouncing the "enslavement of Belgium" had been made by James M. Beck, Judge Alton B. Parker and other noted citizens.

Hugo Munsterberg, Professor of Psychology in the Harvard department of philosophy, dropped dead in his class-room at Radcliffe College on the 16th. He had lectured about ten minutes when he fell to the floor, turned purple in the face, and lost consciousness. He died in twenty minutes, apparently from apoplexy.

FOREIGN.—An investigation into the exact conditions of women's work in France is being carried on by two national organizations, the Conseil National des Femmes Francaises and the Union Francaise pour le Suffrage des Femmes, with the object of furthering a nation-wide campaign which will establish women's work on the same pay basis as men's.

NOTICES.

ROBERT E. SPEER will address a Young Peoples' Tea Meeting (arranged by the Young Women's Auxiliary) at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on First Month 13, 1917, at 7.45 p. m. A cordial invitation is extended to all. His subject will be, "Loyalty to Christ, the Supreme Missionary Motive."

All Young Friends (and their guests) are invited to supper from 6.15 to 7 p. m. Supper tickets (40 cents) should be secured before First Month 9, 1917, from local representatives or from Harold M. Lane, Friends' Institute, Philadelphia.

All who have heard Robert E. Speer have appreciated the earnestness of his message. Those who have not will be glad of this opportunity when he speaks for the first time to a representative group of Philadelphia Friends.

ANNA R. EVANS, President.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL LYCEUM LECTURE.—A general invitation is extended to all Friends and others interested to be present at a lecture in the Friends' Select School lecture-room, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, on Sixth-day, First Month 5th, at 8 p. m., on "Mountaineering and Exploration in the Selkirk," by Professor Charles Sissons, of Victoria College, Toronto University, Canada. Professor Sissons is one of the most active members of the Canadian Alpine Club, and an authority on his subject. Many Philadelphia Friends will be interested in him through his wife, who was Anna R. Normart.

THE IDEAL.

"Oh, that we who declare against wars and acknowledge our trust to be in God only, may walk in the light, and therein examine our foundation and motives in holding great estates! May we look upon our treasures, the furniture of our houses and our garments, and try whether the seeds of war have nourishment in these our possessions. Holding treasures in the self-pleasing spirit is a strong plant, the fruit whereof ripens fast."

"Divine love imposeth no rigorous or unreasonable commands, but graciously points out the spirit of brotherhood and the way to happiness in attaining which it is necessary that we relinquish all that is selfish."

JOHN WOOLMAN.

MORE THAN CONQUERORS.

There is a love that will not let us go, a love that doth not alter when it alteration finds, a love which the many waters cannot quench. Until the heart has found repose in that love, its deepest wants still remain unsatisfied. It is this love, the love of God in Christ Jesus, the love incarnate and crucified; the love which has grappled with our temptations and overcome them; with our sorrows, and tasted their bitterness; with our sins and expiated them; which makes us more than conquerors in a scene of strife and suffering; which puts heavenly lustre into the dews of earthly sorrow, and changes our deepest pain into divinest peace.

More than conquerors! These words were addressed to a little group of Christians located in imperial Rome, where power was deified, where the highest honors and the loudest applauds were accorded to the conqueror who, having crushed the resistance of the enemies of the empire on the battlefield, was returning laden with the spoils of victory. To him the triumphal arch was erected, and to keep his memory alive his statue was placed in the halls of fame. The military conqueror was considered to have reached the highest rung in the ladder of success.

But in the light of heaven, the little band of poor and obscure men and women to whom the apostle wrote his wonderful epistle were greater than such. They were more than conquerors, greater than the world's greatest men. In Christ they had obtained a new conscience and a new understanding, so that they had to change their values and saw better wherein true glory consists.

Already the older revelation had declared, "Greater is he that ruleth his own spirit than he that taketh a city." But that did not go so very far beyond the light bestowed upon the men of Attica, the wisest of the race, as they sat down to ponder the mystery of life. The love of God in Christ Jesus comes into a groaning and travailing creation and enables faith to strike a deeper note. It not only empowers men to rise superior to the contradictions and disagreeable elements of our earth-life. It not merely teaches us how to extract the sharp sting out of sorrow. It is not merely in spite of "tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword," but because of them we become more than conquerors through Him that loved us. The evils of life are transmuted into benefits. The things we naturally shrink from as hurtful, looked at in the love of Christ, have a friendly face. Better thus to have been in the dungeon with Joseph, in the den of lions with Daniel and in exile with Ezekiel. Better thus the valley of thorns with Jesus, than a luxurious bed of roses without Him. Better to share His bitter cup, than to see it pass by in answer to our tearful entreaty. "In all those things" we are more than Alexander, Cæsar or Napoleon—through that One whose love has come into our lives and made all things new.

The great question is: Is the love of Christ real to us? Have we met Him, heard Him, been conquered by Him, opened to Him for ourselves? Have we owned Him before the visible and invisible world? Has He touched us with His Spirit and kindled in our withered hearts an unquenchable flame of faith and love? Can we speak of lusts He has destroyed, fetters He has broken, hidden wounds He has healed, tempers He has tamed, fears He has cast out, hungry cravings He has appeased? Have we looked long enough into His face—marred more than any man's; bedewed with the blood from the thorn-pierced brow—to see the glory of God there, the glory of suffering yet triumphant love, overcoming evil with good? Then we have learned Paul's secret for ourselves, and we shall have melody in our hearts amidst the discords of earth and may even enable others to hear the music of this wonderful love, till their hearts also are set in tune with the heavenly strain.

In bringing these lines to a conclusion, my eye fell on the following words of Meister Eckhart's (A. D., 1260-1327), which I will transcribe here: "This is the chief significance of the suffering of Christ for us, that we cast all our grief into the ocean of His suffering. If thou sufferest only regarding thyself, from whatever cause it may be, that suffering causes grief to thee, and is hard to bear. But if thou sufferest regarding God and Him alone, that suffering is not grievous, nor hard to bear, because God bears the load. The love of the Cross must swallow up our personal grief. Whoso does not suffer from love, for him sorrow is sorrow, and grievous to bear; but whoso suffers from love, he sorrows not, and his suffering is fruitful in God. Therefore is sorrow so noble. No mortal's sorrow was like the sorrow which Christ bore; therefore He is far nobler than any man. Verily were there anything nobler than sorrow, God would have redeemed man thereby.

"Through the higher love the whole life of man is to be elevated from temporal selfishness to the spring of all love to God. Man will again be master over all nature by abiding in God and lifting her up to God."

MAX I. REICH.

THE STEADFAST MIND.

That was a fine old gentleman whom the Pilgrims found on the border of the Enchanted Ground. The way in which he is revealed to the travelers stamps him at once as of the true metal. They hear a little way ahead of them "a solemn noise, as of one much concerned. . . a man upon his knees . . . speaking earnestly to One that is above." Then they join forces and Father Honest knows his man at once. "This," he says, "is Standfast,"—comes from my old neighborhood—sure thing—"he is a right good pilgrim." So we get acquainted and the better we know him the more we like him. He belongs easily to the Immortals. When his summons comes we do not wonder that the waves of the Great River are quiet for a season and that he has a good testimony to leave behind him. "I see myself now at the end of my journey; my toilsome days are ended; I am going to see that Head which was crowned with thorns and that face which was spit upon for me."

One hardly knows how to stop quoting him, for his words ring true to the hopes and desires of the Christian in all the ages.

Now Standfast is a portrait of the kind of man much needed to-day. He is no boaster, and is not given to stirring up sensations, but has a certain quiet strength about him which he himself will be the first to tell you is not his own; press him hard for an answer, and he will say it comes from that One above to whom he was talking in the midst of the perils of the Enchanted Ground. He has a reserve of power deep down in his mind and heart and soul. He has learned the great lesson not only of self-surrender but of consecration, and he is not at all disposed to let his mind go untilled, untrained, running to waste. No, he believes that God has given him a being in which there is a wonderful combination of forces and that the Steadfast Mind will be of untold value to him in those hard places which try the soul and heart.

Does he set us then to judge others? Not at all. Does he worship knowledge and cast away faith? Not he. Do you see him going about to belittle the people who are in distress about losing their hold of certain blessed truths which their fathers and mothers taught them? Not by any means. But this he will do, hold his mind so open to the informing wisdom and grace of God that it becomes a part of his armor, use his brain and all his faculties in such a way that they grow strong; and his mental powers are molded into lines of beauty and fortitude and patience, so that the soul of the man has help and not hindrance from his mind. Faith and hope and love are fortified, and as the young man grows in years we have Standfast over again, in reality not in an allegory. He is taking life as it comes and bending his work, whether it be buying or selling, or manufacturing, or building, or financing, or teaching, to make a life which shall stand fast in the Master's Service. That life knows when to go forward and when to wait, how to do the Lord's will and how to endure that will; and it does not fret itself against the walls of its earthly dwelling, the mind has become trained to be the companion of the Soul and shares its immortality. This man rejoices in knowledge of God's ways in His universe so far as revealed, but remembers the hour drawing nigh when he shall have "no need of Science because he is about to stand in the presence of Omnipotence" and he is humbled, but none the less steadfast.

When Paul writes to the Corinthians and tells them of his vision of the great Realities that lie beyond this life, of mortality changed to immortality, and corruption putting on incorruption, he seems to stand as it were at the very gates of Eternity; but as the vision closes he brings us back again to earth, to the fact of sin and to the victory we may have over sin through Him who is the Saviour and Redeemer of the world; and then Paul comes right down to the work-a-day world, and his first word is a command to be steadfast, then unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord.

But the steadfast mind has its supreme example in One greater than Paul—in the purpose from which He never swerved—the path which led day by day to Calvary and the Cross. With that light upon our path to-day let us gird up our loins afresh and ask of Him for ourselves and for the Church larger measure of the Steadfast Mind which was and is forever in Christ our Lord.

PROFESSED CHRISTIANITY AT WAR—CHRISTIANITY AT PEACE.

DAVID HOLLOWAY.

Doubtless there has never been a time since the advent of Christianity into the world, through the coming, suffering and sacrifice of its blessed author, Jesus Christ, our Lord, when there was more being enacted under the profession thereof, contrary, and repugnant to its benign spirit, and its peace pervading precepts as contained in the New Testament Scriptures, than at the present.

Most prominent is the spectacle of the professed Christian warring nations of Europe now engaged in the wholesale destruction of men, for whom Christ died, He who has said, "I came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

Such a pointed contradiction evidently represents Christianity in the "Spirit of the letter that killeth," dominated by man through an intellectual grasp and manipulation of its obligations and requirements to suit his own selfish and sinister purposes. How different are the results when Christianity is in fact in the ascendancy, and dominates man, and through spiritual regeneration, enables him to realize its living realities. He then witnesses to the all-availing means of his release from the bondage of corruption, and knows a restoration again to the image of his Maker, and comes into possession of his own, that portion in Christ purchased for him through His sufferings and death on Calvary's Cross. Such only truly witness that Christ's kingdom has come, and that His will is done in, by and through them, as it is done in Heaven, having yielded up their lives when required as martyrs to His cause.

The foregoing represents the extremes exhibited under the profession of Christianity. The first strikingly denotes failure, the latter as strikingly denotes successful achievement of its gracious purpose, viz: the salvation of men by and through the exaltation of Christ's kingdom in their hearts, each one constituting a unit towards its larger development, and as these units increase and become sufficiently universal, then, and not until then, in accord with ancient prophecy, shall the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

Perhaps much the larger number concerned with Christianity find themselves in the various stages of attainment between these extremes of success and failure; success, as they recognize themselves to be under the dominion of the Cross of Christ, and guidance of His life-giving and soul-sustaining power; failure, as they find themselves from under the dominion of His Cross, aloof from its restraints, in the pursuit of their self-chosen aims and purposes, thus, in a manner, denying the Lord who has bought them with the costly price of His own precious blood, and assuming that Christianity is responsible for their acts they accept its teachings in the letter, merely as an intellectual and cultural asset, and reject it in the spirit by which their lives should be conformed to its righteous precepts, and they enabled thereby to glorify God in their bodies and in their spirits, which are His.

The Scriptures testify that it is righteousness that exalteth a nation, and that the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever. The little stone which King Nebuchadnezzar saw cut out of the mountain without hands—which went on increasing until it became a great mountain filling the whole earth, is no doubt figurative of the development of Christ's kingdom on earth, to be consummated in time, however much there seems yet lacking of the vision's fulfilment. For the invincible Conqueror is still on the way and by His inherent power and volition, is breaking in pieces and subduing (as seen in the vision) the opposing kingdoms which are in the image and authority of that which is from beneath in the fall, and which ever obstruct the peaceable progress and exaltation of Christ's kingdom in the way of its ultimate triumph and establishment.

In view of all that has transpired in the past, and is still transpiring to obstruct the realization of this crowning achievement, is it not evident that nineteen hundred years is long enough to have demonstrated the failure of human policy in its application of Christian ethics to the needs of mankind; and this prolonged failure is quite sufficient to convince all men that nothing short of their submission to the quickening, enlightening, regenerating, cleansing power of Christ can constitute them true representatives of His kingdom, and integral parts of the universal brotherhood—a brotherhood, the cementing bond of which is the love and power of God?

Such a phalanx of regenerated humanity if it faithfully adheres to the bond that binds it together, constitutes a procession in the way of the furtherance and fulfilment of the final great and glorious consummation; when, in accord with ancient prophecy, "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." "When nation shall no longer lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn any more."

THE SUN-DIAL AT JORDANS.

The sunk-garden, so much admired by visitors at Jordans Hostel, was laid out, and is kept up, in memory of a deceased Friend buried in the graveyard nearby. On the south side of the old granary which forms one end of the sunk-garden a sun-dial has been placed bearing the initials E. L. and the motto "Love Endures." The following lines were composed by a visitor to Jordans some weeks ago, and seem peculiarly appropriate at the present time.

Here sun and shadow measure out our days,
And over these 'tis written to the praise
Of steadfast love that lightens all man's ways,
"Love endures."

God's own effulgence, Light of our light within,
Sent from the Father to a world of sin,
Stands at the door with love to enter in—
Love endures.

Love that is true and kind, a gentle guest,
Hid in the heart and by the tongue confessed,
And love in song immortally expressed—
Love endures.

Long suffering love that seeketh not her own,
With faith and hope abiding, yet alone
Of human grace highest perfection—
Love endures.

Hereafter when earth's shadows flee away
And, night abolished, ushers endless day,
The hosts of Heaven shall exult for aye—
"Love endures."

OUR PEACE PROGRAM FOR TO-DAY.

BY WILLIAM L. HULL.

There are at least four great tasks to be accomplished in the field of International Peace. These are, first, the speediest possible ending of the greatest war in history; second, the development of a constructive program which shall prevent war in the future; third, the checking of the tide of militarism in the United States; and fourth, the solution of the most pressing and dangerous problems in the foreign relations of the United States.

The killing off of thousands of young men each day, and the rapid and insidious growth of militarism caused by the war in every neutral as well as belligerent country, make it both humane and prudent to end the war as speedily as possible. The American Committee for an International Conference of Neutrals is the chief agency undertaking this task. It is soliciting signatures to a petition to the President and Congress, and is in many ways influencing public opinion with the object of inducing the United States, the largest of the neutral powers, to summon a conference of neutral nations, which shall invite each of the belligerents to state the objects sought to be attained by the war, and to offer mediation, joint or separate, for bringing the war to a close.

The second task is being undertaken in this country by the World Court League, the Judicial Settlements Association, the League to Enforce Peace, and by a large international committee known as The Central Organization for a Durable Peace. The many problems connected with this great task of constructive statesmanship are being studied and discussed in pamphlets written by a large number of publicists in the various nations.

Militarism in the United States is met in the form of un-precedented congressional appropriations; of military training in the schools; of conscription of adults in time of war, of the attempted suppression of freedom of speech and of the press, of a growing faith in the supremacy of physical force, and a decreasing faith in the potency of the moral and spiritual forces. To combat this militant tendency, the American Union against militarism is urging in every possible way the application of the Hensley Amendment to the Naval Appropriation Bill; it is also combating military training in the schools, and will endeavor to secure the repeal of the measure for conscription adopted at the last session.

Two of the problems connected with our foreign policy have to do, first, with the treatment of the Japanese in America, and with the open door in China; and, secondly, with the treatment of Mexico. The Japanese Society in America is urging the holding of a joint conference between America and Japan; other agencies are urging the holding of an International Conference on the Chinese situation, to include not only the United States and Japan, but also China, Great Britain, Russia and France. For the solution of the Mexican problem a joint commission is now in session, and proposals have been made by the Friends to establish scholarships in America for Mexican youths, and for the establishment of American schools in Mexico.

In view of the large and intricate character of the four great tasks outlined above, and of the numerous and varied agencies which are already at work, some of them with large financial resources, upon one or the other of these tasks, it becomes a matter of first-rate importance for the two committees of the two Yearly Meetings in Philadelphia to consider carefully and determine wisely the most useful line of endeavor for them to pursue. It would be easy for them to waste their energies by endeavoring to undertake too much, while, on the other hand, by wise selection and earnest co-operation they could achieve much.

In view of the past history of the Society of Friends, it would seem that the most appropriate work these committees could do, would be to emphasize constantly the relation of the individual conscience to war and preparations for war. For this purpose the third of the tasks mentioned above, namely, the checking of the tide of militarism in our country, would offer the most promising field. The part which the individual conscience should play in the question of military training in the schools, the conscription of adults, the struggle for freedom of speech and of the press, and the supremacy of spiritual and moral force, is in crying need of being emphasized in our country to-day. The Conscientious Objectors in England are confronted with the fact of actual war, and the heroic efforts of the Friends in England in the face of this great emergency are becoming gradually known and appreciated among members of our Society on this side of the Atlantic. It should be our task to make these facts known among all of our fellow-citizens; and it should be especially our task to state our conscientious position and the reason for it now, in this time of manifold preparedness for war. There is obviously quite as much need for the Conscientious Objectors in times of preparing for war as in times of war itself.

The many cogent reasons and the extraordinary experience upon which our Quaker principle of super-resistance is based should be clearly stated and widely known. A wide knowledge and thorough appreciation of such significant facts as the winning of the Roman world by the early Christians, the progress of the Moravians in Bohemia, William Penn's dealings with the Indians of Pennsylvania, the Quaker sanctuaries in the Irish Rebellion of 1798, and the American Civil War, the disarmament of our Canadian frontier, the increase of the Bahaists in Armenia and other parts of Turkey, the arbitration and disarmament commemorated by "the Christ of the Andes," and many other illustrations of the striking success of so-called non-resistance, based on conscientious and religious motives, it should be the special task of the Society of Friends to contribute, among other services, to the great peace work of our time.

When the supper table was cleared, and the servants had withdrawn, some London presents were brought out for the girls—enough of soft grey camel to make a gown for each, and two black silk riding hoods—simple enough, but with an air of town elegance in their shape which enchanted Molly, who tried to make a mirror of the bright warming pan which hung by the casement.

But a convex copper lid, however brilliantly polished, is not flattering to a fresh young face, so the hood was transferred to the hand again and held up, and chattered about until the father, turning to the quieter younger daughter, bade her fetch his saddle bags, as he had something there which would suit her fancy as well as the finery did Molly's.

"Oh, father! a new book?" exclaimed she, with rising color. "Aye, Becky, and a rare good one that I bought in a shop in Gracechurch Street the very day it was published—ah, here it is," and he drew forth a thick volume covered with brown leather. "It is called 'The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood.' Dost thou remember seeing him at thy uncle Thompson's the day that I took thee to Reigate on the pillow?"

Indeed Becky did remember. That journey to Reigate had been one of the few events of her quiet life, and the sight of the benevolent old man who had written many books, was no light matter to the intelligent young soul, ever thirsting for knowledge, and finding it hard to come by in her farmhouse home. Besides, was not Thomas Ellwood the author of the lines which both girls had learned at their mother's knee, and even yet often repeated to her of a quiet First-day evening:—

"Oh, that mine eyes might closed be
To what becomes me not to see,
That deafness may possess my ear
To what becomes me not to hear."

"There is the book, dear daughter, but put it away now in the best parlor, for it is bedtime. When the long dark evenings come, thou shalt read it aloud to us. Summer time, with the cheese, and the hay, and the harvest, is no time for books on a farm."

"May I not read it before winter?" asked Rebekah, looking rather blank.

"Oh, yes, if none of the tasks which thy mother sets thee are neglected. I thought of thee, little bookworm, when I bought the volume."

Slowly Rebekah carried off the treasure, with many peeps between the leaves before she could leave it on the side table of solid, polished oak.

She saw that her father had taken the precaution to write both at the beginning and end of the volume "Benedictus Martin, his book, 1714," and she placed it with the score or so of soberly-bound volumes which formed the whole library of the family, except the great Bible which had a little table to itself in the farm kitchen.

How often had Rebekah read and re-read those few books! She loved the quiet best parlor, with its paneled walls, sanded floor, white linen curtains, and its corner cupboard with the small store of china and glass for certain occasions, the common table service being of pewter and horn.

What changes has time wrought! That best parlor is now the parlor of a farm bailiff. Modern gimcracks of all descriptions crowd the corner cupboard, photographic portraits and gorgeous oleographs hang on the paneled walls, and a cheap sewing machine has taken the place of Susannah Martin's dainty spinning wheel.

Many an evening during that busy summer did Becky steal away to her precious book. How fascinating it was to her; from Thomas Ellwood's schooldays, when, for his mischievous pranks, "he wore out more birch than most boys;" through his troubled youth, when for the cause of liberty of conscience he suffered cruel imprisonment. How he became reader to the blind poet, John Milton, and ventured to suggest to him that "Paradise Lost" should be followed by "Paradise Regained." His adventures while acting as escort to the fair heiress, Gulelma Springett, afterwards the wife of the founder of Pennsylvania; his deliberate wooing of Mary Ellis, and happy life with her; and even the laborious, and rather doggerel, poems which he wrote from time to time—all was delightful to the unsophisticated Becky.

Molly by no means approved of this absorption of her sister. She considered that studious habits were mere idleness, although she, as well as Becky, had been given the best education their parents could arrange for them at their remote farm.

Finding that no teasing would move her young sister, Molly resolved to administer a reproof in writing.

Taking advantage of Becky's absence, she having accompanied her mother on one of Susannah Martin's many errands among the sick and poor, Molly slipped into the best parlor, and taking a quill in her unaccustomed fingers, she proceeded to write in a neat, cramped hand, lengthways of the cover of the cherished new book, the words "Go to the ant, thou s—." But, just as she laboriously completed the letter s, a cheery voice said, "Well, this is something new, to find Molly among the scribblers! What art writing, my daughter?"

Molly started and blushed as the worthy yeoman looked over her shoulder, and read the unfinished sentence.

"A good admonition, truly, but Thomas Ellwood was no sluggard, nor is Molly Martin either, for I heard thy voice in the yard before four of the clock this morning. We have no sluggards here at Hunts Green that I know of, so why write it?"

"Well, father—of late it has seemed to me," said Molly, hesitating, "that Becky is growing into a little bit of one."

"And so thou scribbles in my new book, and quotes King Solomon to reprove her? I think that thou might leave the task of admonishing to thy good mother, who never neglects a needful reproof. But I have not seen any need. Rebekah is an industrious and thrifty maiden, if not quite such a fly-about as thou. What household work dost thou accuse her of neglecting?"

"It is not housework, father, but spinning. When Aunt Mary was here she got carpenter Simmons to make us each a fine dower-chest as her gift. She said we were to fill them as soon as possible with good linen, for every maid ought to lay up for the time when she may have no leisure to spin. Our flax field yielded so well last year that mother said we might have as much as we could spin at leisure times—and now Becky comes mooning in the parlor over this book, and will not spin a thread!"

"A store against the time that you are wedded, eh? But who knows whether you may not be two elderly maiden sisters, living together at Hunts Green with nothing to do but to spin?"

Molly looked rather taken aback, and then dimpled demurely, remembering a certain young farmer from the Surrey hills who was most ingenious in devising frequent errands to the house.

"But thou dost not object to our having the flax, father?" she said.

"No, certainly, I like you to be busy and thrifty; but do not tease Becky about it. She is three years younger than thee, and something of a child still—and do not finish thy text in the book—I like not such use of Bible words, although I have been tempted myself to alter a text when I hear too careful housewives talk of spinning, and say, 'A woman's life consisteth not in the abundance of linen which she possesseth.' Now get thy hood, and come out with me to see how the calves are faring in the five acres."

When the winter came the book was read aloud to the family gathered round the great wood fire, on which they chiefly depended for light for spinning and knitting, the reader being seated close to a home-made rush light which yielded but a feeble flame.

Benedictus sometimes nodded, but his wife found it intensely interesting, and even Molly enjoyed the reading, as she whirled the wheel and wound the linen yarn.

Her motive for industry was stronger now, for she was betrothed to the young farmer; but although he was a son-in-law after their own heart, her parents wished for a delay of a year or two before their young Molly should take upon herself the responsibilities of matronhood. So the dower-chest was filled to overflowing with good tablecloths, sheets and curtains, and even linen gowns for the summer; all the produce of that field on the farm which in summer waved its lovely blue blossoms in the sunshine, and is to this day called "the Flax Field."

Rebekah stayed with her parents for some years, a quiet, retiring maiden, but wonderfully efficient and kind-hearted, until her good qualities were discovered by a worthy and prosperous young man, who owned a flour mill, with a good dwelling-house beside it, on the banks of one of the small, sluggish rivers of Sussex.

Thither Rebekah consented to go, not without qualms at leaving her parents (for the new home was at the alarming distance of twenty miles from the old one), but they were still healthy and active, and had moreover an orphan niece who needed a home.

The last First-day before the marriage, as they were sitting quietly in the paneled parlor, Benedictus said to his daughter, taking up the cherished book, "Here, Becky, my child, take this with thee, and read it to thy Thomas. I bought it chiefly to please thee, although I wrote my name in it."

Rebekah took it gladly, and packed it among the lavender-scented linen in the big chest, which was now well filled, ready to go to the new home.

When she took it out, while unpacking and arranging her possessions, she laid it in her best parlor. Suddenly the thought struck her that, as it was now hers, she must write in it her new name and abode—yes, and she would add a confession of faith also, so that her new relations might know what Master she loved and followed.

So in large clear writing she made the inscription:—

"Rebekah Riekman is my name,
And England is my nation,
Barecomb is my dwelling-place,
And Christ is my salvation."

There it stands still, the ink brown and faded, in the quaint old book.

More than a century after the young bride brought it to her new home, her descendants having died or drifted away, there was a sale of old furniture at the mill house, and an old man who bought the books happened to recognize the names, and sent it—not to the great-great grand-children of Rebekah, but of Molly Martin.

The surname has died out, but the old farm, the old books, the antique silver spoons, and, above all, the inheritance of their good name, still remain to the descendants of Benedictus and Susannah Martin and their two daughters.—MAUDE ROBINSON, in Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

THE DUAL LOYALTY WHICH IS ONE.

This is written in our hearts, that God is to have His due, as well as Caesar his; and that God is to have His due in the first place, but Caesar after God, and in subjection to God. But if there be an absolute necessity put upon us by men (which they ought not to do), either of disobeying God, or Caesar, we do really believe that question of some of the apostles, in this case, to be very weighty, and worthy to be duly considered, "whether it be right in the sight of God, to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." For we cannot but obey the Lord our God in what He hath required and doth require of us. And truly if we should so do, great and dreadful woe would be upon our souls, and we should lose the enjoyment of God's presence, and the peace which passeth all understanding; which we cannot but value above our estates, liberties, or whatever outward thing we can enjoy or possess in this world, even above our very lives; yea, it were far better for every one of us to lose our lives in our faithful testimony to the true worship of God in Spirit and truth, which He hath taught us, and required us to practice and give our testimony to, than to be found unfaithful and disobedient to Him therein.

READING GAOL, the twelfth of the Seventh Month, 1670.

STATE COLLEGE.

State College, on a high plateau near Bellefonte, Pennsylvania, is providing free education to two thousand three hundred young men and two hundred young women under wholesome conditions, apart from the temptations of city life.

A large farm was purchased about fifty years ago, and the State supports this institution, which is increasingly popular and useful.

Robert Balderston and Joseph Elkinton recently visited the little group of Friends who are students here, and who are anxious to maintain a Friends' meeting, holding it every First-day evening at seven-thirty.

It was both a surprise and real satisfaction to meet with some thirty of these young people with their friends, and to realize a true silent waiting upon our Heavenly Father in spirit. The comfort of this occasion and the evidence of the sincere interest of those who are responsible for this meeting make a strong appeal to our membership in general and to Philadelphia Friends in particular. These young men and women, some of whom have realized the excellence of their Westown training, desire to maintain the spiritual standards of their Friendly education and they ought to be supported in their effort to gather about them those who have had fewer privileges, as well as to renew their own spiritual life. After the distinctive views and practices of Friends were set forth, there was opportunity as is usually provided for discussion on some serious subject—on this occasion it was on international relationships.

Dean Speckett introduced us to President Sparks, who was most cordial in inviting us to return in three months to meet with the whole student body—both socially and for religious service. Here is an open door in the midst of military training to proclaim the Gospel of good will.

We also visited Tunesassa Boarding School and found much to interest and encourage us in that worthy institution, now under the management of William and Mary Rhoads. We entertained the Indian children with European views on the screen, also having for the first time the company of a neighboring school, under the care of the Seventh-day Adventists.

Henry B. and Eliza F. Leeds were present and we thoroughly enjoyed visiting them in their new home at Steam-burg, N. Y.

Our whole work during the past month in holding meetings has left a sense of profound thankfulness that there are many who are increasingly opposed to the military spirit which has swept over our land, and who are ready to co-operate with any constructive effort to counteract this sentiment. There were at least one hundred of the more thoughtful citizens of Williamsport gathered in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium on the tenth inst., when the everlasting Gospel of Peace was preached with the demonstration of the Spirit. About half that number gathered in the Baptist Chapel in Wilkes-Barre, as also at the Pennsdale Meeting-house. There were six members of our Quarterly Meeting's Committee present at the latter.

The blessed fellowship that we experienced in this labor of love is no small part of the service and the discussions by the way will long remain as truly instructive. In this day of strenuous business there is too little attention given to those tender leadings of Christian love which will draw us aside to minister to the deeper needs of our fellow-men.

The soul has an incomparable value, and its true expressions and activity are found in awakening in others a sense of their true life in relation to the highest. It has been well said, "There is only one thing worthy of spiritual beings, and that is to construct, to redeem, to awaken in men's hearts the sense of their heritage as souls. This because it is an individual matter cannot be achieved by war; life is created by life; personality by personality. The spiritual can only be conveyed through a love that finds individual expression, through a charity that is superior to individual malice and resentment. We never truly overcome our enmity until we slay the enmity. We cannot slay enmity with enmity nor reduce our enemy to love by force. Mass methods are hopeless for this task of redeeming souls, and therefore for redeeming society."

FICTION AND THE JUVENILE MIND.

Adults—parents and teachers—feel obliged to regard some principles and practices of education as settled. In spite of this an endless line of children passes in procession and challenges these settled convictions. They are individual, these children, every one of them seemingly the exception to the general rule. One benefit at least results. The general governing law gets constant revision. It requires one program to-day and tomorrow we find that this program actually does violence to what we believe to be fundamental in the law. So even the world of adult ideas keeps moving—onward all the time, possibly some times upward. Perhaps no general law has had wider vogue, none affected courses of study and teaching methods more widely than the oracular declaration that "the child repeats the history of the race." Applied to this matter of fiction the law says in substance, "the child is an imaginative, romantic being until manhood unfolds, and no good can come from starving natures so endowed." The veteran educator-savant, G. Stanley Hall, settles the case by declaring "the tadpole's tail must not be cut off, it must be absorbed." Therefore "feed the child on fiction but be sure, of course, the fiction is the best." Unhappily there is no supreme court to say which is the best, but for twenty-five years past, curricula have been "enriched" with liberal additions of standard novels besides the stores of dramatic poetry. Our Friends' schools have taken different attitudes on this subject. A few have stood somewhat valiantly for the old order; some have followed the new afar off, others have embraced the full "prescribed requirements," and have thus added their experience to the fund that makes the capital of conferences of teachers of English now frequently reported in educational circles. Of these conferences and of the reports that express their conclusions one thing can perhaps safely be said. The dominant note is still one of challenge. "Are we," more than one gifted master exclaims, "on the right track?" In the pressure to discuss the use of the "syllabus," and to determine how far the teacher's analysis may safely guide the child this undertone may be suppressed, but eventually it will be much more in evidence. For the exertion required of teachers in the effort to put into the children the ideas which college examiners expect them to get out of these standard works is quite beyond reason. In some quarters already there has been open revolt.

This revolt, where it has occurred, may serve to disclose one important fact somewhat overlooked in the first onrush of enrichment of curricula. The great masterpieces of fiction, so-called, are written from the adult point of view—out of the fullness of adult experience—with the full intent of appealing to adult interests and of influencing them. Much of the highest social philosophy, not a little of the profoundest analysis of human life thus finds expression in these works. Now it is a commonplace of educational theory that one must have "interpreting ideas" to feel the appeal of any such writing. How can one get such interpreting ideas? Evidently by a full, rich experience in adult human life. The details of the argument built upon these assumptions might be greatly enlarged. This, however, is not written as an argumentative paper. Rather, it is an effort to note certain considerations that have some bearing on the general situation. One other such consideration may suffice to make this purpose clear. The skillfully-wrought novel focusses in what is called the dénouement. All the threads of interest are gathered together in one point of exciting climax. This is often so intense as to affect the nervous system seriously. Thus the dénouement in the "Last Days of Pompeii" and in the "Tale of Two Cities" has been known to put readers in bed from nervous shock. Such extreme cases are not cited save as illustrations of the tremendous power of such fiction-literature in the domain of excitement. So while the ethical quality of such reading is elusive the objectionable excitement quality is well-nigh unescapable. It is getting recognized as a serious toxic on the juvenile mind for which live teachers are seeking an antidote. Is there such an antidote, and if there is, can not our Friends' Schools be pioneers in making it available?

Whatever changes there may be from time to time in our view of period-psychology we must recognize that in dealing with the juvenile mind we have no more prominent element to consider than the heroic. We can not suppress this element. Can we offer any better intellectual food for it than is found in fiction-literature?

Is it not true that in meeting this need we should aim to get our youthful subjects out of the clouds, to plant their feet firmly on a world of reality and fact in human experience? No great time ago and before that for some centuries in succession "Plutarch's Lives" made this appeal to the right growth of the heroic. Perhaps we need not use this century-old material. Likely we had better not use it. But modern biography in abundant store with very good literary flavor awaits our hand. If we must have it quite up to date and popular there is "The Making of an American," "Up From Slavery," and

"The Promised Land." A very little wise guidance can turn this great field to the very best uses. And so the tadpole's tail will not be cut off!

But much more appealing in a way even than this field of biographical literature is the field of history. With Prescott and Motley and Irving and Parkman, and Froude and Green, what is left to desire in style and in every literary method to rival such resources?

Where is the heroic made more perfectly to meet the adolescent demand? We have seen a whole school fired with enthusiasm for this field of literature and with every step the youthful readers were acquiring from the world of fact new interpretive ideas for use in life or in further excursions into the field of pure literature as they reached adult experience. Nor are all the resources exhausted with these two alternatives. The field of science admits excursions at the hands of many masters that are full not alone of the thrills of heroic literature but rich also in the rock foundations of fact along with the noblest exercise of the imagination.

One implication may then be suggested in this brief summary of a perennially pressing subject. If the juvenile mind does not have the appetite developed for the three classes of literature which we have named there is small hope that it will ever figure largely as a resource in adult life. On the other hand, if it is necessary to know the best fiction-literature to get the highest conceptions of life and art, is not this more solid substratum which we wish to see laid in the youthful mind the best possible preparation for it? It may be said that biography, history and science, even on their heroic or romantic sides deal with adult conceptions. They do so, it is true, but generally do so in a specific way. The imaginative concepts of the fiction literature, on the other hand, are highly generalized even when specifically presented.

Can not our Friends' Schools from a wealth of tradition in restraint blaze a way out of a present situation that seems most unsatisfactory to not a few of those who are set to administer it? Can not our schools lead our children so that our Y. M. C. A.'s need not feel required to put so much energy into campaigns for "Better Books for Boys"?

A VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

THE RETURN.

To several of the visiting Friends it seemed imperative that they should reach their homes, or business, as speedily as possible after the close of the Yearly Meeting. In this prospect, however, we were confronted, at the first, with one of those anomalies of railroad service which one is almost tempted to believe are contrived to vex the traveler; for, though the way into Woodland is direct and convenient the way out over the S. B. A. L. is tedious—a difficulty most kindly met by Friends putting two automobiles at our service immediately upon the close of the meeting, to convey us to Ahsokie, a station seventeen miles distant on the Atlantic Coast Line (Norfolk and Wilmington branch) and sixty miles distant from the former place, at which we were expectant of arriving in time for the Baltimore boat leaving at 6:30 P. M.

Leave-taking of our many newly made Friends was therefore necessarily hasty. Words of parting were few, but hands were warmly grasped while hearts were full and eyes dimmed with tears as the thought came that the faces of some of these we should likely see no more in this world. So it was with feelings almost akin to envy that we recalled that passage in George Fox's Journal where in speaking of his notable visit to New England and of the great Yearly Meeting in Rhode Island, he says: "When this great general meeting was ended, it was somewhat hard for Friends to part, for the glorious power of the Lord, which was over all, and His blessed Truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together, that they spent two days in taking leave one of another, and of the Friends of the island; and then, being mightily filled with the presence and power of the Lord, they went away with joyful hearts to their various habitations, in the several colonies where they lived."

In leaving Woodland some Friends with kind forethought (it was now near two o'clock in the afternoon) passed to us a box lunch which later on was partaken of with hearty appreciation of this additional token of generous hospitality which we knew would have awaited us at many a well-loaded table could we have lingered.

The ride from Cedar Grove to the busy little town of Ahsokie consumed forty minutes, and being without "tire trouble" or other delaying incident we had on arrival about thirty minutes time to leisurely eat our luncheon and await the arrival of the train. To some this ride may have had little to offer by way of breaking the sameness in topography and all those features which go to the make-up of a sparsely-settled region of so vast an extent as that of which this forms but a meagre part. And yet as we rode along in so much comfort there was much to appeal to the eye in gladness; for, after all, it is the realization that the world in its created forms by sameness indicates unity of design and by the repetition of what affects us even remotely as human beings brings a certain quietness and assurance to the soul of the man open to receive them, which may even be found in the desert. And so again we greet with favor the accustomed sights of piney woodland seasoned with delicate touches of oak, gum, maple and holly; the little patches of cotton, peanuts, or southern corn, the small dwellings of the inhabitants, the picturesque groups of children with their contented ebon faces peering from the doorway, the ubiquitous hog leisurely removing himself from the roadway at the sound of the horn of our car, or indifferently engaged in foraging for mast in the adjoining forest, geese meandering the meadow, or turkeys strolling afield, the mule team with its driver, where white man and colored man vie with each other in the effort to draw from a none too generous soil their means of livelihood—these sights commingled, and touched and tempered by the subdued light of an autumnal afternoon, moved before our vision as in a great kaleidoscope wherein the common things of earth were transformed, intensified, and touched with new beauty before us.

With warm and appreciative handshake of farewell to the Carolina Friends who had conferred this last favor upon us we boarded the train and soon were rapidly moving northward and homeward. By taking this route the country traversed remained new to us, though partaking mostly of the characteristics already familiar—the sameness of woodland and bog, with here and there a small farm interspersed, with its accompaniment of dwelling with chimney at either end, varied perhaps at long distances with something more in the nature of a mansion, bespeaking old plantation days. We withstood the temptation to regard it all as too monotonous to be interesting and join the ordinary traveler in his mental diversions, or closing of eyes in the wish to dream of mountains. Rather did we remember the mental plight of poor Peter Bell in Wordsworth's poem of that name, and take warning:

"A primrose by a river's brim,
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more."

Rather, always in travel, let us cultivate that other disposition so well expressed in Shakespeare's lines:

"And then our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything."

Like Wordsworth's immortal daffodils still flash upon the "inward eye" the scarlet berries of the bitter sweet that grew in such profusion in the lowlands skirting the railroad on either side. At another point a herd of goats, at least twenty-five in number, feeding in a field, indicated a unique dairy farm in which that highly useful, but oft-bellitted creature, was assuming the rôle of the cow, so conspicuous by its absence in this section of the country.

Our only discomfort was the dust which permeated the train at every point where it might gain entrance, closed windows notwithstanding; an experience particularly offensive to the gentler sex of our party, to whom it came as a mild rebuke when it was remarked how very trifling was our discomfort in comparison with that experienced by those two noble young women, zealous servants of the Lord, Catharine Payton and Mary Peasley, who almost in girlhood days traversed these lonely forests, forded these rivers, and subjected themselves to hunger and cold and wet, amid the wild beasts—the wolf, the bear and the panther, whose ravenous cries could be heard in the night season, and all for the joy of spreading among a rude and godless people the glad tidings of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

These are the words of Catharine Payton: "The 26th (Second Month, 1754) we left the province of North Carolina, and came into Virginia, and the Lord was pleased to cause His peace so to rest upon our spirits, that we were renewedly convinced we were moving in His counsel. We had traveled upwards of a thousand miles in North Carolina, and been preserved through various jeopardies and trials, to the praise of His adorable name." Can we doubt that this beautiful mission was not worth while, or that it did not proceed from the heavenly vision and Divine call, when, from the midst of their many dangers Mary Peasley could write thus to a relative: "I have sat down by a brook in the woods, at my Indian corn bread and drank water out of a calabash, with more constant peace of mind than many who were served in plate, etc.; and at night have slept contentedly in my riding clothes on a bed hard enough to make my bones ache, and the house so open on every side as to admit plenty of light and air.

The path we rode through was exceedingly narrow, and sometimes so closed as not to allow a footstep to be seen before me, and caught by boughs on one hand, and bushes on the other, obliged to stoop very low, lest my head or eyes should be hurt."

(To be concluded.)

A MOMENT IN THE MORNING.

A moment in the morning, ere the cares of day begin,
Ere the heart's wide door is open for the world to enter in;
Ah, then, alone with Jesus, in the silence of the morn,
In heavenly sweet communion let your duty-day be born.
In the quietude that blesses with a prelude of repose,
Let your soul be soothed and softened as the dew revives the rose.

A moment in the morning, take your Bible in your hand,
And catch a glimpse of glory from the peaceful promised land;
It will linger still before you when you seek the busy mart,
And like flowers of hope will blossom into beauty in your heart.

The precious words, like jewels, will glisten all the day,
With a rare, effulgent glory, that will brighten all the way.
When comes a sore temptation and your feet are near a snare,
You may count them like a rosary and make each one a prayer.

A moment in the morning—a moment, if no more—
Is better than an hour when the trying day is o'er.
"Tis the gentle dew from heaven, the manna for the day;
If you fail to gather early—alas! it melts away.
So, in the blush of morning, take the offered hand of love,
And walk in heaven's pathway, and the peacefulness thereof.

—ARTHUR LEWIS TUBBS.

THE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE—THE TWO SIDES.

Supporters of the League to Enforce Peace frankly accept the use of force as essential in the present state of international relations. Life is an amalgam of the spiritual and material in varying proportion—but at no point can we or ought we to dispense altogether with physical force. National law provides for coercion of the evil individual will; and there is need for the same principle in at least as great a measure in dealing with the collective will, which is on a lower rather than a higher plane of spiritual development than the individual. Coercion by international society for the sake of order is still justified by results; it is also good economy, as police force is better than lynch law. Force is painfully present to-day; and the means of destruction grows apace. Can we not control and steer it into right channels? Shall it become the instrument of justice, suppressing aggression; or continue to subvert anarchy, the weapon of fear? Idealists may realize their dreams in the end, but our generation asks for some measure of security now. For 2000 years the politicians have swept on, majestically indifferent to the idealists. They represent plain men, who grasp concrete facts more readily than ideals. We have to understand such men, and help them to visualize the idea of international society by embodying it in an institution. There is no desire to increase or perpetuate the use of force; on the contrary, the aim of the League is to diminish it as far as possible, welcoming disarmament and making reduction easier by removing fear. The problem is one of practical politics. Treaties have been broken in the past. Trust is not likely to be at a premium after the war. Will States enter more or less readily into international agreements if they are backed by the sanction of force? And having entered, will they be more or less likely to abide by decisions? The League supplies the touch of reality required. Peace is no longer a misty ideal; at last it begins to mean something. The use of force is contemplated only for the coercion of the defaulting nation which, after joining the League, has refused to submit its cause to arbitration or conciliation. The principle of delay, so valuable for the steadying of public opinion, is introduced. Only in the most serious circumstances would a State decide on war after a period for deliberation; and in doing so in defiance of the concert of nations, either before or after arbitration, it would incur the gravest responsibility. Indeed, if a sufficient number of States joined the League, it is believed that war would become extremely improbable.

The thoroughgoing pacifist, on the other hand, has a lurking fear of the League. He has indeed been preaching the ideal for centuries, and although he has never despaired of the result, he is doubtful of its achievement by automatic machinery. To begin with, he thoroughly dislikes the phrase "To Enforce Peace." Its appeal is to that very passion for domination which is the cause of wars. When, as often happens in America, the verb is underlined or printed in red ink, he feels justification for his constitutional antipathy. When armament manufacturers support the League, when it is made the motive for "Preparedness," and openly threatens the Central Powers, his suspicions are aroused. The tendency of the League to perpetuate belief in force as the ultimate motive for right behavior is the negation of all he lives by. His methods involve a change of heart; a new condition of mind, and in spite of all that has happened, he believes in them still. Such changes can never be accomplished by physical force; but the fields that he has been sowing may be ready as never before for the reaping. There is no such thing as the "criminal" or the "Peace-loving" nation; in each there are pacifist and militarist elements, and just as in the case of the complex individual, we should appeal to the good rather than coerce the evil. The dangers of the latter system are becoming evident in our national treatment of crime, where already the ultimate sanction is moral. The poison virus which sometimes perverts a nation cannot be removed by war; there are other and better remedies, which instead of trying to control, seek to eliminate the motive to strife. The right spirit of international goodwill was growing before the war. We must encourage this, concentrate upon its promotion, and infuse it into governments. When once there is a creative vision of right human relations, there will be no need for machinery to prevent resort to arms. But apart from these somewhat fundamental differences on the ethical plane, there are political considerations which also make the many pacifists hesitate to support the League.

By throwing the emphasis away from the moral sanction, and placing it upon the material, not only is disarmament delayed, but appeal to the ideal is hindered, and fresh stimulus given to the greed of armament rings at the very moment when confidence in the efficacy of physical force in the settlement of differences has been severely shaken, when the whole world is sick of war and anxious to be shown a remedy. The League brings militarism into countries so far free from its curse; and even if it is introduced in the interests of law rather than anarchy, many pacifists believe there is a third and better way. Without international control of armaments (which is generally recognized to be impracticable at present) it is doubtful whether armaments maintained for such purposes as the League proposes would be confined thereto. Instead of limiting the power of irresponsible ministers, control is placed in the hands of the reactionary executives which have plunged Europe into war. The Pacifist is not so sanguine as to expect that force can immediately and completely be eliminated. But there are those who fear that its incorporation as a sanction in international agreements is a retrograde step. To say beforehand: "The treaty we will make shall commit us to war—all of us—in certain circumstances which we cannot now foresee," would lead to intrigue, powerful groupings, and continuous scares. Local conflagrations would inevitably become world-wide wars, and the fabric of future international understanding would be imperiled.

Finally, in addition to hesitation about the use of such machinery at all, there is grave doubt as to whether it would work in practice and the breakdown of the sanction might involve a serious setback to the cause of arbitration and conciliation.—From The Friend (London).

CONFERENCE AT MEDIA.

Following out a concern expressed in Eleventh Month, Concord Quarterly Meeting held a Conference for its Younger Friends on the afternoon and evening of Twelfth Month 16th. Over one hundred were present, nearly all of them Younger Friends.

In opening the Conference Frances T. Rhoads expressed the desire of the committee in charge to bring the younger people closer together and to encourage in them loyalty to their own meetings.

George L. Jones, the speaker of the afternoon, dwelt inspiringly on the great work which lies before the present generation, work which must be pursued in new and different ways and under changed conditions, but also in the light and strength of consecrated lives which have gone before.

A helpful meeting for worship followed this address.

After a supper and pleasant social hour came the evening meeting at which representatives from the Monthly Meetings spoke on "What We Can Do for Our Meetings." The scheduled speakers were: Norris Scott, from Concord; Louella Nolan, from Goshen; Stephen M. Trimble, from Chester; Robert Maris, from Wilmington; Emma H. Taylor, from Birmingham, and George Hallet, from Lansdowne.

While these papers varied remarkably in the thoughts expressed, each showed the spirit of readiness for service. One speaker had seen and valued the effect of Bible Study, another spoke of the right use of gifts. A business man's contribution was that "we get out of our meetings just what we put into them." The need of cultivation of our social gift was emphasized and the problem was also presented of how best to draw those outside our membership into an understanding of Friends and their method of worship. This question was in part answered by the last speaker who felt that a group or groups of young people, Friends and others, organized to think and worship together, might help to solve this difficulty. These papers were followed by general discussion. The advantages of organization were urged by one person, while another pointed out the great good which comes from individual concern. Another wished that we might think out our position and beliefs so that we should be able to speak clearly to others of that which we believed ourselves. There was emphasized the power which is in a group of young Friends meeting together for worship who have the courage to speak the messages which they believe are given to them and especially in the effect which this may have on other young people meeting with these.

Lack of time prevented much discussion of any one subject, nevertheless we came away with much food for thought and a strengthened sense of fellowship.

NEWS ITEMS.

PEACE COMMITTEE.—At the Twelfth Month meeting of the Friends' Peace Committee among other important reports submitted was that of the Committee on Governmental Relations. The effort had been made to interest the Carnegie Peace Foundation in the project mentioned a month ago to finance a deputation of Mexico teachers on a tour of inspection to United States schools, but under present disturbed conditions it was felt that the project would be misinterpreted and fail in the purpose proposed.

Andres Osuna, Director of Public Instruction in Mexico, had expressed much interest in the suggested visit and said that he could secure a delegation of about twenty men and women to visit the United States.

As the long vacation period in the Mexican school year occurs during the winter, it would be impossible to secure a larger company in the midst of the active session.

Report was made by the Literature Committee that an edition of twenty-five thousand copies of the military training leaflet had been printed. Ten thousand copies of these have already been purchased by other organizations. Partial reprints of the leaflet, reducing the number of pages forty to sixteen, also had been ordered. The Committee hopes to distribute the leaflet widely to educators and legislators.

In this connection THE FRIEND would again suggest that probably no better avenue at present is open to the average Peace-worker than to procure this pamphlet and place it where it will be likely to be read. The make-up of the pamphlet is such as to arrest attention, and the many prominent authorities quoted are calculated to call forth more than a passing comment. The pamphlet may be secured in small or large quantities at the Peace Rooms, No. 394 Arch Street. The cost is almost nominal, but should this stand in the way of any one who desires to distribute it, the Association will furnish a limited number free.

The Committee is considering the preparation of a brief summary of the arguments against military training and of a bibliography on the subject for use by debating teams of schools and colleges.

The chairman of the Committee on Churches and Schools reported the issuance of a letter to young men of military age throughout our Yearly Meeting.

The Committee is waiting to see a draft of a model physical training bill to be prepared shortly by the American Union Against Militarism, as a substitute for bills advocating distinctly military training. If the physical training bill proves valuable, the Committee on Churches and Schools will probably be able to co-operate with the Committee on Governmental Relations in getting it before the legislatures of our own and other States.

Various members of the Committee have made addresses on Good Citizenship in public schools and plans have been made for distributing literature in our Friends' schools. Addresses have also been given before meetings of workmen and others on the subject of Peace.

Joseph Elkinton made two suggestions which were referred without discussion to the Executive Committee:

1. That plans be formulated and presented to our government for some form of agricultural or otherwise pacific service in which pacifists may engage in time of war as an alternative to compulsory military service.

2. That a field secretary be appointed by this Committee to travel in the interests of the cause—such a secretary to make speeches on Peace before schools, clubs, granges and other such organizations and to organize Peace sentiment especially in isolated neighborhoods.

A letter was read from Edward Backhouse, acting secretary for the Committee for Sufferings of London Yearly Meeting, to prepare for a post-bellum Conference representing Friends throughout the world. He asked for the name of a Philadelphia Friend with whom to correspond on this subject, and John B. Garrett was appointed to represent us.

The "London Epistle" for 1916 is a remarkable document. It was copied in THE FRIEND soon after its publication in London. The English Committee in charge of its distribution reported that 82,000 copies had been distributed, the normal circulation being 35,000. A reprint had been received at the home office which had been widely circulated in West China, and some American Yearly Meetings which had asked for large supplies had been advised that it would be more convenient for them to reprint.

MANY FRIENDS will recollect the report made by Jane Addams of her interviews with the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of Europe, after the Women's Conference at The Hague; and especially the account of the visit to one unnamed Premier who, in reply to the ladies' suggestion that perhaps their mission would seem to him very foolish, struck the table and exclaimed, "Foolish? Not at all! These are the first sensible words that have been uttered in this room for ten months."

He said: "That door opens from time to time and people come in and say, 'Mr. Minister, we must have more men, we must have more ammunition, we must have more money. We cannot go on with this war without more of something else.' At last the door opens and two people walk in and say, 'Mr. Minister, why not settle by means of negotiations instead of by fighting? They are the sensible ones.'"

Writing in the Manchester Guardian of Tenth Month 30th, Lady Courtney of Penwith mentions the interesting fact that the Premier whose words were thus quoted was the lately assassinated Count Stuerghk.

The present membership of the Yearly Meeting that meets at Guilford, N. C., is 8,322. A movement is soon to be started to cancel the indebtedness of Guilford College and to increase the endowment to $500,000.

The following sentences from a letter which we have been privileged to read from the military prison in Berlin (Militar Gewarsum Moabit) are of interest. The writer is an American detained for political reasons.—[Eds.].

"I do not find anything cheerful in this situation [of our soldiers going to Mexico]. I hope they will make friends with the Mexicans and return to their peaceable occupations! . . . President Taft's idea of an international tribunal endowed with powers to put down war is a good one, but such a tribunal could only operate through moral force. The moment it resorted to any other power in the nature of police power, it would abdicate its mission and be a creator of war. . . . One would think with the sublime traditions of the Bible and our religion before us we would have the material at hand for the construction of a world-wide democracy, pledged to fraternity, peace and liberty."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The following in regard to Haverford College is from a New York paper: "An interesting feature of this year's enrollment is the fact that the sixty-one freshmen come from forty-one different schools. Westtown School, of Westtown, Pa., sent five, the largest number from a single school."

The New York City Safety First Association, in a contemplated publicity campaign, will distribute 300,000 safety first booklets, outlining the don'ts laid down for the guidance of the average careless citizen, mostly owners of motor cars; will post up in prominent houses 50,000 posters, and show in the motion-pictures of the city over 1,000 lantern slides and motion-picture films illustrating how carelessness and thoughtlessness leads to the loss of life and limb.

GENERAL.—The total amount contributed by the American people for Armenian and Syrian relief from the beginning of the campaign was $2,018,902.98. The sum seems large, but is pitifully small compared with the ability of the givers or the need of the recipients. It is less than two cents apiece for each of us.

The school children of Washington, D. C., prompted by the Washington Star, collected 211,643 pounds, or more than 100 tons of old papers, which was sold for $1,247.50, which is to be used for equipping the school playgrounds.

A dispatch from Washington says: "More than $1,000,000,000 net income from operations was made by the railroads of the country during the year now closing. The huge total is the peak of prosperity in railroad operations, and stands more than one-third higher than the total of 1913, hitherto the banner year."

Four thousand New York City college boys helped to clear the snow from the streets after the late storm, filling the ranks of the city shovelers depleted by the wave of prosperity. A continuance of the arrangement, by reason of the same conditions, would have its social as well as economic advantages.

There were 23,500,000 persons attending schools of some kind in the United States in 1916, according to estimates of the United States Bureau of Education. Of the 706,000 teachers, 169,000 were men and 537,000 women. The number of men teachers has increased very slightly since 1900.

A project in reclamation and colonizing on a scale never before attempted in North Carolina is set in motion by the purchase of 45,000 acres of swamp land near Belhaven in the eastern part of the State, by investors incorporated as the Norfolk Southern Farms Company. Nearly two hundred miles of ditches are to be dug, and the cost of drainage into the Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds will apparently not be great. The land is in the famous "Black Belt", regarded as part of the richest farming land in the country.

Delegates from many colleges compose the second national convention of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association in Lexington, Ky. Well-known Americans have consented to speak at the various sessions. This prohibition association is now reaching students in nearly three hundred American colleges and training them for leadership in the fight against liquor.

In New York City fifty-two schools, with 150,000 pupils, will try the Gary plan and $7,000,000 have been appropriated for the demonstration under the direction of William Wirt.

School children in all public and private schools in every city and hamlet in America are being marshaled into one great army of thrift workers under the guidance of the National Education Association and the American Society for Thrift. Each county superintendent in the United States is receiving an urgent request from the National Education Association asking him to assume the leadership and perfect the organization in his county.

FOREIGN.—A Christian Endeavor convention recently in the Mutki Mission of India was entertained largely by the beloved Pandita Ramabai, who herself prepared and served the food for two hundred native delegates from a distance.

If the land level of Holland continues to sink, there is danger of the subsidence becoming so great that, despite all the progress of engineering science, it will be impossible to continue the present ceaseless struggle with the waters. That is the view expressed before the Geological Mining Society for Holland and its colonies by Professor Molegraaf, of the Polytechnic University of Delft, the foremost Dutch geological authority.

With the majority of the Danish voters two to one in favor of selling the Danish West Indies to the United States, in accordance with the treaty of purchase signed by the two governments last summer, the acquisition of the islands seems assured.

As the result of the scarcity of male workers in Germany due to war the number of women employed in industries covered by the sick and death benefit societies has risen from 3,506,164 in 1914 to 4,793,472 in 1916, according to data furnished by these organizations.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA, will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M. Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.30, 8.21 A. M., 2.48 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

"Therefore, all wait patiently upon the Lord, whatsoever condition you be in; wait in grace and truth that comes by Jesus; for if you do so, there is a promise to you, and the Lord God will fulfill it in you."—George Fox's Journal, Vol. 1, p. 75.

TRADITIONALISM,

It is an interesting and somewhat curious fact that the classic expression in Quaker literature in regard to traditionalism belongs to the seventeenth century. Thus Samuel Bownas [born 1676] records: "A traditional Quaker, thou comest to meeting as thou went from it the last time, and goest from it as thou came to it, but art no better for thy coming; what wilt thou do in the end?" Evidently some twentieth century failings had a far away origin! We might not be rash in concluding they are inherent in human nature, rather than products of our special profession of Christianity!

Perhaps it is not an exaggeration to say that modern Quakerism has shown no greater zeal in any direction than in that of repudiating traditionalism. So ardent has it often been that the fine discrimination between traditions and traditionalism has been lost, and a great store of precious traditions have been thrown away to the incalculable harm of personality as well as of injury to our corporate character. Those who look on us thoughtfully from the outside marvel at our spendthrift character in this direction, and sometimes question us as to the meaning of radical changes that obscure our identity.

In any right assessment of our inheritance it is not true that well-established traditions form an important part? And is it at all necessary that we fall into traditionalism if we make an honest effort to preserve (for use of course) our well-defined traditions? Possibly some brief inquiry as to how traditions may be maintained will serve in part to answer these questions. Evidently as individual Christians there is to be recognized at once a world of difference between traditions that are put into us by principle and those that are put on us by mere practice. We say that this world of difference is to be recognized, but we should hasten to add that it is very easy to fail in this recognition of difference, so that the course of least resistance is to join in a wholesale condemnation of traditions and traditionalism in one breath. It is not our part to indict modern Quakerism of having fallen into this ditch. Our utmost desire would be to have each of us question ourselves in this matter.

The putting of tradition into us by principle is by no means a worn-out subject. Were we each one to apprehend it rightly we might prove ourselves something more than fruit-bearing branches. We might become active purveyors of great good to our generation. Our failure, even when we have regarded traditions as precious, has not unlikely been due to the fact that we have fallen short of an understanding of the root from which the godly tree has originally grown.

Regarding our Christian traditions as fruit of a godly principle, can we easily define that principle so as to relieve the subject of perplexing subtleties? Otherwise we should fail to make any very substantial claim for it, for the requirements of the Christian life at the hands of the author of Christianity were always simple. In a somewhat classic work of Hugh Black's, "Culture and Restraint," the whole case is put so clearly that we venture to appropriate our memory of his argument as a contribution to the two questions we have propounded. Let us repeat the questions. Are not our traditions worth preserving? Can we not preserve them without becoming traditionalists? Considered broadly, then, and following Hugh Black, we may say that in the main Christian traditions are the fruit of the great disciplinary principle of restraint. Just why there should be such general confusion of thinking as to regard culture and restraint as antipodes it is difficult to explain. If we regard culture as the goal of effort then restraint is one of the means of attaining the goal. Is it the best means? A modern writer (Charles Rann Kennedy) says: "Beneath the bonds of an almost unthinkable discipline, lies complete and absolute freedom." Now freedom and restraint certainly seem like opposites. We need the keen analysis of writers such as we have quoted to see that such is not the case. The revolt against restraint and discipline is due to a misapprehension. The highest culture, even if we set culture as a goal, comes by a process of restraint.

In the Society of Friends, if we view the matter historically, our best traditions are certainly fruits of the principle of restraint. In material matters this restraint produces moderation. In intellectual lines perhaps its fruit is fairly characterized by the word refinement. In the spiritual realm it keeps our feet on the earth in a genuine practice of brotherhood rather than in mere Quietism.

Friends in war territory have heard a new call to all these restraints. Nothing seems more clear to them than that society will have to submit to a reconstruction after the war. If by compulsion, this reconstruction will be accepted from the outside. Shall we not rally to our original standard and accept restraints now as they are opened to us by the Spirit of Truth? If faithful Christians [Friends] we have been doing so in some degree, but there is evidence enough at every hand that this great principle has been too much obscured. Even our vaunted "living within the bounds of our circumstances" has often been a snare. To not a few in these days such living requires little regard to restraint, so large are their material resources.

It may be in the order of Providence to give us a new start by requiring us to return to first principles. We are evidently in this life not always beyond the need of a process of punishment or persecution if we prefer that term. It can hardly be, however, that the Divine economy is limited in its resources to this process. We limit ourselves to it if we fail to apprehend the inspirational side of restraint. The Captain of our salvation was made perfect by suffering, but He practiced perfection by choosing the Father's will, by being sanctified (in restraints) for our sakes. In the era to come, which we are starting to make, let us be marked with all the worthy traditions of restraint in our heritage, because we have embraced the principle that produces them.

For "THE FRIEND."

"Then, welcome each rebuff
That turns earth's smoothness rough,
Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand, but go!
Be our joys three-parts pain!
Strive, and hold cheap the strain;
Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the throe!"

There is always the necessity for stimulating our lives with the important truth that Browning put into these lines. Though nearly every condition that each generation meets changes almost as we watch, there are constant basic laws that always guide the truly successful lives. It is fundamental then that these laws should be fixed very firmly in our minds if we would serve our generation well.

It would seem that a great part of our time is engaged in making smooth places for the feet of those we love. And surely it should be so in as far as love and unselfish thoughtfulness can make this possible. But we must remember that down pillows may smother when we had only meant them for comfort. We must welcome hard things for our children as we would welcome them for ourselves. It is the privation, the call for endurance, the necessity for change that "bids nor set nor stand, but go!"

We hold out eager hands and call—"Give! give!" for the institutions and causes we love so well. But very often I feel like saying to the fine men and brave women among us who have years of successful life behind them, "Keep the generous gift of money, but give us out of the treasures of your minds and spirits the secret of those gifts beyond price, courage, simplicity, endurance, the ability to make wrong right, failure success. Kindle into flame the spark in all of us that we may live as you have." And then I realize that this is something which no man can give. It is experience and may only come with life. Yet can it come to children, girls, boys, men and women the rough places of whose lives we have made smooth, whose stimulus to activity has been dulled by paltry gold?

It is an axiom among us that our best men and women are those who have overcome the greatest difficulties. It is not the difficulties that we desire, but the zeal that overcame them. What matters the stress and strain, when the desire, the will, the power to strive is back of it?

When we consider our educational institutions, the first requisite is not in bricks and mortar, but in the presence of the fine spirit of overcoming. I think I would rather have the young child of my heart among rough, uncouth surroundings, that would perhaps grate harshly upon ears polite, than to submit his pliant spirit to the place of faultless equipment where the "teach me if you can" boy and the self-conscious girl complaining of petty or imaginary troubles predominated. O, but you say we cannot expect perfection of children. They have to grow through a variety of unpleasant stages. True! but who was it who taught himself at night by words cut on slabs of wood by the light of pine knots? Abraham Lincoln would have been no greater, perhaps would not have been at all if he had been given the luxuries the boys and girls we know have. I do not disapprove of luxuries per se. Indeed, they appeal to everyone strongly as by-products. We are all working for ease and happiness. It is only when spirits are in the making that luxuries may be a positive menace.

The factory where the man or woman of power is turned out is a place of hard work for body, mind and spiritual faculties. Every resource must be developed to the full. It is a place where there must be first a sound body, then a sane mind, and finally an alert soul. Without this last the others are dross. It is a place of hardship and difficulty, since there must be room for the growth of the spirit of overcoming. It must not be a place of luxury. The hard, fine, lasting qualities do not thrive in hothouses, but in the open air where difficulty, discouragement, defeat and always victory await the valiant soul.

VISIT TO NORTH CAROLINA.

At length our interest is stirred by the sight of a large body of water extending as far as the eye can reach to the right and left, and over which the train was beginning to cross. Thrilled by the unexpected sight of so majestic a stream, our curiosity was at once aroused to learn its name, and soon kindly met by a fellow passenger's informing that what we beheld was the Chowan River, which empties into the Albemarle Sound, some thirty miles distant. So, again, what was hitherto but a name fixed in the chambers of memory in the geography class of childhood days, was, as in a moment, transformed into substance, and as such to vitalize our interest and as Friends, to visualize again our past history. The river we are crossing is the Maccomscock of George Fox's Journal, down which, having left their horses behind, "Overweared with travel," he and his companions came in a canoe until they reached a certain Hugh Smith's house, where the people of other persuasions came to see them, and many of whom "received them gladly." Thus we see, though a country still sparsely settled, there were scattered along these streams and amid these forest glades a number of people already settled by the middle of the seventeenth century. Some of the most interesting pages in the journals of the early Friends who traveled here in the cause of the Gospel, are those which narrate the thrilling experiences which came to them as they moved about, and as Fox says in one place, "A great openness there was; the sound of Truth spread abroad, and a good savor in the hearts of the people; the Lord have the glory forever!" Following Edmundson, Burnyeat and Fox (the last in 1672), came in 1698, Thomas Story in obedience to the vision that came to him, when riding alone one evening in Cumberland, Eng. He says: "My heart was greatly tendered before the Lord; and the Word of the Lord opened in me, saying, 'Behold, my visitation cometh over the western parts of the world, towards the sunseting in the time of winter.'" With what interest, then, do we follow him, when five years later we find him thus situated—"Next morning we went towards North Carolina through the wilderness, and there being no house in all the way, about the middle of it we made a great fire by the side of a brook, and ate some bread and cheese which Nathan Newby carried in his wallet, and drank of the brook, and were well refreshed and content."

To quote one instance more of the joy in service, the implicit confidence in God, even when surrounded by difficulties, and in peril of their lives, let us turn to the Journal of Thomas Chalkley, who in 1703 visited these parts, engaged in what he termed "a labor of love": "One day going out of our canoe through a mash, I trod on a rattlesnake, which is accounted one of the most poisonous snakes, but it only hissed at me, and did no harm. This was one deliverance among many, which the Lord, by His providence, wrought for me; and I bless His holy name for all His mercies. In going to and coming from this place (the Pamlico River) we lay two nights in the woods, and I think I never slept better. It was the eighth hour in the evening when I laid down on the ground one night, my saddle being my pillow, at the root of a tree, and it was four o'clock in the morning when they called me. When I awoke, I thought of Jacob's ladder on the way to Padan Aram, when he saw the holy vision of angels, with the ladder whose top reached to heaven. Very sweet was the love of God to my soul that morning, and the dew of the everlasting hills refreshed me. I went on my way praising the Lord, and magnifying the God of my salvation."

With these things before us, can we not turn to Psalm xc: 13, and read again with freshness those words of God speaking to us across the centuries—"Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet"; or to the assurance given with the Divine commission, Luke x: 18—"Behold, I give you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you."

As the sun sank to the west that afternoon long to be remembered, setting aglow the heavens with colors all crimson and gold, and touching and glorifying with its waning light the distant sea of pines, so billowy, soft and green, or the oaks, standing rigid, and sear and bronze, upon a fast receding horizon, is it a wonder that seats were turned to watch this splendor of the departing day, and to drink deep of that fountain of mystery which led the Psalmist to exclaim: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handiwork; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." But now our backs are turned upon another scene no less wonderful—

"For, clear, o'er the eastern wold,
The full moon hath risen!
Stream and forest—all we behold,
Transfigured lies—a land elysian."

At length Portsmouth is again reached, where, leaving the train, we enter a transfer boat for Norfolk, a novel and primitive-looking affair—a sort of scow with seats under cover, and arranged to accommodate freight and passengers alike, as was instanced by the reappearance in our midst of a large bucket of eggs with which we had made acquaintance while awaiting the train at Ahsokie.

As we moved through the harbor in the darkening dusk of the evening, the evidences of a great and growing commerce at this port again impressed us. Glistening white, and rising like a fairy palace out of the dark water, with her many cabin lights aglow from deck to deck and stem to stern, we spy the "Old Bay Liner" Virginia—destined to be our home for the night. Soon we are ensconced in comfortable quarters for repose en route to Baltimore. The kind weather genre which had followed us throughout our journey still continued with us. Clear was the sky above; calm lay the great expanse of waters through which our vessel floated. But not so always in this region. One of the quaintest bits of humor in all George Fox's Journal refers to an experience quite contrary. Here is the entry:

"On the first of the Eleventh Month (First Month 1, 1672) we sailed again. The wind being against us, we made but little headway, and were fain to get to shore at Point Comfort, where yet we found but small comfort. For the weather was so cold that though we made a good fire in the woods to lie by, the water that we brought for our use was frozen near the fireside. We made to sea again next day; but the wind being strong, and against us, we advanced but little. We were glad to get to land again, and traveled about to find some house where we might buy provisions, for our store was spent. That night also we lay in the woods; and so extremely cold was the weather, the wind blowing high, and the frost and snow being great, that it was hard for some of us to abide it."

Yet, amidst so much discomfort, doubtless this great and good man was thinking, as he expresses in another place when experiencing the extremes of our climate,—“But the power of the Lord is the same in all, is over all, and doth reach the good in all; praised be the Lord forever!”

Loath to turn in for the night, long time did we gaze upon the starry heavens above, with the attendant light of the full moon; all these vying with the lesser lights along shore. Was that not a transcendently beautiful thought expressed by Hartley Coleridge, who when a little boy riding towards London in the evening, exclaimed to his mother, “Oh, I know what the stars are! They are lights that have been good on earth, and have gone up to heaven.”

“Kind nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep,” was in large measure our portion during the night that followed. We awoke as the gray dawn was stealing over the Chesapeake. We heard the pleasing sound of lapping waters from our swiftly moving vessel, now and then broken by the melancholy tones of the bell buoys, now near, now far away, marking shoal water. Already we had passed the mouth of the Patapsco, and by the time we had hastily dressed our boat was entering her dock in Baltimore.

Our return throughout had been blessed with happy memories of newly-made friends in the Southland, and joyful moments in the house of prayer, of evening firesides with encircling faces of men, women and children, who in the midst of their daily toil are striving to gather the earnest of things Divine.

WALTER L. MOORE.

WHAT HAVE WE DONE TO-DAY?

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give our gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak the words of love and cheer;
But what did we speak to-day?

We shall be so kind in the afterwhile,
But what have we been to-day?
We shall bring to each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought to-day?
We shall give to truth a grander birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth,
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth;
But whom have we fed to-day?

We shall reap such joys in the by and by,
But what have we sown to-day?
We shall build us mansions in the sky,
But what have we built to-day?
‘Tis sweet in idle dreams to bask,
But here and now do we our task?
Yes, this is the thing our souls must ask,
“What have we done to-day?”

—NIXON WATERMAN, in New York Magazine.

How to WORSHIP.—Over the entrance to the little parish church at Hawarden, England, where William Ewart Gladstone worshipped, are inscribed these directions, which are suggestive for any worshipper.

“On your way to church. On your way to the Lord's house, be thoughtful, be silent, or say but little, and that little good. Speak not of other men's faults; think of your own, for you are going to ask forgiveness. Never stay outside; go in at once; time spent inside should be precious.

“In church. Bow down very humbly and pray. Spend the time that remains in prayer. Remember the awful presence into which you have come. Do not look about to discover who are coming in, nor for any other cause. It matters not to you what others are doing; attend to yourself. Fasten your thoughts firmly on the holy service; do not miss one word. This needs a severe struggle; you have no time for vain thoughts. The blessed Spirit will strengthen you if you persevere.”

A NEW YEARLY MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of Friends in Japan met this year in Eleventh Month from the 23rd to the 26th, in the town of Tsuchiura, and was, we believe, a real step forward in the direction of establishing a permanent body of Friends in Japan. As long as the continued existence or the activities of Friends in this country depend on us who have come from a foreign country, so long is Quakerism an exotic plant in Japan, and its future growth and extension limited. To carry the figure a little further, it must be taken out of the hot-house of foreign care, and be hardened by the cold and winds of difficulties that will beset independent existence before it can hope to become indigenous.

This thought has been very much in the hearts of the Friends' Foreign Missionary Committee for some time, and over a year ago the Japanese Friends were informed that the Executive Committee which had hitherto, as an organ of the Mission, carried the burden of the local meetings and shaped the general policy, would be dissolved in one year's time. During that time Friends were asked to make special efforts to establish Monthly Meetings for business and discipline in their respective localities. In accordance with this, two Monthly Meetings have been established, one in Tokyo and the other in Minato, a seashore town. Lack of faith in their own ability and other difficulties delayed the movement in the four other possible places, and it was with some misgivings that we looked forward to the Annual Meeting as the time appointed for the change in organization. However, an editorial in the Ai No Tomo (Japanese Friend) issued a few days before the sessions began, urging that steps be taken at this Annual Meeting to set up a real Yearly Meeting of Friends in Japan, gave fresh hope, for it represented Japanese thought. Again on the eve of the Meeting, the Friends of Tsuchiura decided to present a request to be recognized as a Monthly Meeting. With these two good auspices, we began the Meeting in hope and trust.

It was not a large body that gathered, perhaps sixty at most, but they represented all of the local meetings, and for the most part were men and women of weight and judgment. Most of them are busy people and had to make real sacrifices to leave their homes. The sessions were held in a private house which is the Tsuchiura meeting-place—a combination more practicable in Japan than in America, since every one sits on the floor, and no benches or chairs are necessary. Those from a distance lived in a hotel and the common life there, the breaking of bread together three times a day, deepened the feeling of brotherhood. This was realized, too, in the periods for worship, and it was indeed a pleasure to feel that there was neither Japanese nor American, neither male nor female, but all were one in Christ Jesus.

If there had not been this sympathy which took no account of race distinctions, the movement toward a separate organization would have been difficult and might have led to danger, but fortunately there was no occasion for such anxiety. From the first morning when Toki Iwasawa and Rengo Kumatsu gave their impressions of Friends in America, until the last morning, when assembled together for First-day Meeting for worship, the company listened to the message of Bunji Kida, the central thought of which was Christ's command to rise and walk, the feeling grew that the Society of Friends has a place and a work to do in Japan, and that the time has come to step forward in faith as a responsible body and find that place and begin that work.

While this is only the beginning, and as yet many difficult problems remain for them and for us to solve, yet having been led thus far, we cannot fail to believe that God's hand is in it, and that He will continue to show us the way, and to make of the Society of Friends in Japan an instrument in the great work of hastening the Kingdom of God.

THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN.

Now like a picture in a sapphire frame,
Rises the mountain to the autumn sky;
A vision overspread with living flame—
At once a marvel and a mystery.

Or like some grand mosaic deftly wrought
In some majestic minster's storied wall,
Where men to meet their Maker humbly come,
And mellowed sunbeams like a glory fall.

Or like a gate of Paradise inset
With priceless brilliants wonderful to see,
Mysterious and yet concealing still,
Behind the first a Greater Mystery!

I gaze thereon—and marvel as I gaze—
Surely no artist but the One has wrought
Upon the trembling texture of the trees
Flawless in form and coloring His thought.

E'en so may holy Horeb once have seemed Or Sinai when Moses trembling trod—
Speaking more eloquently than man
The presence and the handiwork of God!

OUR WITNESS TO PEACE—ACTIVE AND PASSIVE.

In days like the present we can judge of the truth or error of popular catchwords which in normal times appear to most people to sum up the wisdom of the ages. One of these catchwords that had almost outgrown challenge, was that our witness to truth must be positive, not negative, and our line of conduct active, not passive. But when a State is organized for war, an equally good case can be made out for urging people with peace principles to see that their negative witness is firm and unmistakable, and their line of conduct strong in willingness to suffer rather than in vigorous action.

In fact, the present-day struggle to maintain a testimony to peace in time of war is teaching us that there is no particular virtue in this line of demarcation, or rather that it is a distinction that may lie on the surface only. We can easily picture a group of young men, all of whom before the war would have accepted the principle that their witness to peace must be positive and not negative. To-day one of them will be in the trenches fighting "the war that is to end war"; one of them will be in the Friends' Ambulance Unit offering to the wounded a service of healing and mercy; another will be at relief work in France; another on an English farm; and yet another in Wormwood Scrubs. According to the superficial meaning of the words before us, this last is the only negative witness. All the rest are performing some definite service to the nation. He is merely opposing conscription. Yet a letter comes to me from one in military detention, and it is typical of many when it says, "If those outside could realize how powerful may be our blows at militarism from within compared with how puny they were from without, they would be filled with gladness that we are here. Our opportunities for good are so much greater!"

We are learning that outward circumstances over which we have often no control, will determine for us at any given time whether we are to express our witness to a spiritual truth in a positive form or a negative one. When the nation assumes an attitude of easy, good-natured benevolence to the peace question; when National and International Peace Congresses are welcomed by monarchs and mayors in royal and civic functions; when newspapers devote columns to the speeches and the costumes; when bishops preach peace sermons and Free Churches send their best orators to swell the chorus of general satisfaction with the general idea of peace, then the serious student of international problems should assume his most active, his most positive, even his most aggressive aspect. He will need all the positive force of which he is capable if he is to produce anything definite out of this mass of genuine but shallow sentiment in favor of peace. He must seize this opportunity to insist on definite steps being taken to substitute arbitration for force, to secure the reduction of armaments, to demand the reconstruction of international diplomacy, and to strengthen all existing international bonds of religious and social fellowship.

But when the nation is in the grip of militarism, and paralyzed with fear at the incalculable forces of evil set free by war, then the apostle of peace has to decide whether in some less aggressive form of active service, or in uncompromising opposition to the whole evil system itself, he can best illustrate his great purpose. The discovery that suffering is sometimes the highest form of service is no new one. It lies at the foundation of our Christian faith. It was the crowning discovery of those who solved the secret of the life of Jesus. They watched the early months of His ministry, with its bright promise, its open-air freedom, its tremendous activity, its spectacular success. They watched the shadows gathering, the crowds leaving Him, political and ecclesiastical power gaining the upper hand, the time for action passing away, the time for suffering and darkness and agony asserting itself. And in the figure that emerged from that suffering and agony they recognized that the world's Redeemer was not the invincible conqueror of the world's imagination, but the "Suffering Servant" of the prophet's vision. In the light of that discovery we look for victory to-day where they found victory. There will be times when His followers will seem to be overwhelmed by the forces of evil and the powers of darkness and fear—times when their opportunities for active service will be limited to a prison cell. But the greatest Empire of the world cannot take from humanity its Divine power of suffering for its faith, nor can it prevent that suffering from being the mightiest weapon against itself if the conflict between good and evil resolves itself into a conflict between the authority of the State and the eternal laws of God revealed to the heart of man.

EDITH J. WILSON.

THE TASTE OF A NAME.

We are glad to see that the fruit which has hitherto borne the disgusting name of "alligator pear" is now appearing in the market as the "avocado." It ought to facilitate its growing popularity that this fruit has thrown off its false pretensions, for it does not taste in the least like a pear, nor, we presume—though we never shall know for sure—like an alligator. It might be objected that the idea of eating a green lawyer with French dressing would be as distasteful as that of eating an alligator, but we are not yet so familiar with Spanish as to be bothered by that. When we are we can restore this much abused name to its original Aztec and call it ahuacatl, which would offend nobody but the vegetarians.

This matter of fruit names ought to receive more attention than it does. So long as the Lycopersicum esculentum was called "love-apple" people were naturally afraid to eat it, but as soon as it became known as "tomato" it was eaten with impunity.

There is another fruit that ought to apply to the court to have its name changed; that is the grape-fruit. It has nothing of the disagreeable connotation of the alligator pear, but it is meaningless except to those few who have seen the golden fruit hang in bunches on the trees. Now as it happens no fruit has more names belonging to it than this. Here are a few of them: pompelmoose, pampelmoose, pamplemousse, pampelmouise, pimple-nose, djerok, yu, nebu, shaddock, chaddock, pomelo, pomoloo, pompon, pompone, forbidden fruit, citrus decumana. Of these we must rule out for reasons of taste "pimple-nose" and those ending in "mouse;" also, from religious scruples, "forbidden fruit." But that leaves several good ones to choose from, of which pomelo is probably the best. Vive la pomelo. Consuet grape-fruit.—N. Y. Independent.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS, 1915-1916.

Those to whom this report is sent seldom have time for reading a lengthy statement. It is the hope of the Managers, however, that all friends of this important work will carefully consider some of the main results of the last school year, and that they will have patience with another statement of our essential needs.

ATTENDANCE.

The first fact of importance to all our friends is that there continues to be at Cheyney an increasing number of young men and women of the Negro race anxious to profit by the special sort of training given here. The last financial report shows an increase over the preceding year. The enrollment for the first week of the school year 1916-1917 is 99. This is far better than the showing of any previous year, and is evidence, we hope, of the strong appeal the school is making to that class of students who have the proper preparation for entrance here, and who are anxious to become workers for a better Negro citizenship through the Negro school. A number of applications have been refused admission because of lack of fundamental requirements.

SCHOOL SPIRIT.

One of the conspicuous marks of this new body of students is the interest, and even enthusiasm, they are bringing to Cheyney.

It is gratifying to find, as the years go by, a growing spirit of earnestness and of willingness on the part of the student body to share the responsibilities of the institution in work, and in the keeping up of high intellectual and moral standards. Few can understand the labor entailed by day and night in developing and maintaining these standards.

Most of the work on the farm throughout the summer was done by student labor. The opening week of the 1916-1917 year found a considerable amount of harvesting still to be done. The young men of the school immediately went into the fields to give some of the first hours of their sojourn in their new school home to the preservation of every sort of food stuff, in a year when the cost of living is distressingly high.

Friends of the work should know that Cheyney is making steady strides in the student body towards many kinds of help from within, and that we are basing the justice of our appeal for public support very largely on that effort on the part of our own people to help themselves before calling for help from others. The young women, as well as the young men, have been unhesitating in going to all kinds of work needed throughout the institution, from the sweeping of rooms and the cleaning of the grounds to cooking meals for the school family, doing laundry work for the school and helping in the harvesting of vegetables. This healthful, physical activity detracts nothing from scholastic achievement, but rather adds to it. When one speaks of the tone and spirit of the school, it is impossible not to have in mind this manifest activity of students outside of the conventional class-room routine, and the regular requirements of shop and laboratory. It is the hope and expectation of the Management that there will continue to be an increase of this kind of interest and activity. To this end more will be made of the study and practice of agriculture from the Preparatory Department to the Senior Class, and also, if means can be found, of the Manual Training Department.

GRADUATES.

It was from this sort of student body that Cheyney sent out last Sixth Month eighteen graduates from the several departments. Most of these young people, widely scattered now south and west, have already found definite work in their specialties. The aim more and more is to try to insure that our graduates shall find employment in that field of work for which they have been especially trained. Their mission is to introduce into the colored schools, or to improve where they already exist, the more active and energizing courses, especially those in agriculture and the practical arts. There is still an almost unlimited field and an unanswered call for this sort of instruction. A new education is to be brought about for the mass of colored people, an education that will more rapidly develop a higher, general capacity than the old methods insure, because not merely the mind is to be employed by these new school activities, but all the best functions of the body as well. Those who support our work can hardly appreciate what a far-reaching service they render, not only to the race, but to the nation, when they send out eighteen young men and women with this vision. It is this training, if anything, that must make of the colored masses a more productive body.

EXTENSION WORK.

There has been throughout the year, we believe, a growing extension of the influence of the school as a community agency. Previous reports have already mentioned the classes in cooking which have for years been conducted in Moylan, the Seventh-day afternoon neighborhood classes, and the night school conducted by Cheyney students and teachers in West Chester. The West Chester program for the year was especially successful in awakening the community in some measure to the need of preparedness against the congestion of colored people in unimproved sections of the city, against the constantly restricted opportunity for bread-winning employment, and against the lack of wholesome recreation for the young colored men and women of the town. This undertaking sought to arouse enough interest in West Chester, both among white and colored people, to guarantee some facilities for self-improvement to all the colored youth out of school desiring them. The classes at the Gay Street School, West Chester, showed a good average nightly attendance. The year's work came to an end with an exhibition of the work done in sewing and wood-working. The school authorities gave full endorsement to the night school, the city superintendent stating that the Board had decided to keep the colored school open for this service every day and night in the year if the colored people needed it.

A call for similar help has now come from Philadelphia and Media and other nearby communities. The new year, it is hoped, will see this work begun. We need money for it. Any investment here would yield rich returns in a better local Negro citizenship, which will be cheap at any price. The best experience the young people at Cheyney can have for future service in difficult Negro communities is the working out in the immediate Cheyney neighborhood of similar problems. The school fortunately is situated near many small townships, where the Negro is looked upon as a troublesome neighbor. By this missionary service Cheyney is attempting, in however modest a measure, to prevent backward Negro civilization in its own neighborhood.

(To be concluded.)

MY SHEPHERD.

The Shepherd found me in His boundless grace
Before I even knew that I was lost;
My tiny footsteps scarcely had begun
To tread the path of danger ere I saw
The Shepherd close beside me.

'Twas enough!
No sense of danger made me seek His arms,
I did but catch a glimpse of His dear face,
Then gladly let Him lift me to His breast.
And only after that, when I was safe,
And felt His arms encircling me with love,
Did He Himself point out the road beneath,
And make me see the precipice below.
I saw His love before I saw my need,
I knew my safety long before I knew
The awful death from which He rescued me,
And though I cannot tell when this took place,
Or when I first was clasped in His embrace,
I only know He found me—I am His.

THE CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

We are frequently asked, and sometimes with an air of impatience, what the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, with its income of over $500,000 a year, is doing in the present world situation. Articles have appeared from time to time in reputable journals criticizing this institution for inactivity and inefficiency.

It so happens that we are not retained by the Endowment to defend it before the public or elsewhere. Indeed, certain of its officers are not wholly in sympathy with the program of the American Peace Society, and we have been made aware of this lack of sympathy in ways which we can clearly understand. But our sense of fairness and our familiarity with the workers for international peace lead us to believe that the work of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace is on the whole most constructive and most hopeful. This conclusion is drawn from no facts not easily to be ascertained by any one interested. The fifth Year Book of the Endowment for 1916 is just off the press. Its two hundred pages indicate a conscientious and systematic endeavor on the part of many intelligent and forward-looking persons.

A few facts gathered from these pages will, we think, justify our estimate of this service. Over 1,800 disseminations have been made during the year, totaling over $600,000. It has distributed over 230,000 publications. It has added to its library during the year over 6,500 publications. As a bureau of general information it has been of wide service. Its secretary is special adviser to the Department of State and chairman to the Joint State and Navy Neutrality Board. It has sent Robert Bacon through the principal South American republics and published a record of his journey in Spanish, Portuguese and English. It has sent former Senator Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, through many of the countries of South America and published a report of his journey. It has within a year spent over $100,000 in the entertainment of invited delegates to the Second Pan-American Scientific Congress, and entertained over one hundred persons from the time of their departure from their homes in Central and South America to their return. It made possible the definite organization of the American Institute of International Law and the final organization of a society of international law in each of the twenty other American republics. Its assistant secretary is the executive secretary of the American Group of the Interparliamentary Union.

In addition to its five Year Books, the Endowment has published nine books and pamphlets under the Division of Intercourse and Education; four under the Division of Economics and History; twenty-two pamphlets and twelve books under the Division of International Law. Among these last are The Hague Conventions and Declarations of 1899 and 1907; Grotius' The Freedom of the Seas; The Status of the International Court of Justice; An Essay on a Congress of Nations for the Adjustment of International Disputes without Resort to Arms, by William Ladd; The Hague Court Reports; Diplomatic Documents Relating to the European War.

In addition to activities such as these, we may call attention also to the following: The support given to the American Association for International Conciliation; its European Bureau; its "special correspondence"; its entertainment of distinguished foreigners; its continued research work, including South American relations and a study of the present war; its cooperation with the Institute of International Law; its initiation of an Academy of International Law; its aid to journals of international law; its collection and publication of arbitration treaties, and its support of educational propaganda within the United States.

These facts, we repeat, tell a story of constructive and hopeful international endeavor. Our personal belief is that this great fund is being expended with as much wisdom as can reasonably be expected and with results as effective as the times permit.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

If you think a cause is just, tell men so;
If you'd have it lead the rest, help it grow;
When there's anything to do
Let the other's count on you
For a push to put things through, don't you know.

When a cynic with a sneer comes along,
Tell him who and what you are—make it strong;
Never falter, never bluff,
Tell the truth, for that's enough;
Be a booster! That's the stuff! Help along!

THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT RESOLUTION has been reported upon favorably by the Judiciary Committees of both the House and the Senate. The vote was twelve to seven in the former and thirteen to three in the latter. So far, good; but this does not insure the necessary two-thirds vote of both Houses. Write to your Congressmen.

EVANGELIST STOUGH VINDICATED.—More than two years ago the liquor gang of Hazleton began action for $200,000 damages against Henry W. Stough in which they accused him of slander and other unbecoming conduct. The four men who proposed to pull $50,000 each out of the pocket of the evangelist were Harry W. Jacobs, a brewer; John V. Fierro, an Italian liquor boss; Max Friedlander, a wholesale liquor dealer, and William J. Cullen.

The liquor bosses put their case in the hands of the District Attorney of Luzerne County, and instead of going about it in the ordinary way, that gentleman resurrected an old law which provided that such cases might be tried by arbitrators. Dr. Stough was compelled, therefore, to face these arbitrators who had been picked by interests friendly to the gang. The decision in that case was not favorable to Stough and he at once appealed to the Courts.

Because the Hazleton liquor gang boasted of their ability to make and unmake judges, the friends of Dr. Stough demanded that an outside judge be brought in to hear the case. This resulted in the appointment of Charles E. Terry of Wyoming County to conduct the trial. The case was heard in Wilkes-Barre and came to an abrupt conclusion on Eleventh Month 20th. The prosecutors fought desperately, but Judge Terry required them to adhere strictly to the law in the case. After their testimony had been presented, Judge Terry decided that they had utterly failed to make out a case. Upon motion of the defendant's attorneys the judge threw the liquor gangsters out of Court and placed upon them the enormous costs which they had piled up through their two years of plotting and scheming to undo the noted evangelist. Within an hour after his vindication, Dr. Stough started on his return trip to Danville, Ill., where he had been in the midst of a revival campaign. Thus ends a fight between decency and booze which has occupied the center of the stage in the anthracite regions for the last two years, and it ends with complete victory for those who have stood in defense of the home against the saloon. It brings cheer to the heart of every fighting temperance man, for it shows the liquor lords that they cannot hope to save themselves by brow-beating and persecuting every man who has the courage to denounce their crooked ways.—The American Issue.

PLANTING A SALOON.—The vicinity of Sixtieth Street and Lansdowne Avenue, West Philadelphia, is a rapidly-growing residential district, and many a saloon-keeper has envied such a location for his purposes. Ten times during the past eight years have the temperance people of that district been compelled to go before the License Court for the protection of their homes against the liquor men. Ten times have the successive License Courts refused to grant a license to sell liquors at this location, the number of remonstrants against such a grant having increased from ninety-six in the year 1908 to six hundred and six in 1916. At the time of the last refusal, which was in Sixth Month last, Judge Davis took occasion to say, "I have personally visited that neighborhood and am well acquainted with it. It would be an outrage to put a saloon in a residential section like that." Nevertheless, in Tenth Month, when the same applicant applied again for a license at exactly the same place, the very same judges—Barratt and Davis—presiding, the license was granted.

Needless to say, the citizens of that vicinity were astonished. Agitation began at once and a petition for a rehearing was promptly circulated, and later filed with the Court, bearing the signatures of eighty-five per cent. of the residents living within two squares of the place of the proposed saloon. A rehearing was granted. The remonstrants came forward with 3,493 signatures of persons living within three squares of the saloon site. The liquor men had gotten 3,737 names to their petition, but only 364 were residents within the three squares radius. But to the amazement of law-abiding, self-respecting men and women throughout the city the Court declined to revoke the license granted in such utter contradiction of testimony and reversal of precedent.

The people of Philadelphia are asked to have respect for the Court. Just how the Court can expect the people to have respect for it when it does in Tenth Month what it pronounced an outrage in Sixth Month is beyond comprehension. Thinking men everywhere agree with the Court in its first declaration that the granting of this license is an "outrage" on decent society.

WHAT ANSWER SHALL WE MAKE?—In a recent issue of a prominent newspaper of Pennsylvania the pathetic story was told of a man who is sentenced to die on the nineteenth of the current month in an electric chair for the murder of his own sister. Not long ago, rum-crazed, he killed one sister and seriously wounded another. Seventeen years ago, according to the paper, this man was a quiet, laughter-loving boy, with a bright future; to-day, crushed and broken, he awaits an ignominious death. While still a youth he was led into a saloon of his native town, and boon companions made it pleasant for him to return again and again. This was the sad beginning; the downward road was easy.

In speaking of this tragedy, after her brother was sentenced to death, the wounded sister gave utterance to the following words: "Whiskey was at the root of the whole thing. The rum-sellers should paint a picture of an electric chair in their windows and underneath they should write this sentence: 'Come inside; tarry with us, and we will send you to the electric chair!' They don't believe much in suffrage in this town, because they know that once the women get the vote the saloon will go. Can't the Christian people of Pennsylvania," she pleaded, "do something to prevent such sorrow as this?"

What an appeal is this to the homes, to the manhood of the State: "Can't something be done to prevent such sorrow as this?" Our indifference is the more reprehensible in view of the fact that this is a sorrow which threatens every home, however guarded. All over our State are these priceless, fun-loving boys of ours, who are bravely facing the future, boys who, when they reach maturity, if present conditions are permitted to prevail and the rum-seller is allowed to continue his selfish, unholy calling, may be maudlin drunkards—may be awaiting their turn to go to the electric chair to satisfy the desire for justice of the very State that licenses the saloon.

"Can't something be done to prevent such sorrow as this?" What a slogan for temperance workers! You who are fathers, you who are mothers, you who occupy responsible positions of far-reaching influence, face this question with your hand on the head of your boy and determine what answer should be given. Why is it that Pennsylvania should now be one of the leading booze States of our land, encouraging and perpetuating a slavery worse than death itself?

Is it not, largely, because of the criminal indifference and disloyalty of those who should be doing their utmost, both by voice and vote, to make a licensed saloon an impossibility? "Can't something be done to prevent such sorrow as this?" is a question which should throb with the very heart-beat of every loyal citizen until the menace of the saloon is forever removed.

"Can't something be done to prevent such sorrow as this?" Let this sentence ring in our ears; let it cause us to resolve that so far as our efforts and influence are concerned no other man in this State shall ever suffer the death penalty for a crime made possible through drink purchased at a saloon which the State itself legalized!—ALLAN SUTHERLAND.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

EXTRACTS FROM THE GOLDEN CLEW.—THE CHRISTIAN'S BAPTISM.—(Continued.)—Dorothy said, "Nothing could be nicer than that thou should go on talking to us. Marion and I have been speaking of these things during the week, because last First-day when Edith and everybody were remembering the baptism of the Spirit, we like to think of the things others are having in mind and try to understand them."

"And then," said Marion, "that subject seemed to bring up the whole question of baptism."

She stopped and Dorothy took it up. "And then we felt completely puzzled. We knew the coming of the Holy Ghost was a subject we did not at all understand, it is so deep and sacred, and the outward form of water baptism that other people believe in is a thing, as Friends, we do not accept, I suppose."

"And we think," said Marion, "that, if we do not have the outward baptism it makes it all the more important that we should understand the real inward one."

"Yes, and really have it," said Dorothy. She had her Bible, in which were marked the following passages, which she now turned to and read: Rom. vi. 3, 4; Gal. iii. 27; Col. ii. 12.

"I think," said mother, "Paul was very likely thinking of the outward baptism and using it to enforce and perhaps to illustrate the truth he wanted to impress upon his hearers. The truth he wanted to make clear is this: that they were separated to Christ and must so live. There is every reason to think that the apostles baptized their converts, for several old forms went on for some time in the early Church. For instance, the words, 'Baptized into Moses,' 'Baptized into John,' meant this: that the person baptized would follow all that Moses taught, commit himself to all that he wrote, or would follow all that John taught, and make his life as much like John's life as possible.

"To be baptized into Christ is a far higher, deeper and fuller thing; for Christ taught and was and did so much more than any man ever did, and if we are baptized into Him we must remember what it means to be separate to Him, to unite in His life, in His death and resurrection—an honor and responsibility so far above what the other baptisms had been, so much higher than any other dedication that had been given to the world before.

"But the simple act of dipping in the water was one of those pictures of heavenly things which we believe was not meant to be kept up after Christ came. He fulfilled all the types and brought in a new religion which was not to depend on any outward things. There is a natural love in men's hearts for outward signs and symbols. They often make it so much easier for us to appear religious, even if we are not really so. So, little by little, out of this wish for outward rites there grew the great showy ritual of the Greek and Roman Churches, which certainly drew men's hearts away from the simple worship of God.

"Then came the Reformation, when much was done to get rid of the outward things and return to the real, true, hidden ones. Many of the foolish and empty symbols went. But some symbols, which appeared more necessary, stayed."

"How strange," said Dorothy, "that they should think that a little outward act like this could save our souls!"

Mother answered, "The act of separation to the Lord, the whole-hearted determination to be His, to give all our lives to Him, is what every true Christian wants to do. In other words, we want our old life, which was not given to the Lord, to be dead and forgotten, and to live a new life in His power and to His glory. Thus baptism is a type of death—'Buried with Him in baptism,' but raised with Him, too, to live 'in newness of life.' The best way to understand is to watch in the history of the apostles the first who had the Saviour's promised gift given to them."

Marion said, "How blessed it would be if we, also, knew that Holy Power in our little lives!"

"But our lives," answered Dorothy, "could never be like Peter's and Paul's!"

"No, perhaps not, dear. But if you both do your part, if you wholly decide to be the Lord's and separate yourselves to be His, the Lord will fulfil His part toward you and give you the blessing of His Spirit. He will not do the things perhaps for you that He did for Paul, because you are not Paul, but Dorothy and Marion. But you will find that in all your work and your lessons you will have God's power helping you and blessing you."

"It is not easy to understand," said Dorothy.

"Do you see that lovely water-lily close to you? When we came down this morning the bud was closed and the more it opens, the more light will come in. Now, the Lord wants us to be like His flowers, to open our hearts to His love, and as we open them He will fill them."

A little girl who had been hearing about this, afterwards prayed this short prayer: "O, Lord Jesus, please come into my little heart-temple and do all the sweeping out Thyself." We can't do that; that is quite certain.

"Dear girls, the ways of the Spirit of God with each human soul are very close and very intimate, and I feel quite unable to explain fully the terms which the Bible used to show how that Power works with men. But fire is the greatest purifier we know—it is one of the most tremendous energies in nature; and so we see how the power which is to work in these unclean and weak hearts of ours should be likened to fire—so purifying and so strong, a tremendous agent for an exceeding need. Other symbols are given of the working of the Spirit of God—water, wind, dew—which you may like to study for yourselves. They show the many different ways in which the Spirit of God can meet, in His varied forms, all the varied needs of men."

Now it was time to go in. Marion slipped her hand into her mother's, and they went together under the flickering shade. Dorothy rose, too; but, as she did so, turned a last look at the water-lily.

The lovely cup was fully expanded now, and as it floated on the dark water, its exquisite whiteness bathed and filled with sunshine, it seemed to belong more to the heavenly light, to which it owed its opened beauty, than to the cool depths on which it lay.

Tears of deep feeling gathered in Dorothy's eyes and in her heart she breathed the prayer:

"O, Lord, teach me, too, to open my whole heart to Thee!"
—G. CROSFIELD.

God answers prayer; sometimes when hearts are weak
He gives the very gifts believers seek.

But often faith must learn a deeper rest,
And trust God's silence when He does not speak;

For He, whose name is love, will send the best;
Stars may burn out, nor mountain walls endure,
But God is true, His promises are sure
To those who seek.

NEWS ITEMS.

MORE than a year ago an effort was made by the Philadelphia Friends' Historical Society to have a bronze tablet placed in a prominent position on the wall of the City Hall at Broad and Market Streets. The tablet was to contain William Penn's Prayer for Philadelphia.

Allusion has been made to this effort more than once in THE FRIEND, but now that the tablet is actually in position, it may not be out of place to give a brief review of the work.

The Society desires to thank the many friends who contributed to the expense incurred; the delay has been unavoidable and the whole enterprise would have failed of fruition had a less energetic Committee been behind it. Many discouragements presented and even after the "city fathers" had yielded consent for the placing of the tablet, it seemed more than probable that the enterprise would meet with failure on account of change in administration.

It was the Committee's wish and for a while their expectation, that the tablet would be placed in one of the archways of the City Hall, near either the east or west entrance, as the throng of pedestrians through the court is much greater in this direction than it is going north and south, but insurmountable difficulties were placed in the way of this scheme, and a position just within the north archway has been granted; sunlight is all-sufficient until the electric lamps are lighted and these are very favorably located for the tablet.

Friends interested in what the Society has done should turn aside on their next walk through the City Hall Court and see it for themselves. For our readers who cannot do this we print again the language which Albert Cook Meyers states was contained in William Penn's farewell letter to his Province, written upon his departure from Philadelphia, after his first visit, 1682-1684. A wax seal still adheres to the old paper and bears the Penn coat-of-arms.

Curiously enough after a search of three years the manuscript containing the prayer was found somewhere in Chili, South America.

WILLIAM PENN'S PRAYER FOR PHILADELPHIA.

"And thou, Philadelphia, the virgin settlement of this Province, named before thou wert born, what love, what care, what service and what travail has there been to bring thee forth and preserve thee from such as would abuse and defile thee.

"Oh, that thou mayst be kept from the evil that would overwhelm thee. That, faithful to the God of thy mercies, in the life of righteousness, thou mayst be preserved to the end!

"My soul prays to God for thee that thou mayst stand in the day of trial, that thy children may be blessed of the Lord, and thy people saved by His power."

WESTERN SOW HOUSE.—The excellent uplift work that is being done in a quiet way by the Western Sow Society, located at No. 1613 South Street, Philadelphia, justifies the Managers in asking Friends who are interested in constructive relief work of a practical character (and this should include all of us) to help this Society in view when they are remembering worthy institutions that need help.

The Annual Report recently issued states that 206 families received relief, having been found worthy after thorough investigation. The relief given consisted of furnishing soup, bread, groceries, coal, clothing, medicine and where necessary household goods, such as scrubbing brushes, buckets and other household supplies, in order that the families may be kept clean and neat. Out of the families assisted, at least 20 have been made self-supporting and no longer require aid.

Baths were given during the year 1916 to 749 adults and 254 children, making a total of 1,003 baths given. This shows a gratifying increase over the year 1915, when only 692 were given.

Settlement work consists in morning, afternoon and evening classes in Cooking and Sewing, under the supervision of teachers from the Drexel Institute.

The Visiting and Social Work consists of two afternoon classes of old colored women between the ages of 50 and 76. These old women meet and have reading, sewing, singing and devotional exercises. In addition 75 Bibles and Testaments were given out by our Visitors. During the summer flowers were distributed among the sick and a number of excursions were arranged in Fairmount Park and up the Delaware River. These summer picnics have given a great deal of pleasure, in many cases being the only outings that the women and children had.

A cordial invitation is extended to all contributors and to all interested in such work to visit the rooms at No. 1613 South Street and see for themselves.

Paul D. I. Maier, No. 1218 Chestnut Street, is Treasurer of the Society.

An interesting week-end Conference of Friends of Pasadena, California, was held on the fifth and sixth, the following program having been arranged:

Sixth-day afternoon.—Introductory Remarks by Septimus Marten, of London Yearly Meeting, and Elizabeth Stover, of Genesee Yearly Meeting.

An address by Wm. C. Allen, of San José, on "Peace and War."

Evening.—An address entitled "Open Sesame," by Professor Mable Douglas, of Whittier College, followed by Walter E. Vail, of San José.

Seventh-day afternoon.—A paper by Professor A. T. Murray, of Stanford University, entitled "Friends and the Present Crisis," followed by an address by Dr. Daniel F. Fox, of Pasadena, entitled "Plus Quamvis."

Evening.—"Some Recollections of Foreign Travel," by Wm. C. Allen, followed by Thomas J. Ashby, of Pasadena on "John Bright's Character and Influence."

THREE lectures have recently been given under the Peace Committee of the Race Street Meeting:—

1. By George W. Nasmyth, of Boston, director of the World Peace Foundation, on "Preparedness Against War."

2. By Elbert Russell, of Johns Hopkins University, on "Christ and Militarism."

3. By Hamilton Holt, on "The Great War and Peace."

A letter stating the Peace position of Friends and inviting them to attend the lectures was sent to about 2,000 adult members of the Quarterly Meeting, 5,000 school teachers in Philadelphia, and 1,500 ministers. Placeards announcing the lectures were put up in the Philadelphia & Western Railroad stations, in the meeting-houses and in store windows. The lectures have been of great educational value.

THE following is taken from the book notices in the N. E. Journal of Education.

Archæology and the Bible. By Professor George A. Barton, Ph.D., LL.D., Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: American Sunday School Union. Price, $2, net.

The book is in two parts: First, the Bible Lands, their Exploration, and the Resultant Light on the Bible and History. Second, Translations of Ancient Documents which Confirm or Illuminate the Bible.

In this monumental work Professor Barton has almost swamped us with a flood of information and the accuracy and profoundness of his investigation. No detailed account of it is possible, for it is all sifted wheat.

Scholars and students of the Bible should keep this book within reach so as to correct mistakes, dispel ignorance and confirm an intelligent faith. The illustrations are a part of the text, and illuminating.

FRIENDS probably share in measure the diversity of view expressed by the newspaper press on the wisdom of the President's move for Peace. None probably would question his motives. One who ardently approved his action sent him the following telegram:

"Appeal to Europe monumental act. God prosper it. If successful does it not require as a complement an appeal to America to devote the multiplied millions appropriated for preparedness to reconstruction in the desolated countries of Europe? Could the efficient organization of our army and navy be better employed?"

As showing somewhat specifically what we must contend against as militant Peace workers the following is printed:

A platform of preparedness measures advocated by the American Defense Society was made public at New York. It contained planks calling for:—

Universal military training of the youth of the country and of the men of military age, according to the principles of the Mosely and Chamberlain bills.

Immediate acquisition of a reserve supply of rifles, uniforms, machine guns, mobile artillery and ammunition sufficient to equip an army of at least 1,000,000 men.

Immediate establishment of a chain of fortified cooling stations in our five groups of islands stretching from the Pacific Coast to the Philippine Islands.

Preservation of the naval petroleum reserves.

We must try to persuade "preparedness" advocates not to overlook the epigram of Walter L. Fisher, former Secretary of the Interior, "Universal military service would undoubtedly distribute the military burden, but it would create the burden for the sake of distributing it."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—The passenger department of the Pennsylvania Railroad announces that of the nearly 200,000,000 passengers carried by the lines east of Pittsburgh last year not one was killed, and about 600,000,000 passengers in four years were transferred without a fatality.

About 1500 farmers and their families from all parts of Pennsylvania gathered at State College for the twelfth annual farmers' week. More than 200 lectures and demonstrations of the various stages of agriculture were given. Growing alfalfa, corn and wheat to establish a prosperous future, was the concrete prescription for enriching the farmers of Pennsylvania.

Many persons attended the peace demonstration on New Year's Eve under the auspices of the American Neutral Conference Committee in Washington Square, New York City. "With malice toward none, with charity to all," began the responsive reading which was followed by "we begin the New Year in communion with our fellow-men in all lands."

A peace rally is planned for the 18th at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia. It will be a reply to the protest against peace at all hazards, as issued by George Wharton Pepper and other prominent churchmen of the different denominations. Consideration of means to be taken to restore peace in the war-stricken countries of Europe will be the topic discussed.

Prof. Howard Butler, of Princeton, announces an expedition to Sardinia, Asia Minor, in 1917, to search for the buried treasures of King Croesus, Lydia's great financier, whose operations antedated the Persian monarchy.

GENERAL.—Revised figures at Washington on returns of the last election show definitely that neither Democrats nor Republicans will have a majority of the next House necessary to elect a Speaker, and that a handful of independents will determine which side will control the organization.

A modification of the Swiss system of government has been introduced into the management of the $25,000,000 National City Bank of New York. From its dozen vice-presidents five managers have been selected. One of the five will be designated as "first general manager" for one year, giving his place at the end of the year to another of the five, and so on in rotation.

The revolutionary plans for the new $1,100,000 Sing Sing Prison call for 45 buildings, with provision for classifying the prisoners for vocations at the other prisons of the State and for examining the prisoners minutely in respect to their mental, physical and moral condition. It is also the plan of the commission that Sing Sing shall become a clearing-house prison only.

Members of college fraternities have a lower average standing than students who are not members, according to investigations reported at almost the same time from the widely separated institutions, the University of Washington, in Seattle, and the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, in Massachusetts. In the Western University both fraternity men and sorority women rank lower than those who are not members.

FOREIGN.—Women will hereafter be admitted to Moscow University on the same terms as men, although Russia has been foremost in extending professional opportunities and privileges to trained women. Moscow University, the oldest and most authoritative University in the empire, has always kept its doors closed against women. Now, however, the Russian ministry of education and the faculty council of the University have conjointly announced that hereafter women will be admitted in full equality with the men in all courses.

NOTICES.

THE RELIEF COMMITTEE appointed by the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, has arranged to Receive Parcels and Small Packages of clothing intended for those suffering from the effects of war in Europe.

The packages may be left with the Janitor of the Meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, or forwarded by express, charges prepaid, and marked:—

WILLIAM T. ELKINTON,
Care of A. D. Featherstone, Matron,
Friends' Arch Street Centre,
304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Do not send large boxes to the Meeting-house.

Large boxes should be sent direct to the wharves of the Transportation Companies. For shipping instructions write to:—

William T. Elkinton, 121 S. Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and await his reply before shipping of goods.

ROBERT E. SPEER will address a Young Peoples' Tea Meeting (arranged by the Young Woman's Auxiliary) at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on First Month 13, 1917, at 7.45 P. M. A cordial invitation is extended to all. His subject will be, "Loyalty to Christ, the Supreme Missionary Motive."

All Young Friends (and their guests) are invited to supper from 6.15 to 7 P. M. Supper tickets (40 cents) should be secured before First Month 9, 1917, from local representatives or from Harold M. Lane, Friends' Institute, Philadelphia.

A false impression seems to be circulating to the effect that young people only are invited to the evening meeting. This is not the case, as all Friends will be welcome.

ONE year ago the Friends of Denver, Colorado, met in order to get acquainted, one with the other. Since that time they have been meeting regularly once every month and now are meeting once in every three weeks at the different homes of the members who are living in Denver.

The meetings at the present time are usually between thirty-five and forty in number. During the past year a great many new Friends have been located and presumably there are many other Friends living in Denver that we do not know about.

This winter the Friends are taking up the study of Quakerism. The different members reading up on different subjects and speaking on some when the meetings are held.

If any of the readers of THE FRIEND are acquainted with Friends residing in Denver they would aid very materially in getting in touch with them by sending the names and addresses to Charles W. Savery, No. 1227 Milwaukee Street, Denver.

VOLUNTEER workers are much needed at the Peace Rooms, Arch Street Centre, to assist in addressing folders, etc.

“O may I ever remain willing that my luxuries in life may be given up in order to supply others’ want of comforts, and my comforts at times given up to supply others’ want of necessities, and that even my necessities may also, at times, be given up to relieve the extreme distress of others. This is what I crave from the assurance that such conduct is consistent with the true Christian character.”

That from which the above was copied was found among the papers of the late Coleman L. Nicholson.

THY HANDICAP.

The sports had been widely advertised and the friends of the school had gathered in large numbers, as it was one of the eventful days in the school’s calendar.

It was nothing more or less than an athletic exhibition in a large boarding-school, which was made the centre of attraction to draw together members of many families, whose interests, though widely diverse, found a common ground in this great school, which had trained them and their parents and grandparents and was now moulding the generation that was soon to succeed them.

As one event after another was checked off and the announcements of first and second place were given forth, only a very few in the great concourse of people actually knew who the real winners had been.

It was understood as a matter of course that the contestants were not evenly matched, and to make the exhibit more interesting to the on-lookers, the best had willingly accepted handicaps, and these graded down from those who could have competed with the first from almost any school that could be mentioned to the relatively poor and weak who would have stood no show whatever in an inter-academic exhibition.

Though it was universally known and accepted as a matter of course that handicaps had been placed upon the stronger contestants, very few of the visitors knew the nature of these handicaps or seemed to give much heed to them, and indeed only those who gave the closest attention to the announcements given out by the manager had any chance of knowing.

Everything, however, was conducted in the open, there was not the slightest semblance of anything secretive or unfair, and when all was over and the last event had been performed, there seemed to be no question but that the decisions rendered had been given in agreement with the facts.

In this particular school no special favors were bestowed upon the winners, but there seemed to be the universal impression that each who had won was worthy, and that somehow at least some little measure of his merits was transmitted to those who were there as his special friends. The older guests who witnessed the exhibition possibly reflected as the affair drew to an end how closely it all paralleled the larger life they were living out in the world of men and things, a world of which these boys and girls were soon to become a part; as their thoughts dwelt longer on the scenes of the afternoon, they brought up from the wells of their own experience the lessons they had learned, and not one who was honest with himself but lingered in earnest contemplation on what had been his handicaps in life and what service, if any, these had rendered him.

Just as with the boys in the afternoon, very few except those most interested in them knew what the handicaps had been; they had no wish to publish them abroad, but there they were and they had been their life attendants; they thought at one time that these handicaps had been a real hindrance to their advancement, and, alas! in some few cases they had proved to be, but most of the on-lookers at the sports that afternoon had realized that they were among the most helpful influences that had entered into their lives, and like the boys in the contest they saw that without them they could not hope to win the larger game of life.

The man who can look back upon a long career and not confess that some of his greatest blessings came to him as restraints placed upon him, is the exception and not the rule. It would be foolish to enumerate what these restraints are; my catalogue for myself would be different from your catalogue for me, and neither the one nor the other would be correct; no one can measure the value of his own handicaps, much less those of his fellows.

It does not matter very much what these restraints are or how many they are, but it does matter that we run fair, and in order that we do this, our Captain graciously reminds us by means of handicaps placed upon us of how we should steer our course and what is the object or goal of our running.

Too much success in worldly matters is offset by a gentle reminder brought very close home to us by some sad disaster to a friend; too little consideration for others and too much thought for ourselves, the life of one who has overcome selfishness is thrust upon us and made our daily companion, so that we are constantly rebuked in his presence; the traits of character which Paul depicts as earthly are offset in those whom we are forced to associate with by other traits which he calls “the fruits of the Spirit”. We fail to heed the lessons so gently taught and some other restraint is placed upon us, and so day after day the race continues; we run perforce, either the right or the wrong course. Oftener than not the very things that we would at first consider hindrances to our progress are the handicaps permitted by our Captain, which are intended to help us most on our way.

As in the contests on the playground the first requisite to success seemed to be coupled with the power of endurance, so in the larger life, it is he that "continues to the end" who shall realize the goal. He will often have to examine his sandals and to adjust his harness, to reckon with his strength, and forecast the way to discern the obstacles and temptations before him, but he must keep his face forward, "forgetting the things that are behind, reaching forward to the things that are before", and like the apostle, think not himself to have gained the goal, but to be ever pressing toward it.

A FRIENDS' MEETING IN PRISON.

The following account of a Friends' meeting with conscientious objectors in prison is sent by a visitor:

"It was pathetic to see these men sitting in their convict dress, it seemed so utterly out of place; yet one felt that the men honored the garb, instead of the garb, as is usually the case, degrading the men. They testified the warmth of their greeting by their countenances. I quickly felt at home amongst them and took my seat at the head of the table. We then at once settled down for our half-hour's worship and fellowship. After reading a few selected portions, there followed a period of living silence, broken once by vocal prayer. One of the men shortly after gave a touching testimony to the experience of the reality of the presence of Jesus Christ with him in his lonely cell. Our thoughts were then directed to St. Paul's allusion to himself as the prisoner in the Lord while in his cell in Rome, and the assurance which those present might feel that as they had sought to follow the Master and had been made captive by His love, they were, though apparently there by the will of man, also indeed prisoners 'in the Lord.' Another prisoner picture was that in the vision of St. Paul when he wrote, 'Thanks be unto God who always leadeth us in triumph in Christ,' and we were reminded again of the willing captivity of His bondslaves and that though triumph is not usually associated with a prisoner's cell, those present might still, even in their lonely captivity, rejoice inwardly in the triumph of Jesus which they, by their loyalty, were helping to bring nearer in the world. Before we closed, prayer was offered by another of the men in which he gave thanks.

"There was undoubtedly a sense of real worship and fellowship throughout and we all felt uplifted. The visitor, who came to minister, felt in a very real sense he was 'in bonds with them,' and very reverently one says it—there was One other also in whose name we were met and were blessed together. The warden was very attentive and kind. This altogether new experience for him must, I think, have impressed him, and he must have concluded that these are a strange type of criminals!"

WHAT can I give Him,
Poor as I am?
If I were a shepherd,
I would bring a lamb;
If I were a wise man,
I would do my part;
Yet what can I give Him?—
Give my heart.

HISTORICAL GLEANINGS.

VII.

AN EXAMPLE OF "GENTILE THEOLOGY."

A short time ago, when turning over the leaves of a very old book—part print and part manuscript—I came upon a document that arrested attention. It purports to be, in part, a copy of the speech of a North American Indian, in answer to a Swedish missionary's sermon on "original sin" and to his unwinning arguments for inducing the Indians to accept Christianity. The first events narrated in connection with these are said to have taken place at Conestoga, Pennsylvania, in 1710.

It would hardly be possible at the present time to say how much really historical quality attaches to some parts of the account, particularly as regards the whole content of the Indian's address; but when we consider that the speech had first to be interpreted to the missionary, and that it was put into Latin by him and afterward translated into English by someone else, we cannot, to say the least, regard its present form as "close to the original." It seems very possible that the sympathy and prepossession of the last translator might have entered a little into the rendering, along with the flavor of eighteenth-century English. On the other hand, there is something to be said in favor of its correctness, in substance, as well as of the preacher's fairness in presenting what was so manifestly against his own teaching. At all events, supposing that some such discourse was actually delivered, we may assume that the spirit of it was pretty well preserved, and that the basis of it was in agreement with the "great fundamental" with which we are so familiar.

It is likely that some persons under whose notice this account may fall are already more or less acquainted with it, but to others it may offer the interest of novelty, if nothing more.

"The Indian's speech, translated from the Latin, is as followeth:"

"Since the subject of his errand is to persuade us to embrace a new doctrine, perhaps it may not be amiss (before we offer him the reasons why we cannot comply with his request) to acquaint him with the grounds and principles of that religion which he would have us to abandon.

"Our forefathers were under a strong persuasion (as we are) that those who act well in this life will be rewarded in the next, according to the degree of their virtue; and on the other hand, that those who behave wickedly here will undergo such punishments hereafter as are proportionate to the crimes they are guilty of. This has been constantly and invariably received and acknowledged for a truth, through many successive generations of our ancestors. It could not then have taken its rise from fable; for human fiction, however artfully and plausibly contrived, can never gain credit long among any people when free enquiry is allowed, which was never denied by our ancestors; who, on the contrary, thought it the sacred, inviolable, natural right of every man to examine and judge for himself. Therefore, we think it evident that our notion concerning future rewards and punishments was either immediately revealed from Heaven to some of our forefathers and from them descended to us, or that it was implanted in each of us at our creation, by the Creator of all things. Whatever the method might have been whereby God hath been pleased to make known to us His will, and give us a knowledge of our duty, it is still in our sense a Divine Revelation. Now we desire to propose to [the missionary] some questions.

"Does he believe that our forefathers, men eminent for their piety, constant and warm in their pursuit of virtue, hoping thereby to merit eternal happiness, were all damned? Does he think that we who are their zealous imitators in good works, and influenced by the same motives as they were, earnestly endeavoring . . . to tread the paths of integrity, are in a state of damnation? If those be his sentiments, they are surely as impious as they are bold and daring.

"In the next place we beg he would explain himself more particularly concerning the revelation he speaks of. If he admits no other than what is contained in his written Book, the contrary is evident from what has been shown before; but if he says that God has revealed Himself to us, but not sufficient for our salvation, then we ask: To what purpose should He have revealed Himself to us in any wise? It is clear that a revelation insufficient to save cannot put us in a better condition than we should be in without any revelation at all. We cannot conceive that God should point out to us the end we ought to aim at, without opening to us the way of arriving at that end. But supposing our understanding to be so far illuminated as to know it to be our duty to please God, who yet has left us under an incapacity of doing it, will this missionary therefore . . . take upon himself to pronounce damnation against us for not doing those things which he himself acknowledges impossible by us to be done?

"It is our opinion that every man is possessed [of] sufficient knowledge for his own salvation. The Almighty (for anything we know) may have communicated Himself to different races of people in a different manner. Some say they have the will of God in writing. Be it so! Their revelation has no advantage above ours, since both must be equally sufficient to save, or the end of the revelation would be frustrated. Besides, . . . those written commands can only be designed for those who have the writing. They cannot possibly regard us. Had the Almighty thought so much knowledge necessary for our salvation, His goodness would not have so long deferred the communicating of it to us. And to say that in a matter so necessary He could not, at one and the same time, equally reveal Himself to all mankind, is nothing less than an absolute denial of His omnipotence. Without doubt, He can make His will manifest without the help of any book, or the assistance of any bookish man whatever."

The Indian argues further that as the people of his race were under the care of Providence and were the recipients of God's beneficence in this life, it could not be that they would be neglected in the supreme matter of their final salvation. Then, directing his shaft straight at the strongholds of Calvinism, he affirms the simple faith that in case one of their ancestors had committed a crime, "like that which we are told happened to another race of people," God would surely have punished the wrong-doer, but would not have involved the innocent in his guilt.

This shrewd son of the forest concludes his polemic with finding the Christians "more degenerated in their morals" than the Indians themselves; "and we judge of their doctrines," says he, "by the badness of their lives."

"Small wonder is it that the preacher was perplexed with such "strong reasonings," and that, having dedicated his Latin translations to the University of Upsal, he called upon the learned men of that institution to come to his assistance! The sequel of the story is not at hand; but if the poor man looked carefully for the cause of his failure, perhaps he discovered that some truth was on the Indian's side, and that dogmatic theology is not the best mode of approach to the heart and conscience of an untutored people.

One is led to contrast this method with that of George Fox and other Friends, who, including all men in the scope of Divine love and grace, were wont to appeal to "that of God" in their consciences, and so could meet the Indians on their own ground. George Fox speaks repeatedly of finding them sober, attentive and loving—or "pretty"—and referring to one occasion when he had addressed two of the chief men he remarks: "I found they understood the thing I spoke of."

More and more is this principle coming to be accepted and realized, so that some of the missionaries of the present time are acknowledging that no matter into what dark corners of the earth they go, they find that "God has been there before them."

DISARMAMENT.

"Put up the sword!" The voice of Christ once more Speaks in the pauses of the cannon's roar,
O'er fields of eorn by fiery sickles reaped,
And left dry ashes; over trenches heaped
With nameless dead; o'er cities starving slow,
Under a rain of fire; through wards of woe,
Down which a groaning diapason runs
From tortured brothers, husbands, lovers, sons,
Of desolate women in their far-off homes,
Waiting to hear the step that never comes,
O men and brothers, let that voice be heard;
War fails; try peace; put up the useless sword:

Fear not the end. There is a story told
In Eastern tents, when Autumn nights grow cold,
And round the fire the Mongol shepherds sit
With grave responses listening unto it:
Once on the errands of his mercy bent,
Buddha, the holy and benevolent,
Met a fell monster, huge and fierce of look,
Whose awful voice the hills and forests shook.
"O son of peace," the giant cried, "thy fate
Is sealed at last and love shall yield to hate,"
The unarmed Buddha, looking with no trace
Of fear or anger in the monster's face,
In pity said, "Poor fiend, e'en thee I love."
Lo! As he spake the sky-tall terror sank
To hand-breadth size; the huge abhorrence shrank
Into the form and fashion of a dove;
And where the thunder of its rage was heard,
Circling above him, sweetly sang the bird:

"Hate hath no harm for love," so ran the song,
"And peace unweaponed conquers every wrong."

SHORT CUTS TO PEACE.

All thoughtful people, and not least, I believe, vast numbers of those who are fighting in the trenches, are longing for some means by which the world may be permanently delivered from the nightmare of war. There are people who tell us that this can never be until all the world is converted to real Christianity. Others say that there will always be war, or the fear of war, so long as the method of competition rules the social and industrial life of the various nations. Both these views I believe to be mistaken. Both of them put off the deliverance of the world to an indefinite future, and make of permanent peace little more than a Utopian dream. I believe that if the nations as units could simply act towards one another at the moral level which the relations of individuals in the more advanced communities have already reached—sadly low as this often is—there need be no war. There would, of course, be disputes; but they would be settled without fighting. If nations possessed merely as much sense of duty to one another and to the whole community of mankind as is shown, for instance, by a decent trading company in England, I am convinced that wars could easily be prevented. The great question is, How is the morality of nations to be brought into line with the morality of individuals?

I need not waste time in refuting the doctrine of Bernhardt, and of others not in Germany who hold his principles but do not express them with such brutal frankness, that the moral law does not bind nations at all—unless to the extent that they must keep their promises to one another, or give fair notice if they wish to be released from their undertakings. The answer to the question appears to be twofold: first, there must be a desire on the part of the peoples, and of the statesmen to whom they entrust their destinies, to do to other nations, including the weaker ones, as they would that others should do to them; and second, there must be a development of law instead of force for the settlement of disputes as they arise. The growth of these two factors of peace has delivered the more progressive nations from forms of warfare which at one time seemed almost as hopeless as that from which we suffer now: City Wars, Private Wars, and Duelling. We make a great mistake if we imagine that the elimination of such minor warfare is due entirely to law and to the force which it is able to employ. At the back of law and force there is the agreement of all decent people that those forms of warfare are a nuisance, that they are entirely foolish, and that they are morally wrong. It is because the vast majority of the community does not want duels that the law against duelling can be enforced. If they did, no amount of police courts or prisons could prevent duels from being fought. You cannot, in a modern community, enforce a law unless you have "public opinion" on its side.

The most important "short cut to Peace," if it is not unduly sanguine to call it so, seems to me to be the development of such a public opinion in international matters: the rapid growth of a sense of duty among nations. The chief agent in fostering this development ought to be the Christian Church in its various branches; and after the war it will have a unique opportunity of doing this most necessary work. The devastating results of the total absence of such a sense of national duty, as witnessed in the treatment by Germany of Belgium and Northern France, should afford a powerful lever for raising the world into a recognition of its necessity.

It does not, however, follow that if you have public opinion right the law is needless. Law is an expression—often rather belated—of the moral standard the community has reached; and it is a powerful educator for bringing up the standard of the less developed members of the community to that of the more advanced. The duty of educating children, for instance, is far more widely recognized to-day than before education was made compulsory; a much smaller proportion of the population needs compulsion in this matter now than in 1870. Right laws can do much to develop sound public opinion.

The difficulty of extending the operation of law to the settlement of disputes between nations is, of course, that there is no superior and impartial authority to enforce it, as there is within a State. International "law" is simply a body of agreements between the leading States as to how they will conduct themselves in peace and war. While it is held in less esteem than before the war, owing to the action of some of the Powers, in setting it at defiance, it is of immense importance to have such a body of agreements; and the fact that they are normally held to be binding, though without any "sanction" behind them, is of great significance. The failure of international law to prevent the present conflict, or to mitigate some of its worst horrors, has led to the widespread demand for a supra-national authority, armed with powers for the enforcement of agreements, parallel to the police-force which is often regarded as the final "sanction" of law within the State.

This is the chief of the "short cuts to Peace" which are now before us, and it is undoubtedly one of the most important questions that can possibly occupy the minds of pacifists.

A number of definite proposals are before the public for the setting up of some kind of supra-national authority, especially that of the American "League to Enforce Peace," to which President Wilson has given his adhesion. Most of these proposals agree that there should be a permanent Court of Arbitration, preferably at The Hague, to hear and adjudicate upon all "justiciable" cases of dispute between nations; and also an International Council of Conciliation, to inquire into "nonjusticiable" cases and report. The Powers that entered into the League of Peace would bind themselves to submit all disputes to one or other of these bodies; to accept the decision of the Arbitral Court; and, in case of a dispute referred to the Council, not to commence hostilities during a fixed period, say six months or a year, while the Council was deliberating.

So far, there is nothing in these proposals which in my judgment should not receive the ardent support of all pacifists. It appears to be clearly the next step in the development of sound international relations; and I can hardly conceive that any Power which desired to convince the world of the pacific intentions which all profess would refuse to enter such a League. But, to most of those who are putting forward proposals of this kind, it seems that a League of Peace would entirely fail of its purpose unless the Powers also bound themselves to employ armed force, if other kinds of pressure proved insufficient, against any member of the League that refused to fulfil its promise. . . . I will only indicate briefly some of the difficulties of the employment of any international "sanction" of a forcible character.

In the first place, the idea of an international police-force seems by the authors of these schemes to be generally regarded as impracticable, and in this I fully agree. The force employed would have to be that of the different nations, each using its own ships or army, though for collective and not individual purposes. This would mean that each nation would still have an excuse for continuing a high expenditure on armaments. Second, it seems clear that the obligation on a particular nation, to use its armed forces for a purpose in which it had no direct interest, would prevent some important Powers from joining such a League at all. The League would therefore in all probability be confronted by a strong minority of outside Powers, and its policy would be that of the Balance of Power in a form more dangerous than ever. Third, the force that such a League could make use of quickly would be mainly naval. This would give an undue predominance to naval Powers like our own, and produce jealousy and distrust in others. Fourth, any serious squabble among minor and backward Powers like those of eastern Europe could no longer be localized, but would almost inevitably lead to world war. Fifth, the most important question of all, that of principle, remains. Can those who sincerely believe that all war is morally wrong, and contrary to the spirit of Christ, unite in promoting measures in which its final necessity is recognized? Granted that the motive would be raised to a higher moral plane if force were employed by a group of nations in what they believed to be the interests of the world, and no longer for purely individual aims—still, it is not easy to see how those who are really convinced of the Quaker view of war can advocate such schemes with any sort of enthusiasm. It may well be that a less complete scheme, whose root principles are sound, will prove practically more effective than a more thoroughgoing one whose principles are wrong. "Better even," says Arthur Ponsonby*, "that it (the scheme) should fail than that the nations should publicly declare for the first time that force is the only effective basis for international unity, and that fear is to be universally established as the motive for obedience to honorable engagements."

If these considerations appeal to us, I think we ought to weigh them carefully and let our voice be clearly heard. At the same time, I believe it would be a disaster if, because of our sense of the extreme danger of these proposals for the use of force, we opposed altogether the formation of a League of Peace. We cannot afford to divide the Peace party as the Temperance party has long been divided because the extremists (sincerely, but in the judgment of many of us mistakenly) believe that to accept half-measures would put back the cause they have at heart. Our right course is, surely, to support the movement, using our best powers to guide it if possible, into safe channels.

EDWARD GRUBB.

*Justiciable cases are those in which the dispute is on some matter of fact, or the interpretation of a treaty, or the application of international law to some particular matter; non-justiciable are those more dangerous disputes in which no such clear issue is presented, like the demand of inland States for seaports, of Russia for a free passage to the Mediterranean, or of Germany for a free "corridor" to the East.

THY WAY, NOT MINE, O LORD!

Thy way, not mine, O Lord.

However dark it be!

Lead me by Thine own hand,

Choose out the path for me.

Smooth let it be, or rough,

It will be still the best;

Winding or straight, it matters not,

Right onward to Thy rest.

I dare not choose my lot,

I would not, if I might;

Choose Thou for me, my God!

So shall I walk aright.

The kingdom that I seek

Is Thine; so let the way

That leads to it be Thine,

Else I must surely stray.

Not mine, not mine the choice

In things or great or small;

Be Thou my guide, my strength,

My wisdom and my all.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHEYNEY TRAINING SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS, 1915-1916.

SUMMER SCHOOL.

The Summer School ought to be looked upon as second to none of the activities of this institution. It is perhaps the most important part of our extension program. It is by means of the Summer School that Cheyney offers to some of those who have in charge the elementary rural schools of the Southland some opportunity, through four or six weeks during the summer, for better training for their special elementary teaching. The Summer School courses have been deliberately adapted to the actual needs of the Negro teacher, principally those in the rural schools. Cheyney has never yet been able to receive all who have sought to enter. The teachers in the far south have looked upon their coming to Cheyney as a significant event in their professional training and progress. Some of them enter here at great sacrifices, both of money saved out of meagre earnings and of time. All have been uniformly enthusiastic about the opportunities offered. However, because of lack of funds, the Managers have been unable to finance a summer session since 1914. It is earnestly hoped that the way will soon open to resume this important work. The Managers hesitate to make a special appeal for fear it will cause contributors to withdraw or curtail their subscriptions to our fund for current expenses, which is the constant and imperative need. If, however, liberal friends of our work feel they can give additional help to reopening the Summer School, our Treasurer will be glad to hear from them.

THE SHELTER.

The Shelter for Colored Orphans, mentioned in the last report, has now been operating a year at Cheyney. It has afforded practice opportunities for our Cheyney seniors, and given to young women of the Domestic Science Department practice in actual household service, as well as in the more difficult management of children. This Shelter school will be of unusual value in the next summer session. Children have always had to come from West Chester for the model classes. While some of these may still be needed, it is most fortunate that we have now throughout the year upon the grounds a group of children with whom approved principles of teaching may be illustrated.

THE TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

During the Spring a significant movement was started at the Cheyney Training School for Teachers in the direction of bringing together, for better mutual understanding and co-operation, the teachers in the colored schools of Pennsylvania and Delaware. Eighty-four of these teachers met at Cheyney on Fourth Month 22, 1916. In addition to listening to addresses by men and women eminent in education throughout the State, they appointed a tentative executive committee, which met early in the Fall to arrange for another meeting early in the new year, whose purpose it will be to effect a permanent organization. The Spring meeting centered its attention upon ways and means of using the Negro schools of these two States more effectively for an improved Negro citizenship. This is a good beginning in organized effort among the leaders of the Negro race in the North, and points to a large new service which has hitherto not been so definitely included in the Cheyney vision.

IN MEMORIAM—WALTER P. STOKES.

The Board of Managers of the Cheyney Training School for Teachers record their sense of loss in the death of their fellow-member, Walter P. Stokes.

Walter P. Stokes was connected with the management of the Institute for Colored Youth and the Cheyney Training School for Teachers from 1890 until his death, Seventh Month 1, 1916. For many years he served the Corporation faithfully as Treasurer, performing the labor and bearing the responsibility of this office in a broad spirit of service. As a Manager we valued his practical advice and his cordial spirit of co-operation and helpfulness. During the last two years his interest in Cheyney had deepened and we had come to depend more and more on the services he was able to render. We feel that his work at Cheyney has been of lasting benefit and that the cause of Negro education has suffered a real loss by the removal of one whose sympathy and practical service were given so freely.

OUR NEEDS.

Each year the Management has been under the necessity of emphasizing the fact that our fundamental need is additional endowment. Our ideal continues to be that of a relatively small school of high standards, filled with the spirit of service, with buildings and equipment sufficient for about 200 carefully selected young men and women who are being trained for the profession of teaching.

This is a big task. It requires much more money than we have ever had to spend. With an attendance of approximately 100 students (as at present) the cost per pupil exceeds $300 each year. Of this amount the student is expected to pay $100. There is left a total sum of not less than $20,000 to be obtained from other sources. This sum is for operating expenses—without any provision for repairs or new improvements, and exclusive of $3,000 that would be needed for the summer school, if it is reopened in 1917.

We ought to complete the dormitory for women. The young men are housed on the top floor of Humphreys Hall (the school building) and should have a separate dormitory. Then, too, we need an agricultural building, with a special endowment to carry the agricultural course, also a central located building to contain a gymnasium, a central dining hall, kitchens and storage space. But before we can feel justified in assuming the responsibility of such further overhead charges, as would have to accompany these permanent improvements, we must ask our friends to recognize the imperative need for additional funds to apply on account of current expenses—so that we shall be able to carry on the work committed to us, to properly provide for normal growth, and all the while to "live within our income." Many Friends of the Negro and of Cheyney have shown a very practical and encouraging sympathy in our work, during the past year, and we are exceedingly grateful to them.

We are more and more convinced that we are engaged in a work of national importance, which justifies the support of patriotic and philanthropic citizens.

UNSEEN, YET KNOWN.

Jesus, these eyes have never seen
That radiant form of Thine;
The veil of sense hangs dark between
Thy blessed face and mine.

I see Thee not, I hear Thee not,
Yet Thou art oft with me;
And earth hath ne'er so dark a spot
As where I meet with Thee.

Like some bright dream that comes unsought
When slumbers o'er me roll,
Thine image ever fills my thought
And charms my ravished soul.

Yet though I have not seen, and still Must rest in faith alone,
I love Thee, dearest Lord, and will,
Unseen, but not unknown.

When death these mortal eyes shall seal,
And still this throbbing heart,
The rending veil shall Thee reveal,
All-glorious as Thou art.

—RAY PALMER, in the Springfield Republican.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

DOWN EAST, OR A RIVERSIDE WILDERNESS.

REGINALD A. SLADER.

In the days of George Fox we read in connection with the persecutions that Friends had then to endure a good deal about Sir John Robinson, Governor of the Tower of London, who did his utmost to break up the Quaker Meetings that came within his ken. His authority extended over a considerable area outside the eastern walls of the City of London, known as the Tower Hamlets, from a number of small villages that existed therein. This area included a wide heath, known as Stebon Heath, that stretched for a considerable distance eastwards, and across which ran two main roads that led respectively to Chelmsford, Colchester and Norwich, and to Barking and Tilbury Fort, further down the Thames.

Between this heath and the upper reaches of the river the country mansions of prosperous city merchants were gradually springing up, and another roadway linked them with each other and with the city, called Ratcliff Highway, gaining its name from the easternmost hamlet to which it extended.

To these outlying hamlets came in course of time Amos Stoddart, of Enfield, Isabel Buttery, from the north of England, and another, with the message of the simple spiritual truth that was being proclaimed far and wide. The message was well received, and several local adherents were gathered into the new Society, meeting together at first in the house of Captain Brock, of Mile End Green. In course of time the meeting outgrew this limited accommodation, and a meeting-house was erected in Brook Street, Ratcliff.

This development was not at all to the liking of Sir John Robinson, who came down with his soldiers, and first tried shutting up the meeting-house, and fining those who continued to preach in the street outside. Then he destroyed the forms and tables, notwithstanding which Friends continued to meet, though there was nothing but the floor upon which to sit. Ultimately he had as much of the building destroyed as possible, twelve cartloads of windows, doors, flooring, glass, lead and tiles being carried away. Nothing daunted the Friends continued to gather on the same spot, and persisted in holding their meetings amid the ruins until the premises had been duly restored. In fact, the meetings were regularly maintained throughout the whole period of persecution, notwithstanding the fact that ill-treatment and arrest continued to be the experience of the members, and the meetings have never yet been closed—an uninterrupted record of two hundred and fifty years.

Like many others, Ratcliff Meeting has, however, seen many changes and vicissitudes, and has at times fallen to a very low ebb. London City would continue to grow, and steadily spread eastwards, gradually absorbing the heath and all the picturesque parts around the hamlet of Ratcliff. The growing overseas trade of the port of London also led to many changes thereabouts. Docks, wharves and warehouses arose all along the banks of the river—an increasing population of riverside laborers grew up—and Ratcliff Highway became a place of ill-repute, notorious all the world over for its evil deeds.

Under such circumstances small wonder that well-to-do Friends gradually moved further away, finding pleasanter homes at Stratford, Plaistow, Hackney and elsewhere. Still a faithful few continued to meet together at the old meeting-house, though more from force of habit than because of the spiritual life in the meetings. Fifty or sixty years ago these lasted for not much more than half-an-hour, and those present seemed glad to get away again to more congenial occupations.

About this time the condition of the Society of Friends generally throughout the country was at a very low ebb, but life was beginning to stir here and there, largely manifesting itself in the First-day Schools that were being opened, some for children, others for adults, under the auspices generally of the Friends' First-day School Association, founded in 1845. One of these schools for children was opened by members of Devonshire House Meeting in Spitalfields, between the city and Ratcliff in 1849, and this venture attracted the attention and enlisted the co-operation of a good many of the better concerned Friends of London, who found through it a means of stretching out a helping hand to the less fortunate section of the community. It prospered and developed along many lines of religious and social uplift, and set an example of Christian evangelization to the Society at large.

The influence of the work at Spitalfields reached Ratcliff by 1866, or thereabouts, and certain members of that meeting, including the late John Hilton, began to gather in their poorer neighbors, who, it was said in a newspaper article of that period, "were almost as untutored as the Sandwich Islanders. Hardly a field of mission labor," it was said, "at home or abroad can be found where ignorance and destitution more abound." Simple Gospel services were held at first, and a First-day School for children started. Sewing meetings for the women and many other activities gradually opened out, and once again, under the fostering care of John Hilton and his devoted wife, Marie, a flourishing Quaker settlement was established in the ancient meeting-house. This was not found adequate to the needs of the growing work. Two or three private houses near by had to be taken for sundry classes and for the Babies' Crèche, the first in London.

A few years later, in 1898, to be precise, a disused chapel in a neighboring main thoroughfare came into the market, and was purchased; and after the needful alterations had been effected, all the work not carried on at the meeting-house was transferred thither, henceforth to be known as the Friends' Mission Institute.

Whilst these alterations were in progress the premises became for a few days the scene of considerable notoriety. The worshippers who had originally owned the chapel had been in the habit of burying their dead in a large underground cellar, and at the time when it was acquired by Friends there were a hundred or more coffins deposited there. The local Medical Officer of Health passing by whilst the repairs were being carried out "spotted" these coffins, and reported their existence to the Home Secretary. The newspapers got wind of the matter, and crowds of curious idlers assembled night after night for a time. Fortunately it was eventually arranged that the coffins should be bricked in where they were, instead of the authorities insisting upon their re-interment in some public cemetery, a process that if carried out would have involved a very serious expenditure.

And year by year the work has been kept going, often in the face of considerable difficulties. Workers are few; the neighborhood becomes ever poorer, and less and less amenable to public order and discipline.

Among the recent transformations that have been effected in the neighborhood, mention must be made of the work among the inmates of one of the common lodging-houses, situated between the meeting-house and the Institute. A few years ago one of the workers felt a concern to try and help these men, who by their drunkenness and quarrelling, made the neighborhood a nightmare to other inhabitants and passers-by. A lady living near, when she heard of the proposal, sent an urgent message to the Friend in question to desist from his intention, for otherwise, she said, his very life would be in imminent danger. The concern, however, was a genuine one, and was persisted in. Our Friend entered the common kitchen one First-day evening, and standing among the men who were scattered over its beflagged floor, began in simple words to proclaim the Gospel message. Resentment by some, utter indifference on the part of most, marked its reception. But the ice had been broken, a beginning had been made, and ever since that day hardly a First-day has passed without the holding of a service in the common kitchen. Gradually a feeling of respect for the bravery and sincerity of the workers became the predominant note of the gatherings, and the men themselves refused to allow interruptions from any present. By degrees the response became cordial, and more intimate relations grew up between all concerned, and some of the habitués of the lodging-house became attenders at the Institute and the meeting-house.

Not only this, but habits improved; men signed the pledge, and kept it, often in spite of fiercest struggles and manifold temptations, for these inmates of the lodging-house were on the lowest rung of the social ladder. Quite a number have subsequently given up their methods of living and have returned to neglected wives or children, or have set up little homes of their own. Those who remained behind acquired a desire for improvements in the social life of the house; pictures were asked for and provided for the common room; and texts hung up in the bed-rooms. One First-day it happened that none of the Friends were present at the lodging-house service, when a visit was paid by Rachel B. Braithwaite, a well-known London Friend. Although quite alone she was well received by the men, and the service was held as usual; as she said afterwards, "We had a thorough Friends' meeting."

Then some one suggested the possibility of a garden in the small square yard at the back, surrounded by high walls on every side. Not a particularly promising spot for a garden, but the enthusiast was not to be deterred. His keenness was infectious; the men set to work and obtained plants and loads of earth, and soon a delightful little garden had been evolved. And here, after the day's work is done, the majority of the men love to sit and smoke, and chat or read the papers, instead of whiling away their time as of yore at the nearest public-house, and the neighborhood enjoys peace and orderliness.

Since the outbreak of the war there has been a marked increase in drinking among women throughout the poorer parts of London. Many of them have more money to spend than they have ever had before. With their men away time has hung heavily on their hands, and they have felt they wanted somewhere in which to exchange mutual sympathies and experiences. Realizing this, the same Friend who was responsible for the transformation at the lodging-house, started a Social Club for the wives and mothers of soldiers and sailors. It has been opened three or four afternoons a week, and has provided a place for social intercourse amid helpful and harmless surroundings. The women can take their little ones, who are provided with toys and kept amused by one of the workers whilst their mothers learn the difficult art of using the sewing needle. In spite of their extreme ignorance in such a domestic necessity, several of the women are proud to tell you that they have already learned enough at their Club to be able to make their own clothing.

The making of artificial flowers has been another occupation that has provided interest for some of the members, and extremely creditable work in this direction has been turned out by them.

Among other activities that have been a marked feature of the work at this centre of Quaker usefulness may be mentioned the untiring efforts that have been put forth on behalf of the rough lads of the surrounding streets, who have been enrolled into a Life Brigade, where they have been trained in various methods of saving life, whether from drowning, from fire or from wounds, and, side by side with this physical culture, have acquired habits of obedience, order and self-restraint. Peace principles, too, have been persistently inculcated among them.

Another noteworthy feature of the work is the large Free Library containing several thousand volumes which are in great demand from week to week. Whenever opened the workers are kept busy at high pressure exchanging books. Many of the readers are Jews, for the neighborhood is becoming increasingly filled by families of this ancient race, and one cannot tell what beneficial influences may not accrue to some of them from this contact with Christian literature.

On more than one occasion the work has been visited by William McGeorge, Junior, a prominent citizen of Philadelphia, Pa., and he has written a very interesting impression of his visits. Speaking of the Infants' Summer Treat, he said, "About eighty little children from this, one of the very poorest districts of London, were assembled for a good time. Various amusements and gymnastics such as were possible indoors, were first provided, into which the children entered with the greatest show of delight. There was nothing elaborate or involving much cost or paraphernalia, but it was all tempered by such a strong spirit of goodwill and affection that both teachers and children seemed very happy. When the amusements and gymnastics were over children and leaders sat down to a plain, but substantial repast in which I joined, getting the indispensable afternoon cup of tea. I have no doubt but that one of the chief joys of the occasion to most of these little children was the fact that on this occasion their hunger was fully appeased. After leaving the Infants' Summer Treat I visited a lodging-house in Stepney Causeway. The house itself is a very remarkable example of the wonderful changes which time produces. This house, which was once a costly home at the end of what was formerly the one important thoroughfare when the hamlet of Ratcliff was a favorite residential suburb, still has carved moldings and doors and other evidences of wealth and great magnificence. It is now in one of the worst slums on the Middlesex side of the Thames. Here for nearly half-a-century the worst wrecks and castaways found a wretched home at five-pence or six-pence a night. Without moral restraint of any kind the condition of these unfortunates can perhaps be imagined but not adequately described. Brawls and fights were almost constant until permission was obtained from the proprietor to visit and talk with the men." And then follows the description of the changes and improvements that have subsequently ensued, as already indicated above.

Such work as that herein described is of necessity costly, and cannot possibly be self-supporting. The responsibility for it is in the hands of the Bedford Institute Association, a body composed of representative London Friends and of those engaged in its mission work in the Metropolis, which is also responsible for similar work in eight other slum districts of London. Its headquarters are at the Bedford Institute, Quaker Street, Spitalfields, London, E., and its Secretary is always ready to receive contributions from any who would feel that they would like to help forward such a work as that so briefly sketched in the foregoing lines.

LETTERS FROM CHINA.

CHENG TU, WEST CHINA, Eleventh Month 30, 1916.

Language school is in full swing again now and playtime is scarce. We have to be ready for our first examinations by the first of the year, and that means to be able to carry on a conversation in Chinese with the examiner, to read and translate the Gospel of John, to write 200 Chinese characters and to know a good deal about the history and geography of this country. Then next year we must go on with our language work with only our Chinese teacher to help us, for language class so far is only for first year work. Those of us who are attending the class this year will be sent off to the various stations where we are to work next year, so that we can not only proceed with our study but also become acquainted with the people and conditions that we will have to work with later. It will be decided at the time of the Yearly Meeting where we are to be, so after the first of Twelfth Month, send my letters to Chungking, care of Friends' Mission, and they will forward them if I am not there, as I may be.

A few weeks ago the language class had the privilege of going through a Confucian temple just as it was being fixed up for a semi-annual ceremony. I have been in several Buddhist temples with their great numbers of ugly idols. The Confucian temples are open only twice a year, so this is the first time I had been in one of them. There are no idols here, only tablets erected to the memory of Confucius and his followers, and these are very simple. This semi-annual ceremony takes place in the wee small hours of the night, and the chief performer is the governor of the province or the person in the place who is highest in official capacity. I believe there are some speeches made, and then there is music and feasting. My Chinese teacher happened to be one of three hundred who were present at this ceremony so he was able to tell me a good deal about it. When we went through the place in the afternoon, bowls full of all sorts of food were being placed in front of the tablets, and there was also a whole bullock, pig and goat before each. It made one think of Old Testament days! But these things are not offered for atonement, nor yet are they sacrificed to Confucius himself, as to the idols in the Buddhist temples. But they are presented to the great sage and his followers that they may invite their friends to come and feast with them. As we came away from the temple we found candy figures of Buddha being sold at the gate. This struck me as being significant in more ways than one. In the first place, it shows how mixed up the two religions are here. At times of funerals, when Confucianism fails to supply enough ritual to suit them, they call in a Buddhist priest to perform the ceremony. In the second place, I think the very fact that they make candy images of Buddha and eat them shows how slight a hold their religion has on them.

Meeting this morning was much larger than usual because we had a sort of Thanksgiving celebration yesterday and the decorations were still up, and lots of people came in, just to see what was doing. Of course, it is at just such times as this that opportunities come of interesting some one enough so that he or she will come again. And I feel more reconciled now than I ever did before to the fact that we do not always have Friends' meetings. Even with people talking to them this morning, it kept two of us busy keeping order on the women's side. We did have a very nice meeting though. Five new members were received. The first was the young woman whom I helped to interview a few weeks ago. Then came four young men, the first one of them, after R. J. Davidson had given him a paper signifying his membership and had spoken briefly of what it meant, asked if he might speak himself. Of course he was told that he might, and he explained very frankly and simply why he wished to be a Christian. The three who followed him did likewise, and all spoke very well indeed. These were university students, and one could not help feeling as one watched their earnest faces, that they would compare very favorably with our college and university students at home. I was so glad for the promiscuous mass of people who were there to hear this sort of thing from their own people. It is quite encouraging to find that I can understand more and more what is said. I got nearly all of one sermon, and if a person starts talking to me in Chinese, I no longer feel lost. The fields are white to the harvest and the laborers are few.

Your distant friend,
JANE C. BALDERSTON.

TEMPERANCE LUNCHEON.

The Anthony Benezet School is situated on Latham Street, near Tenth Street, Philadelphia, in a district where liquor drinking with its baneful effects on the inhabitants is very obvious. The School was founded in 1770, for the education of colored people and their descendants. The proposal to found it was probably brought to the attention of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia by Anthony Benezet.

Sara Kennard has been the Principal of the Benezet School for years, and has labored earnestly for the welfare and advancement of her pupils, knowing that such a mission ought to have a good influence in many ways on the surrounding neighborhood, as well as on the little children themselves. During the year before the wholesome school lunch was established, Sara Kennard has counted in one grade, on the same morning, eleven little pupils, with heads upon their desks, stupidly sleeping off the effects of the beer which they had bought for their breakfast, on the way to school.

As the parents of such children often have to leave them asleep, when they start to their daily work, their custom seems to be to give them a few pennies to buy breakfast and lunch.

Frequently a poor quality of cake or candy and a glass of beer, would be the easiest articles to purchase, although liquor selling to minors is prohibited by law in Philadelphia. The Principal felt that this state of affairs was so harmful, that it must be stopped, and with the aid of a sympathizing Committee and other Friends, she inaugurated a lunch, where good food is served daily, at a price that covers the cost of ingredients. The results of this plan are now apparent. For three years the Principal has observed no child sleeping off the breakfast potion.

The doctor who examined the pupils remarks that the Benezet School is now in better physical condition than any of the schools under his daily care. The progress of the children in their studies shows an improvement under the new régime also, and the parents are influenced thereby.

ONE CENTURY OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

One hundred years ago the American Bible Society was instituted. It has had an honorable history. In a marvelous way it has served humanity. The fact that the centennial of this venerable and efficient organization has been observed this year has brought the Bible into an added degree of public notice. Statistics cannot disclose, or even suggest, the wonderful work done by this Society. The astonishing fact that during ninety-nine years of its existence its issues amounted to 109,926,214 volumes strains the imagination and furnishes a hint merely of the vast amount of fine service contributed to the advancement of Christianity and of civilization by this institution.

Last year—its ninety-ninth year—the Society issued 6,406,323 volumes, which is more than twice the total of the issues of five years earlier, and half a million more than the issues of the British and Foreign Bible Society in its corresponding ninety-ninth year. Here is a still more remarkable fact: More Scriptures were issued by the Society in 1914 and in 1915 in the Chinese language than in the English, the Chinese issues in 1914 being 2,049,432 as against English issues amounting to 1,862,754, reported from the Bible House for the United States. And here is still another astonishing thing: In spite of the war—or, perhaps, because of it—the issues of the American and of the British Societies have increased enormously, the combined output for 1914, for instance, being over 20,000,000 volumes.

Another thing that has brought the Bible into a new degree of popular notice is the effort now being made in various States to reintroduce the reading of portions of Scripture into the daily program of our public schools. In New Jersey a bill has recently become a law which requires the reading of at least five verses of the Old Testament in the public schools of that State, the matter of the reading of the Scriptures having been optional. In New York a bill requiring the reading of the Bible in the public schools failed to pass the Senate the other day through the lack of a single vote. In other States the agitation for the reappearance of the Bible in the life of our public schools is developing with much promise of success.

The Bible is not a worn-out piece of ancient literature. It is full of life, and its proper employment in the affairs of a people will have much to do with the development and maintenance of their higher interests. Some years ago in an address in New York, the late Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, said: "No nation is better than its sacred book, for in that book are expressed its highest ideals of life, and no nation rises above these ideals. The more this Bible enters into our national life, the grander and purer and better will become that life. It would be a great blessing if the Bible could be placed in the hands of every dweller in this country. But there is something more than putting the Book into every man's hands: sending out of teachers of the Bible, competent to explain and illustrate it, and so make it potent as a force in the land. The one who is engaged in bringing this Bible to the people is a patriot." These are the words of truth and soberness, although they may seem—to those who are obsessed with strange misconceptions of what really constitutes the true greatness of a free and independent people—extravagant. The Bible is a wonderful Book, and its influence in the life and upon the character of a nation, and of its citizens individually, when its teachings have an opportunity to come into practical operation, is immeasurable.

PRESIDENT ROBERT L. KELLY writes in The American Friend—

Once more the fact has been impressed upon us in a striking way that Friends have a heritage of priceless ideals. By general consent, the greatest poet in the world to-day, or in this generation, is Rabindranath Tagore, of India. The attention of the world was called to him when a few years ago he was awarded the Nobel Prize for producing the greatest piece of current literature. As is well known, he is now in America, and is speaking in the great centres of population and at some of the centres of learning. When he spoke at Earlham College recently, his auditors were stirred by his remarkable appeal for a broader and a more unselfish brotherhood than is indicated by the present movement of western civilization toward nationalism. As one saw him in his Oriental robes and with his long beard and white hair, and heard his shrill and penetrating voice, he was reminded of the patriarchs of old, and all the more so because of the loftiness of his theme and the earnestness of his appeal. It was interesting to learn in private conversation with him that he knew thoroughly and appreciated the ideals of Friends and was deeply moved by the sufferings which English Friends are now passing through for conscience' sake.

We were privileged to converse familiarly of places and personalities and ideals of common interest. It is generally known by Friends that the other great idealist of this generation, Tolstoj, has ideas similar to our own. It has occurred to me that perhaps it is not so well known that Tagore is a kindred spirit also.

While on this general theme, it may be of interest also to refer to a recent address on "The Development of Memory," by James R. Angell, head of the Department of Psychology of the University of Chicago. He is one of the leading experimental psychologists of our time, and he is an authority for the statement now generally known to psychologists that the latest and most trustworthy experiments demonstrate the fact that the memory is best developed, among other things, if the individual instead of rushing from one line of thought to another, will, after the consideration of a given theme for not too long a time, pause in silence and meditation for an appreciable period. By this means, the ideas become set, and the mental machinery not only conserves what has been done but receives a better preparation for what is to come. Prof. Angell spoke as a relentless scientist and was discussing only mental operations, but I came away from the lecture feeling that if only George Fox and his contemporaries had patented their ideas and allowed their spiritual descendants, through the years, to receive royalties on them, Friends might all by this time be millionaires. Perhaps we should be more appreciative than we are of the richness of truth that has been handed down to us by those great mystics who, through the processes of intuition, were able to get a firm grip on the realities long before the present-day psychologist worked them out by his tedious and laborious laboratory investigations.

NEWS ITEMS.

At the request of the American Union Against Militarism, Wm. B. Harvey went to Washington to attend on the 16th inst. a special hearing before the Senate Committee on Compulsory Military Training, to give his impressions of the evil effects of such training as seen by Wm. C. Allen and himself during their recent travels in Australia and other foreign countries.

THE FRIEND [London], in its issue Twelfth Month 29, 1916, which has just reached us, First Month 11, 1917, states: "This week The Friend [London] as a weekly organ completes its first quarter of a century. It is, of course, much older than twenty-five years. Having been started in 1843, it is now seventy-four years old, forty-nine of which were as a monthly."

WESTTOWN NOTES.—The Westtown officers and faculty are enjoying to the full the changes which have been made in the Teachers' parlor or No. 2. In memory of Mary M. Leeds, a student and teacher at Westtown and for many years an energetic and efficient member of the Committee, her husband and sons have entirely transformed the room. A fire-place has been built, walls and woodwork have been tastefully refinished, and the new furniture is a rare combination of comfort, simplicity and elegance.

On the 2nd school reassembled for work after the holiday vacation. There was an unusual number of absentees on the first few days due in most cases to illness. Fortunately nearly all of the students have now recovered and returned to the School.

On the 5th inst., Judge Benj. B. Lindsey, of Denver, Colo., addressed the School on "The Juvenile Court." He told of the practices and the ideals of the Court, and his earnestness and enthusiasm made him the very embodiment of those ideals. After the lecture Judge Lindsey talked informally to the older members of the School in the Mary Leeds Room. Both he and his wife left a lasting impression on the School.

The boys have begun their recess gymnastics under the management of L. Raiston Thomas. For about five minutes they exercise vigorously in the open air with some arm and body movements. The girls continue to take their ten minute "A. M. Walks."

The sledding track, which the boys so successfully built on the north slope past the hospital just before vacation, was still in good condition when we returned to the School. The flexible flyers, which are now used exclusively, ran all the way to the lake and in some cases far across the ice.

The skating has also been enjoyed to the full. The warm spells and the rains, while they interfered at times, have served to keep the surface in very good condition.

C. W. P.

THE Philadelphia papers of the 12th made the following announcement: Dr. William Wistar Comfort, head of the Department of Romance Languages at Cornell University, has been elected to succeed Dr. Isaac Sharpless as President of Haverford College, when the latter retires at the end of the present college year. The announcement was made yesterday at Haverford, after a meeting of the Managers of the college corporation.

OAKWOOD SEMINARY—at Union Springs, on Cayuga Lake—the Westwood of New York Yearly Meeting, narrowly escaped a serious fire on the 2nd.

Pupils were just returning from their vacation and at the noon hour flames were discovered on the third floor of the central building and the fourth floor of the girls' wing. The local fire company came to the rescue and the damage done was not serious—the estimated loss being $5000.

A temporary roof has been placed over the burnt section, the girls in the interval being housed in the old Howland School in the village which adjoins the grounds of Oakwood.

THE PEACE COMMITTEE of New York Yearly Meeting is an active body—the Chairman, Edward Thomas, has just addressed the following to the members of the Committee:

To-day an opportunity is fairly thrust upon Friends—such an opportunity as they have not had for fifty years. We have this opportunity because the question is asked, "What are the Quakers going to do about the Welsh, Slater and Stivers Acts in New York State?"

The Welsh Act should be amended to take all power over the schools away from the military commission. The Slater Act should be repealed, because it makes military training compulsory for all boys between sixteen and nineteen at the will of a military commission. The Stivers Act should be amended to deprive the Governor of the power to draft men at will into the National Guard.

Neither the Slater Act nor the Stivers Act requires the military authorities to exempt anyone, no matter how his conscience directs him. Even though the New York State Legislature and administration are still strongly militaristic, a reaction is on its way which needs our continuous help. This year there were elected several avowedly anti-militaristic congressmen from New York State, instead of one only. There are a number of anti-militarists in the State Senate and Assembly. Please find out the names of these; write to them and encourage them; watch the schools in your vicinity and be sure that the boys are not given guns.

Tell the Friends in your meeting what you are doing and awaken them to the necessity of following your example.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Counting work days only there was an average of eight deaths a day in Pennsylvania during 1916, due to industrial accidents. This announcement was made by Commissioner John Price Jackson.

State Zoologist J. G. Sanders, of the State Department of Agriculture, in an estimate says that reports show a loss of $25,000,000 a year to farmers, fruit growers and market gardeners due to insect pests. The cereals were damaged to the extent of $10,000,000 and fruits about $8,000,000.

GENERAL.—The Ledger of the 11th says editorially: "There will be no disposition anywhere, and there should be least of all in the liquor trade, to minimize the tremendous importance of two events during the present week having direct bearing upon the movement for the prohibition of the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating liquors. The first, of course, was the sweeping decision of the Supreme Court of the United States sustaining the Webb-Kenyon law prohibiting the shipments of liquor into States which have already banned the trade. And the second was the adoption by the United States Senate, by the unexpectedly large vote of 55 for to 31 against, of the bill prohibiting the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia."

Tuskegee Institute's statistics of lynchings for 1916 is encouraging in that the total of 54 shows a decline of 13 compared with the previous year. The record for 1916, however, is still inferior to that of 1913.

Only one of the fifty children in a farm schoolhouse near Blocker, Okla., escaped injury when a tornado shattered the building on the 4th.

The vast improvement in sanitation and other safeguards of health in the past half-century is strikingly brought to mind by the New York City Health Department's analysis of the city's statistics of disease and death in 1916. In the half-century the death-rate has been reduced from 36 per 1000 of population to less than 14.

A Boston weekly has the following: "Eighteen million persons, in North America alone, begin with the new year a six months' course of study in John's Biography of Jesus. This is an educational project of immense proportions and importance, and yet, because it is not new, it excites little remark. Doubtless the Sunday-school is a more potent force in shaping a people's ideals than all the universities of the land. With characteristic acuteness of judgment, President Wilson once wrote: 'The Sunday-school of to-day is the code of morals of to-morrow.'

The Massachusetts Audubon Society has sent out thousands of copies of the following plea, entitled "Please feed the birds":—"The deep snow covers their usual food—insects' eggs and larvae and the seeds of weeds—and they will starve unless we feed them. Give them hayseed, chaff from the barn floor, crumbs, scraps of meat, bones and suet; anything eatable, and they will repay you a thousand fold by their work in the garden and orchard all the Spring."

The Presbyterians of the United States eight years ago established in Chieng-mai, Siam, an asylum for lepers which has sheltered three hundred lepers, and is now caring for 180 lepers, most of whom have been converted to Christianity.

At the present time the United States has seventy-five beet sugar factories, located in fourteen States.

FOREIGN.—R. A. Bosch, the manufacturer, of Stuttgart, has given 13,000,000 marks for the canalization of the river Neckar, says a dispatch from Berlin. Until the project is started the interest on the fund will go to the municipality of Stuttgart for war relief purposes.

Sixty persons were killed or injured by avalanches in the Tyrol last month, according to Innsbruck newspapers. The snowfall is said to have been the heaviest in many years. On the Brenner Pass, on the 5th inst., an avalanche killed ten and injured eighteen workmen who were engaged in clearing a road.

Three hundred persons have been killed and many injured in a disastrous earthquake in Central Formosa, according to special dispatches from Taihoku, the capital of Formosa. It is estimated that 1000 houses have been destroyed.

NOTICES.

An address by Henry St. George Tucker on "Our Present Relations with Japan and How We May Make Them More Friendly" will be given at the Twelfth Street Meeting-house, Second-day, First Month 29th, at 7.45 P. M.

The speaker is a personal friend of Gilbert Bowles and unites with him in his peace work. For many years he has been at the front in Christian work in Japan and speaks from a wealth of experience which few, if any, can command.

The meeting is held under the direction of the Friends' Missionary Society and of the Philadelphia Friends' Peace Committee.

THE Friends' Home for Children, 4011 Aspen Street, gives an oyster supper and entertainment every year at the Scottish Rite Building, 148 N. Broad Street. The Home is non-sectarian in its admission of poor children, the supper is given for the double purpose of encouraging sociability among the friends who support the Home and as a means of income. Tickets are $1.00 and can be purchased of Allen B. Clement, 225 S. Sixth Street or Wm. J. MacWatters, 1220 Market Street.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The consecutive reading of the sixteen delayed copies of The Friend (London) has made impressions quite distinct from those that result from reading the single numbers as they come to hand weekly. First of all, the amount of relief work in the exigencies of the present devastating war assumes something of its real proportions. We are candidly quite overpowered with the sums of money expended, with the number of Friends engaged, with the great diversity of the tasks in England, in France and Belgium, in Holland and in the far East; but most especially are we impressed with the quality of all this work. Being absolutely disinterested it has produced results that we are not surprised to find described as "miracles."

The outstanding feature, however, in this volume of four months' activity is the fact that with the multiplied exactions of so many kinds of relief work time is found for most serious study and discussion of what is styled reconstruction. One might look upon relief work as a kind of reconstruction, but something much more radical is understood by it in England, and this different understanding we are pleased to say seems to be spreading to our own country. The line of reasoning by which this new idea of reconstruction is reached is comparatively simple. It proceeds somewhat like this: there must be something radically wrong in the construction of human society, even apart from politics, to make war possible. Let us then frankly challenge our industrial, educational and social systems to see whether they reflect political weaknesses, and whether this is because they have root principles at variance with the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. The field of study thus opened out is by no means simple. Civilization is a great complex of right and wrong motives. Many who are bound by false systems have high aims, nor do such often feel that radical changes are required to realize the highest aims. So the committee in London Yearly Meeting charged with the study and exposition of principles of reconstruction must do their work in the face of no little suspicion and opposition even from fellow-members. The general Conference conducted during the summer by this committee was followed by murmurs of "Socialism." One Friend wrote that it seemed to him the "Society is rather floundering in a gale of aspirations." Aspirations are certainly wholesome, especially if they set fundamental principles in array. More than that, perhaps, the committee cannot hope to do at once.

It may be of interest to note briefly the fundamentals that have come to the surface in this discussion. First in considering the present industrial system there has been little dissent from the thought that competition is at root a war principle. Naturally co-operation has been heralded as the cure for the competitive system. Perhaps it may not be out of the way to observe that in much of the discussion no reasonable relationship between competition and co-operation has been recognized. Any rivalry, in the final analysis, may be evil, but some have felt that our present industrial system has developed measures of co-operation that have seemed regenerative.

In the domain of education we in America cannot readily appreciate certain English distinctions. These are so ingrained that even the Friends' Boarding Schools reflect them. The outcome of the whole class system is that the bulk of English children leave school at about eleven. The vigorous call of reconstruction demands that adequate provision for all children shall be made up to seventeen. In American terms this is equivalent to the declaration that the High School shall be nationalized. Perhaps we think this has been done in our country. In a recent article President Edmund J. James, of the University of Illinois, says: "No other civilized country can show so large a number of children absolutely beyond the reach of what may be by any stretch of courtesy called a good elementary school, as we have in the black regions of the South, or in the mountain regions of our Appalachian territory." So any call of reconstruction in educational lines in order to give justice to helpless children is a call to be heeded on both sides of the Atlantic!

Naturally very much of the whole problem of reconstruction is made to hinge upon the social system. It is in dealing with this phase that the charges of socialism have been excited. The war at least has brought no greater shock to traditionalism than is involved in its socialistic measures. The extent of these even in a neutral country is put very lucidly in a striking editorial in the New York Evening Post. A brief quotation in regard to Denmark will convey the drift of affairs:

"Thus there are to be standard shoes and standard clothes, all alike, and all made as economically as possible. It will be a penal offense to offer anything else for sale. The Price Regulations Commission is already exercising authoritative power over all factories, workshops, and farms, fixing all prices under penalty of seizure by the State. The State Necessaries Commission is now the chief importer of wheat and corn. More than that, the State has fixed a minimum income of $500. All families with less than that sum are subsidized by the State, which sells coal and coke to them at half-price and other goods below cost. In addition, the State, because of the increased cost of living, is allowing 30 per cent. supplements to all persons drawing old-age, sickness, or unemployment pensions. This goes to explain why Denmark is so eager to sell its unprofitable West Indian Islands to the United States for twenty-five millions of dollars. Finally, there are to be prohibitive taxes on luxuries, backed by prison penalties, and all of this is justified on the ground that otherwise the State will collapse under the economic pressure of the war."

Not the least striking part of this statement is its conclusion, for the unmistakable symptom of a wrong social system is everywhere extravagance. The war has had this reflex in many directions in America. Thus the Boston Transcript reprints from the New York Mail an article entitled, "An Orgy of Extravagance," which has this conclusion:

"There never was and there never will be profit or good in extravagance. An extravagant nation will pay the same penalty as an extravagant individual. With all the misery, horror and desolation the war has entailed, and with all the need for help to save others from hunger and suffering, our waste and extravagance brand us as callous, careless and uncharitable.

"There is no need for Puritanism; but there is need for sanity."

In the French Revolution and many times since Denmark has been heralded as the cure-all for social ills. As we recognize with growing fear that it has not put an end to poverty on the one hand, or the "orgy of extravagance" on the other, we confess to feeling with Professors Cram and Sarton in the recent Lowell lectures that there is indicated "an awful and crushing advance of materialism unless modern education can be moved forward under some new and better guidance." Surely Christianity must be that guidance! We can hardly believe it will lead us into such nationalized socialism as is pictured in the quotation above as already a fact in Denmark. The socialism of John Woolman led another way. Its sacrifice too was for service, but for service in the spirit rather than in the letter. If our soul is actually sound in America then "our riches, our men and women are at command for the service of the whole family of earth." Many of us may have to renounce much to make such a reconstruction possible. We cannot dismiss the hope that the foundation stones are already set for some in the right place for a real "City of God."

"But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."—2 Samuel 12-23.

Grief, pressing like an angry autumn wind,

Pulls vainly at the portals of my heart,

And hopes, with gust of tears, my way to blind,

And thrusts the curtain of my hope apart,

The secret treasure of my peace to find:

And, pushing with its sobbing strength,

It strives to break the door at length.

I have a talisman such rage to stem:

Though Death, Grief's captain, bears on sable wings

Those that I love, my heart, triumphant, sings—

"They cannot come to me, but I shall go to them!"

Time, like a jailer, binds with sin's rough cord

The feet that fain would hasten toward their rest;

And Fears close follow in a clamorous horde,

And mocking, hurl their missiles at my breast,

And Doubts, that vainly with my faith have warred,

Now send abroad their shafts of subtle pain,

And breathe the poison of their damps in vain.

In spite of foes, I wear a victor's diadem:

For Time, Fear, Doubt and Pain fall fast away;

Toward those I love, no force my fight can stay,

"They cannot come to me, but I shall go to them!"

—MARY ALETHEA WOODWARD, in The Living Church.

He liveth long who liveth well!

All other life is short and vain;

He liveth longest who can tell

Of living most for heavenly gain.

Be what thou seemest, live thy creed,

Hold up to earth the torch divine;

Be what thou prayest to be made,

Let the Great Master's steps be thine.

IN THE FACE OF WAR.

A CHRISTIAN'S MEDITATION.

Gloom is over the earth. Armies have drenched the fields with blood; homes are in ruins; women and children suffer famine. Where the beautiful mountains stand the darkness lowers. Who can carry glad hearts or smiles in the face of the storm?

But all that made the storm was here before. We knew that the world is on its costly road upward. We knew the ocean of barbarism behind us. We knew that anger, suspicion, misunderstanding, envy, arrogance, jealousy, selfishness, lie still untamed in a myriad hearts. We had seen the monster ships built to devour one another. We had seen soldiers practicing to fight and kill. There were plenty of signs of the coming storm. The clouds were over the tops of the mountains.

The mountains are standing unharmed. The same sky is over us, blue in the infinite depths. The light has never ceased. What great spiritual reality is not coming into view, clearer than ever? Loyalty, devotion, sympathy, heroism, gleaming out of a multitude of humble lives, faith in justice and right, more fervent than ever, lift themselves above the gloom. There is serenity, wisdom, and confidence foretelling better days. There are happy homes and brave hearts solemnly glad in the grand gift of love. There is light in the eyes of the children.

Whose heart has grown smaller in the presence of sorrow? Who desires to run away from his post or have no share in the burdens that all are set to lift? Who resists the flood of generous impulse that pours through the world?

The noble memories are with us ever. Saints and heroes, prophets and poets, saviours and lovers of men are calling to us. They have stood as we stand now—unafraid in the face of the storm.

No clouds are black enough to shut away the shining ideals. We see what is precious and permanent. We will give ourselves anew to do justice, to love mercy, to follow truth, to make good will prevail, to accomplish lasting peace among the nations. We turn from the chaos of passion and force and lift up our eyes to the hills of beauty, goodness and power.

A CALL FROM ACROSS THE SEA.

[A few weeks ago there was handed to one of our subscribers an open letter written some time since by Chas. P. Trevelyan, the distinguished author and statesman of Great Britain. It was the hope of the bearer of this letter that she might succeed in having it appear in many of the prominent dailies of this country. In this she was disappointed and any one who reads the letter will not long wonder for an explanation. It has appeared in a few religious journals and in view of the overtures for peace inaugurated by Germany since the letter was written, it is not likely that its publication will be general, but a special interest attaches to the letter because of the distinguished character of its author and because it shows something of the efforts that have been put forth for the past year to discover means by which peace may be brought about. Chas. P. Trevelyan is a member of the international movement in England, which would urge upon our government its duty to mediate through a conference of neutral nations and to support our President in any effort for Peace. The open letter is as follows:—EDMUN.]

In the week when Europe was rushing down into war, before I believed that my own country would become involved in it, I spoke at a dinner of the Mayflower Club in London.

I said that, if the catastrophe did come to Europe, the Mayflower would become a name of even greater meaning to the world. For the one hope for the preservation of our western civilization would be the United States. And now as the war months lengthen into years I know my prophecy to be true. The relative strength of America grows as the vitality of Europe is ebbing away. It is not the loss of money and of credit. It is not only the waste and desolation of provinces during the war and the economic catastrophes and political upheavals which will everywhere follow in its wake. It is not only the millions of dead and maimed among the young men. But it is the complete collapse of the old national standards. Three years ago no Englishmen would have believed that even the stress of a great war would make it impossible to know the truth about the failure or success of military or diplomatic efforts of the government; that news would be officially suppressed and garbled; that newspapers would print just what Government censors told them and no more. Nor would anyone here have believed three years ago that nearly two thousand Englishmen would have been imprisoned for conscientious refusal of military service, some of them condemned to death, and only respited at the last moment, and many bullied and tortured by the military. These things and many others are the price of a war like this. After the war tyranny and militarism may possibly be burnt up in the wrath of instinctive popular reaction in Germany and Great Britain. But in Germany they will cling with fierce tenacity to their old strongholds and in Britain to their new found opportunity. It is in this struggle that the profound effect of America may be felt with its unbroken tradition of liberty, its existing democratic success, its faith in peace. If in these things it remains faithful, it will not only secure its own immense destiny, but remain a beacon to the old nations in the hour of their agony and despair.

But there is practical and immediate help which America can be giving to the world, beyond the ultimate force of its example. It is that about which I chiefly wish to write. Americans must by this time be chary of believing the press of the belligerent countries. But there is nothing about which less truth is told than about the real feelings of the belligerent peoples. The newspapers only represent what they would like them to be and the more imaginative section of the ruling class still think they are. But that picture bears not the slightest relation to the truth. Probably the people of Great Britain are the least weary of the war. We started the richest of the warring nations. So we are still. Owing to the prodigious credit there is a fictitious prosperity created by high wages which prevents the positive want which in Germany and Austria accentuates the other catastrophes of war. Until the battle begun on the Somme the idea of the wholesale slaughter of the British youth had not entered into the ordinary calculations of Englishmen. But even so, the war weariness is rapidly becoming universal in Great Britain. It is not that a movement for peace at any price either has existed or has begun to exist. Those who like myself and colleagues have for months been pressing in the House of Commons and out of it for an early effort at negotiations, have no more desire than the wildest war-monger that the war should end before Germany is ready to evacuate France and Belgium and by acts acknowledge the abandonment of all designs at aggression or aggrandizement. Meetings such as we hold to discuss what line a reasonable peace should follow are now attended by increasing multitudes of attentive people. In the great industrial centres—Yorkshire, Wales and Glasgow—there is never any disturbance. There is simply a clearly increasing desire for the Government to negotiate a peace if it can. And there is nothing which has given such a stimulus to this feeling as the interview of Lloyd George.

For the first time a responsible British statesman openly avowed his belief in a prolonged war of attrition. Coming immediately after the gravity of the British losses on the Somme had begun to give the British public some notion of what a war of attrition meant to them, many moderate supporters of the war have begun to think seriously whether it is not time for the Government to formulate its real objective and see how nearly the Germans are prepared to meet them.

If I were asked to briefly define the attitude of the mass of my countrymen I should say, that they are heartily sick of the war; that they are not aware of the weariness of the Germans and the willingness of the German Government to negotiate and that consequently they regard peace as hopeless and therefore are not yet prepared to advocate it. But if once it were brought to the consciousness of ordinary Englishmen that Germany were ready for a reasonable peace, to abjure her conquests and above all to evacuate and help to compensate Belgium, a rapid and radical change would appear in popular opinion. At the moment it is clear that the belligerent Governments will not have mediation. But what I have said suggests that there is another possible function for neutral Governments besides trying behind the diplomatic scenes to bring the proud Governments together. Those governments all eventually watch and fear public opinion. The art of forming, deluding, changing and enraging public opinion has been cultivated during the war by the authorities of every belligerent country as a principal department of their activity. The hatreds of the peoples have been cultivated by the exaggeration of every wrong act and the suppression of every decent act of the enemy. For in the last resort the continuance of the war depends on hate. If, however, some voice so loud that it reverberated across the seas, so important that the censorship could not exclude it, spoke not to the Governments but to the Peoples, a change would begin to come. Suppose that to the British people, for instance, an American President were to be able to say in quite simple and direct language that Germany was ready to give up Belgium and France if the British Government would negotiate. First would come a roar of indignation from the reactionary British press. The Government circles would shudder at the lack of diplomatic reserve. There might be no open response at once. But from the day of the utterance public opinion would begin to form on the irrefutable knowledge that a peace could be obtained satisfactorily on the question which was most vital to the British people. This indeed asks the American President to risk his possible value as a backstairs diplomat. But American presidents are apt to believe that the common-sense of common men can make better judgments on vast issues than even well meaning rulers. They apply that faith in their own political crises. Perhaps they might help our poor European world by trusting the soul of our common folk.

It is possible that it might be said in objection to my view that President Wilson has already tried and failed to obtain response from European opinion. Six months ago he announced the willingness of America to abandon the old policy of isolation and to co-operate in ensuring the peace of the world. It is true that this great historic utterance was treated with strange neglect by the belligerent Governments. Its meaning was distorted by the European press. It seemed to be seed falling on hard ground. Only those of us who in these dark days had our eyes on the international picture are fully grateful yet for that pronouncement which at once gave us hope. We know that the better desires of our own British statesmen had presented international co-operation as the hope of the world at the end of the war. Premier Asquith and Lord Grey of Faldoon had mentioned it. It had been left to us to preach it incessantly in these war days. No member of the Government or of those busy only with the war ever spoke of it again. But to us all it was a great beacon of hope that the American Government had officially declared itself for the creation of an international system and announced its willingness to co-operate. We regretted that there was no immediate recognition of this policy by the British Government. But they are laboring in heavy waters. And while half the cabinet is talking about continuing the war by economic means as soon as the military operations cease, it is hard for the more rational half of the Cabinet to talk about the League to Enforce Peace. But Lloyd George's declaration in his interview against the mediation of America or any other neutral nation was so direct a rejection (perhaps unintended) of the American offer that discussion began. Lloyd George was forced by myself in the House of Commons to give a tardy recognition of the value of the President's offer. And a few days later Lord Grey made a franker and more hearty acknowledgment of the possibilities opening out after the war, as a result of the new policy.

Great Britain is now aware of the hope offered to the world by the President's speech and by the acceptance of the policy by both parties in the Presidential struggle. But our people do not yet fully see its bearing on the conclusion of the war.

What is it that we seek, what does saner opinion seek in France, Germany and elsewhere? It is security for which the nations are crying. They fear to sheathe their swords if they do not see security looming in the near distance. But what offers security except this very League of the Nations which European statesmen will only think of as an expedient to be considered after the war is over. My countrymen do not yet see—but they will if you are persistent—that your approval of the League of Peace amounts to American co-operation in the objects for which they profess to be fighting—a secure civilization. Sooner or later your espousal of that plan will affect the course of the war. It will shorten it. They do not yet see that your plan ought to be the first of the terms of peace. Is it altogether impossible that, as the war drags on wearily for the next few months, the newly elected President should be insisting more and more on the value of the new American policy until it becomes the plain hope of Salvation for Europe? It needs to be repeated. For in these days the essence of a democratic appeal is that it should be incessant until it is fully understood. If this message is heard in loud and ever louder tones across the Atlantic it will end by being the policy of the world. It will take the place of the fury of war denunciation, of the threats of annihilation and of the ravings of revenge, of which we are all so weary here.

CHARLES P. TREVELYAN.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF JUSTINE DALENCOURT.

[These extracts have been long delayed, partly because of the tardiness of the mails. They will come to our readers, however, with the same feeling of freshness with which they greeted us.—EDITORS.]

Our readers may recall that this Friend in Paris has had a training school for young women as nurses and Bible-readers combined, since 1872. She is now over seventy years of age, but continues bravely at her post, aided by English Friends' money. If any American inclines to help, communicate with H. P. Morris, Olney, Phila. A country-house, Le Repos, forty miles north of Paris, generally claims J. Dalencourt each summer. She writes from Paris, Seventh Month 12, 1916:

"I have read the London Yearly Meeting Epistle in THE FRIEND and translated it at one of our First-day Meetings.

"We spent a day on the hill at St. Cloud; many said they had no heart for joyful rest, as they had lost some of their sons, or were so anxious about them, still we were sixty-four in number.

"I invited seven ladies, refugees from the north, the family of a Baptist pastor who has been mobilized, and four ladies of another nice Christian family to come and live at their own cost at Le Repos. Everyone seems overworked if not depressed, only needing to be reminded

'Meanwhile God is leading slowly, surely,
Through the shadows with a hand of love.'

"I could not undertake to have boarders. But those beautiful shades in the wood and orchard, those airy rooms, that strengthening air, when so many hearts and minds need them. . . ."

LE REPOS, Eighth Month 20, 1916.

"I came here suddenly on hearing that one hundred and twenty soldiers who were living on the premises, would soon be leaving and that it was wise to have Le Repos inhabited by its owners before other soldiers arrive. The troop was '6Me Chasseurs Alpine.' The commander was courteous, and when smilingly I said I came to ask for hospitality, he excused himself for having taken so much room—they would not be left much longer in such a little Paradise; our orchard, wood and lawn were strewn with men lounging or sleeping, the officers slept almost the whole day—we two ladies kept to our little corner.

"An earnest pastor said they were gambling with money. I was almost suffocated that such a thing was going on under the roof of a house so completely the Lord's. On the following night they gathered again—I did not sleep at all, entreating God to rid me of such people. A Protestant sergeant came with orders of departure for the troops. I told him my trouble, dwelling on the wickedness of such ways in times of such dreadful events, owing to the absence of the knowledge of God in our army—alas, his brother who is at Dunkirk, says the English officers are no better, war degrades most of them inclining to drink.

"All the troops who pass through our country go to Somme; we hear that some of the 'Chasseurs Alpine,' who left us, have been killed.

"When those six-score men had gone, we had work indeed. The two houses, especially the kitchens, were dirt itself, grease, parings, fragments of china and glass. I had sent five telegrams from my expected visitors to come at once.

"Meanwhile another troop arrived; I said I expected company, so I only had six lieutenants in the outside sheds and three horses. They have been exceedingly quiet and well behaved; I am thankful that I have been here, although another cleaning in perspective and another troop, artillery, the famous 'Gun 75.'

"And now, dear C., thou proposes a time of rest for me and my companions. Certainly it would be strengthening, if we could find a place where there would be no work, but when I hinted at holiday, my girls said, "Nothing like 'Le Repos,' we feel lost and empty without you."

"There is service here for the Master and while it is day it had better be done. My Lord's restorative power is not exhausted; my age allows me more plainness of speech than to younger women with some of our tenants.

"Much writing follows me here, fourteen letters in one day received. I had to get up in the night after three or four hours' sleep to be ready for a kind sergeant to take my letters to Marseilles.

"I have bought portions of Scripture and distributed two hundred, having eight hundred more. On the eve of our artillery's departure, a medical doctor came to ask me for a copy of Genesis, saying, 'That book fascinates me, I did not know of its existence.' When they were at supper, I knocked at the dining-room door and asked if they would accept New Testaments as a souvenir of Le Repos. They all stood, accepted and said they never had one; we covet a copy of Genesis, it is interesting indeed!

"We had a good talk about the genesis of all created things, of sin, of God's manifested love in the promise of a Redeemer. After I had left, they were heard discussing, one shouting, 'Yes, but before the creation, before, do you hear, before!' I have never heard them speak of universal brotherhood as this last fortnight. Hate is shouted, but one hears whispers of universal sympathy. . . ."

"Our two dear girls in the last bombardment at Rheims, which has reduced their hospital to crumbs, have had a narrow escape indeed. An incendiary shell fell on that very room and they had to flee in their night-ropes—every bit they had is burnt.

"Others of our former students who married pastors in the provinces, have had ability given them to preach in their husbands' absence during the war. Their people urged this ministrations, a new thing in France.

"Should I leave now, I would get nothing out of our fruit and vegetables, whereas we are already making preserves, hastening before new troops come. Some young trees in our garden will grow like invalids, crooked and deformed if they are not pruned, and it seems to me a dishonor to God's beautiful creation to see a tree distorted.

"To attend to that in the open air will do me physical good and give me rest of mind. I care for the well-being of this property, Le Repos, not for my profits (I have none materially, the reverse), but because I consider it my Master's.

"Thine very lovingly,

"JUSTINE DALENCOURT."

JOSHUA L. BAILY.

No Friend of Philadelphia of recent date has received so much public notice from the city press at the time of his death as our late friend Joshua L. Baily. This was due to the large number of public interests into which he had thrown his influence as well as to the substantial and material support he had given them.

THE FRIEND cannot allow the opportunity to pass without paying its tribute to the memory of a man who through so many years has been identified with the various interests and concerns of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

He was an infant when the first number of THE FRIEND was issued in 1827, and I have more than once heard him say that among his earliest recollections were the family readings from THE FRIEND on First-day evenings.

There may have been a period in his life when THE FRIEND filled a very inconspicuous place with him, but during the past twenty years he has been one of its closest readers and has encouraged the management from time to time by his messages of approval and has been willing also to express a word of regret at certain expressions published which he could not endorse. His criticisms and strictures upon the paper were always kindly, and were thus helpful and constructive. He has shown me the manuscript notes he made (but never published) at the sessions of various Yearly Meetings he has attended, having made the statement that he was present at all the different American Yearly Meetings between 1845 and 1855, when the spirit of separation was active. His notes are full and accurate and almost as complete as a modern trained stenographer could make them. In this connection I have recently learned that he also was in the practice when a young man of writing a review of each session of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and learning that Joseph Walton, afterward for many years Clerk to the Meeting, had followed the same practice, he gained his consent to compare the two. It was remarkable how closely the two agreed, though the authors of the notes viewed many of the topics that came before the Meeting from very different angles.

It was a treat which many Philadelphia Friends of my own age enjoyed more than once, to sit with Joshua L. Baily for an hour in his city office, listening to his pleasant reminiscences of Society concerns. He was generous of his time, as he was generous of all that he possessed, and he was a poor listener indeed who did not come from these interviews refreshed and helped by what he had heard.

No better word applies to Joshua L. Baily's character than to say that he was a devoutly serious man. I have known him more than once when discussing in private a matter of very grave import stop and wait as if to know whether he had liberty to proceed and then as he saw the way clear, he would say: "I must step with caution for we are on holy ground."

There were certain books that I shall always associate with this good man. The bookshelves in his office contained many of them, and whenever he knew where a copy would be acceptable, it was taken down, wrapped and mailed and the recipient in many cases remained ignorant of the name of the giver. I have in mind especially the Journals of William Allen, William Forster and the Life of Elizabeth Fry. He was an ardent admirer of Stephen Grellet and was more than once a guest at Stephen Grellet's home in Burlington. An expression of his which I have heard more than once was this, "Of all the Friends since the days of the founders, none have come so near measuring up to them in dedication of life and purpose as Stephen Grellet."

Joshua L. Baily was remarkably well informed on Quaker history; it is related of him that while a guest at a large mountain hotel among a company of highly educated people, the general conversation drifted to the peculiar tenets of the Friends, and without special preparation or indeed without warning, he entertained as well as informed the company by a resumé of the history of Friends and their literature, holding the company attentive listeners for an hour, at the close an invitation being extended for a second talk.

This is a method of advancing Friendly views not often embraced by the present generation, and one if attempted that would prove a sad failure with most of us.

Joshua L. Baily became one of the "merchant princes" of Philadelphia. He was in active business seventy-five years, beginning when several years younger than most boys now enter college and continuing his connection with business affairs until his death. He was liberal with his money and his time, and his sympathies were ever with the unfortunate. The calls for help were incessant and as varied as the interests of men could devise. If one were to mention the major philanthropies that appealed to him, the list would include, his generous donations for the uplift of the Negro race; his work in the temperance cause through a long series of years when it was anything but popular to espouse it; his life-long interest in the circulation of the Bible, being President of the American Bible Society for some years; his active leadership in prison reform and allied reformatory measures; he was actively associated with the Pennsylvania Prison Society for sixty-six years, and during the last ten years of his life, he was its president; and lastly his firm advocacy by his pen, his voice and his purse of the cause of arbitration.

One might devote long chapters to each of these topics and Joshua L. Baily's service to them, and then not have exhausted the field and have left other territory almost as rich in results untouched.

There is probably not an activity carried on under the auspices of Friends of Philadelphia but has felt the help this good man gave it, and the larger work outside the pale of his Society grew as years passed over him.

Though he passed his last years largely between his beautiful home at Ardmore, in Montgomery County, and his summer cottage at Mt. Pocono, he was always a Philadelphian of Philadelphia. Few plans for the betterment of his beloved city escaped his notice; when it was suggested two years ago that William Penn's Prayer for Philadelphia be cast in bronze and the tablet be placed where the passers-by must read it—the thought met with his cordial approval and elicited an expression from him that might itself some day be classic.

It is beautiful to have lived such a life; to have held God's gifts of wealth and influence and patronage, as talents from Him to be accounted for; to have mingled with the great of this world and to have won their respect and admiration, and to have been very close in real fellowship and sympathy with those who were lowly and out of sight, to have ministered to their comfort and to their best life and never to have counted the cost or the effort.

"But Lord, to-morrow!
What of to-morrow, Lord?
Shall there be rest from toil,
Be truce from sorrow?
Be living green upon the sward,
Now but a barren grave to me,
Be joy for sorrow?
"Did I not die for thee?"
Do I not live for thee?
Leave Me, to-morrow!"

THE PASTURE BARS.

The hunted stag, now nearly spent,
Turns homeward to his lair:
The wounded Bedouin seeks his tent
And finds safe shelter there.

So life returns upon its track
We toil, we fight, we roam,
Till the long shadows point us back,
And evening brings us home.

To-night beside the pasture bars
I heard the whippoorwill,
While, one by one, the early stars
Came out above the hill.

I heard the tinkle of the spring,
I heard the cattle pass
Slow through the dusk, and lingering
To crop the wayside grass.

O weary world of fret and strife,
O noisy years and vain,
What have you paid me for my life
Since last along this lane,

A barefoot boy, I drove the cows
In Summer twilights still
And paused beneath the orchard boughs
To list the whippoorwill?

Come, peace of God, that passeth all
Our understanding's sight:
Fall on me with the dews that fall,
And with the falling night.

Among these native hills and plains,
By these baptismal streams,
Wash off the city's fever stains,
Bring back my boyhood's dreams.

Beside the doors where life began
Here let it find its close;
And be its brief, remaining span
All given to repose.

EXTRACT FROM LETTER OF DR. W. W. CADBURY.

ELEVENTH MONTH 20, 1916.

"I must tell you of my excursion during the past three days. It was decided to take a class of our high school boys on a week-end tramp. There were five teachers and twenty-four students.

"On Seventh-day morning we started at seven o'clock—each boy carrying his own blanket on his back—first by launch to the railway station, and then by train to Lam Shui. There is supposed to be a connection here with the river, but we had to walk about a mile over a winding, narrow pathway, and then get into small row-boats and wait for the steamer. We piled into this already overcrowded boat. About one o'clock we arrived at a place called Loh Yan Hang, where row-boats were waiting, we were rowed to the bank of the river and were soon started on our three-mile tramp up to the Hing Wan Tsz Buddhist monastery, on the slopes of Teng Oo mountain.

"Our path wound first between rice fields, and then ascended by stone steps to a beautiful shady grove of trees of various species. The trunks of many were festooned with parasite plants, giving a truly tropical appearance.

"The old monastery stands in a very commanding position, overlooking the valley. It is the headquarters of three hundred Buddhist monks, and there are one hundred workmen and about seventy little boys who act as servants. It is the richest temple in South China and the most famous.

"Supper was served at five p. m. We ate rice, mushrooms, bamboo shoots, etc. We asked how many boys wanted to sleep out-of-doors, ten wanted to do so, the rest were deterred by stories of tigers. An open space in the woods was found beneath some tall trees, kindling was gathered and a fire lit, our blankets were spread on the dry ground and by eight o'clock most were sound asleep. A watch was kept and occasionally the steps of some wild animal were heard approaching the fire through the bushes.

"We were up at five, and at six walked down to the monastery. The monks were reciting their prayers before the image of Buddha when we arrived. We had breakfast at eight and then all went to visit a beautiful waterfall. Here in a little rest-house we had our morning service, and I spoke briefly of the worship that is in spirit in contrast to the formalities of Buddhism. This over we started on a tramp up the mountain, three thousand feet high. The road was steep and difficult. The view from the top was truly magnificent with range after range of hills stretching out far below us, and the west river sweeping through the plain of rice fields at our feet. We found a much shorter route for the descent, and were back at the monastery in ample time for the evening repast of rice and vegetables.

"We had long talks with some of the priests, who were very friendly. One of the monks repeatedly stated that their object was to save themselves alone.

"On First-day night we all stayed in the monastery in damp, dark cells. On Second-day morning we started down early.

"Such experiences as these are most helpful to show our students the hollowness of these religions in contrast with genuine Christianity, and the trip was one to give us a new bond of attachment and fellowship that it is hard to get in the class-room."

WM. PENN COTTAGE, Canton College.

A PHILADELPHIA WORLD-MAN.

With the above title the Ledger prints the following worthy tribute to a very good man. We are reproducing it because we wish to recognize such worth, and also because we can add to it a little incident of touching, and yet of teaching quality.

—[Eds.]

"Philadelphia has had more citizens of world-wide influence than many persons know. One of these, Dr. George W. Bailey, the dominant figure in the World's Sunday-school Association, died yesterday at Battle Creek, Mich. Doctor Bailey was active in public-spirited movements in his own city and State, but his life work was a far-visioned service of the young people of the entire earth.

"In lands the very names of which are seldom seen in American prints the influence of this splendid Philadelphian is being felt. An ardent patriot and a veteran of the Civil War, he yet thought in world terms, and it is chiefly owing to his initiative that the more than 30,000,000 Sunday-school workers around the globe are organized in a fellowship that is making fundamentally for world peace, world brotherhood and world welfare. His passing is a loss to Philadelphia and to a wide circle of friends of many colors and tongues. But his life is a still-speaking challenge to young men to dare to make their powers count grandly for mankind."

It was a case of an ordinary street car well filled with ordinary people. As our eyes scanned those who occupied the forward seats Dr. George Bailey was recognized, and his benignant smile of recognition was as sunshine on a forbidding day. Directly a man entered the car. He carried a small child probably of two years. Dress and bearing indicated that the man was an artisan, but he and the child were both scrupulously clean and attractive. Dr. Bailey managed to expand the small vacant space at his side and to show a fatherly solicitude in having the couple seated. The child had a face glowing with health and intelligence, but a manner that showed the effect of loving restraint wisely administered.

He was supremely happy on his father's knee. As the car sped on the good doctor manifested by his radiant face and a well-timed word or two his feeling for the child. He knew wonderfully well how to do that. Finally by some motion the child perceived that his new-made friend was about to leave the car. As Dr. Bailey made the motion to rise the child seemed to desire to whisper a word in his ear. The doctor bent forward, the child put his arm around the doctor's neck and imprinted a kiss on his cheek. As we reached the door together, somewhat apologetically, lest it might seem that something in him had prompted this unexpected act, Dr. Bailey spoke of the confiding nature of childhood and of the innocent impulse of his new-made friend. We knew—the carload of people who looked on knew, that a sweet radiance in the doctor's face—that mark of “true beauty” which John Woolman writes of, had drawn the little child. Dr. Bailey had become “of such.”

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

The following narratives, copied from manuscripts left by the late Thomas Chester Battey, are undoubtedly true in every particular. Teachers and students of Barnesville Boarding School, Ohio, during the winter of 1888-89, no doubt remember well the quaint, modest, broken man who passed most of the winter with us there; and how unassumingly he displayed his wonderful ability to sketch landscapes, animals and men, and the crude conditions of frontier life, with only common chalk and a blackboard. Nor can we forget those unpretentious “talks” he gave us from time to time in explanation of such drawings. But few if any of us realized at the time, I fancy, the rare privilege that was ours in hearing directly from his own lips the thrilling experiences of a frontiersman who had tested “the revolutionary principle of goodwill” under conditions most trying, and who had found that principle to be sound and practical.

The personal character and the patriotic services of T. C. Battey during the years that he served, “under a sense of duty,” as a teacher among the Indians merit recognition and publicity beyond that which the exceeding modesty of the man permitted during his lifetime. It is safe to say that he was personally instrumental in saving the United States Government from at least one serious war with the Indians, with the inevitable depredations and slaughter along the frontier that accompanied such wars. He exemplified in a rare degree the power of a fearless trust in God and humankind—even in men of the most treacherous and vicious type. In all his travels and work he went about unarmed; and to this fact, with the Power that accompanies such a course when followed from conviction and love, he owed his preservation on numerous occasions.

Through the courtesy of one of his children, we have the privilege of sharing with the readers of THE FRIEND this story of White Wolf, and shall hope to follow it, from time to time, with other accounts of a similar character.

B. F. WHITSON.

THE STORY OF WHITE WOLF.

When Thomas C. Battey went into the Kiowa Camps in 1873, White Wolf was a wild, raiding Comanche chief who did not discourage his young men from raiding in Texas. He looked upon T. C. Battey as a spy who would tell Washington (the Government) of all their evil deeds. Moreover, he had declared that if he found him on the plains he would kill him. These facts should be remembered in connection with the following account:

Leaving the Agency, I started alone for Kicking Bird's camp. I found that he had moved farther away and that I could not reach his camp before nightfall. Seeing another camp a mile or two out of my course, I resolved to throw myself upon the hospitality of its occupants, whoever they might be, rather than to spend the night alone on the plains.

Wending my way along without being discovered (following the course of a ravine, at the head of which this hostile camp was located), I drove up in front of the camp to the surprise of those sitting without. Stopping my mules, I beckoned to one of the Indians to come to me. He arose and, hesitatingly, approached. I found I was in the camp of White Wolf, and the chief himself came forward, enquiring whether I had “revolver, bowie-knife, or other weapon.” On being assured that I had not he asked, “What for you have that axe?” I told him, “To cut away the limbs of trees in my path.”

Presently he said, “The sun will soon go away. Will you sit down by me and sleep?” I replied, “My mules are tired. I have come for that purpose.” After a little time he queried again, “Where you sleep to-night?” receiving the same answer as before. Then he asked, “Where you sleep when in Kiowa camp?” I replied, “When I am at home, I sleep where I please—in my tent or in my ambulance. If you come to see me I tell you where to sleep.” He then asked, “Have you bed in ambulance?” “Yes.” “Blankets plenty?” “Yes.” “Then you sleep in ambulance, but you no go way till you see me,” promising me his protection.

Although by the attempt to induce me to choose my sleeping-place, this wily chief had thought to withdraw from me his protection, he saw that he had failed. So I retired to my ambulance and slept without anxiety, feeling that I had his word that I should not be molested.

In the morning I arose, prepared my mules for travel, and, seated in my ambulance, awaited the appearance of White Wolf. Finding me thus ready for leaving, he seemed displeased and said, “I tell you no go way till you see me.” I smiled and said, “Well, I did not go. I am here.” Then he asked, “What for you get ready?” I replied, “This white man's road,—feed mules, hitch up, eat breakfast, then ready to start.” This seemed to satisfy him and breakfast soon followed.

During the meal, I noticed his squaw dressing up their little girl in her best attire. Near the end of the meal, White Wolf enquired, “Can my wife ride with you?” I said, “Yes.” “Can my little girl ride with you?” “Yes.” “Room plenty?” “Yes, room plenty, they can ride.” When ready to start, he repeated the same inquiry and received the same answers. So they climbed in, a pony was hitched behind, and we set off.

We had not traveled far before we were challenged by a Comanche pony herder. The woman motioned to me to drive on, and, putting her head out of the ambulance, signalled to the man that all was right. This experience was repeated a number of times, and I was protected from the herders who would not, otherwise, have permitted me to pursue my journey.

After we had gone many miles, she told me by signs, “The Comanches all behind. Kiowa camps in sight.” She then climbed out with her little girl, mounted the pony and rode away.

Thus had I been protected not only through the night, but had been conveyed beyond danger and assisted on my way by a hostile Indian who had vowed he would take my life if opportunity offered. He knew not the Scripture, “Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,” but he had the spirit of it in his heart and obeyed it—a lesson for civilized man.

The Kiowas were dumb with astonishment when told I had spent the night in White Wolf's camp. “Mighty strong medicine! White Wolf no kill! Medicine too strong!”

THE BIBLE AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The effort to exclude the Bible from our public schools, which breaks out afresh every once in awhile, has resulted in certain counter-currents that are likely to prove of great value. These “counter-currents” are operative now in more than a score of States. For the moment the so-called North Dakota plan has the public ear. Vernon P. Squires, of the University of North Dakota, has the credit of working out the details of this plan. It involved (1) improving and standardizing the work of the First-day School and (2) the recognition on the part of the public school of the work of the First-day school, thus standardized as a component part of the all-round education of the high school student. In four years over 600 boys and girls in North Dakota have fallen in line with the plan and have passed the prescribed examinations for which they have received a "half credit" in their high school record. We quote herewith a sample examination paper, both because it is interesting and because it gives us a standard to apply to our Friends' schools. We are certainly unwilling to be out-done in this subject by the public schools.

BIBLICAL HISTORY AND LITERATURE.

[One-half unit credit.]

(Answer any ten questions; each has value of ten per cent. Time, 180 minutes.)

1. Explain the relation of Palestine to the other lands mentioned in the Old Testament. Draw an outline map of the whole region.

2. Name ten (10) prominent men of the Old Testament, who lived before the time of David, and explain why each is noted.

3. Name ten (10) prominent men of the Old Testament who lived after the time of David and explain why each is noted.

4. Name ten (10) women mentioned in the Old Testament and explain why each is noted.

5. Name two (2) books of the Pentateuch, six (6) historical books, three (3) poetical books, three (3) major prophets and six (6) minor prophets.

6. Write from memory one of the Psalms.

7. Name ten (10) prominent men of the New Testament and explain why each is noted.

8. Give an account of five (5) parables spoken by Jesus.

9. Give an account of five (5) wonderful works performed by Jesus.

10. Discuss the work of the Apostle Paul at Athens, Corinth, the Island of Cyprus, Ephesus and Philippi. When did he visit each place? To which did he write epistles?

11. Write a memory passage from the New Testament at least 150 words long.

12. Explain the Biblical allusion in each of the following quotations:—

(1) "Marked even as Cain." Tennyson.

(2) "A heart as rough as Esau's hand." Tennyson.

(3) "Cash thyself, and honor thy brute Baal." Tennyson.

(4) "If to be fat is to be hated, then Pharaoh's lean kine are to be loved." Shakespeare.

(5) "As ragged as Lazarus when the glutton's dogs licked his sores." Shakespeare.

(6) "There was a firebrand at each fox's tail, Unleashed in the cornfield." Browning.

(7) "Fair as Ruth in the old Hebrew pastoral." Whittier.

(8) "To Him who gave the tangled ram

To spare the child of Abraham." Whittier.

(9) "He preached to all men everywhere

The gospel of the Golden Rule." Longfellow.

(10) "Samson stark at Dagon's knee

Grope for columns strong as he." Emerson.

It is announced in the Journal of Education, to which we are indebted for this matter, that Clarence A. Wood, of Albany, New York, will soon publish a book in which of this whole movement will be treated. It is certainly a most cheering thing to have the Book thus restored to its place in the training of Young America.—[Eds.]

A CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL OF PEACE.

The greatest factor in any movement is the child, for the child grows while the movement is growing, and the original promoters of the movement die in time, passing on their ideals, principles, virtue, and enthusiasm to the younger generation.

So it is with the peace movement. Continuance of the world peace movement must be imbedded, so to speak, in the child's mind, so that both may grow up together. Of the many ways to accomplish this, probably the indirect method is the best. Why shall not the child learn peace through acquaintance, friendship, and interest in the children of other countries? Where these three qualities exist, understanding is bred, and perfect understanding between two peoples is the inveterate foe of hostility. Our children may not visit the children of other countries, except in rare instances, not even the children of our sister continent; but there is still another means of acquaintance. There is the letter. I propose, therefore, that the letter, which is in itself not only a communicator, but also a great educator, should be used as a distinct educational factor in our schools, teaching spelling, grammar, and coherent thought, as it must, but also bringing the children of two continents together, and teaching them, implicitly, a wider vision of the world they live in, a slight but basic comprehension of its alien peoples, and the healthy tolerance that is the foundation of world peace.

Why should not a child in one of our North American schools communicate through letters with another child in South America? Not only would this be interesting to the two concerned, but in time a friendship between the correspondents would unconsciously grow up and a "neighborly feeling" the effects of which could only be for the best. I do not say that this contact through letter-writing is the cure-all for peace, but I do say that it is part of the cement which is vital to the house of peace and commerce.

In a general manner, then, this international letter-writing would be worked out as follows:

If individual initiative among the teaching profession of this country prove not sufficient to inaugurate this peace plan, let a national bureau be established to obtain the interest of other countries in this plan. The Argentinean or Chilean Government would notify this government that it has, let us say, 500,000 children who wish to correspond with the same number here. The bureau, or some division of the educational department, would then notify the different State, county, and municipal educational educators, who would in turn direct the children. The corresponding would then begin. The governments might well allow these letters to pass between the countries free of charge or, if impracticable, furnish postage. If the government would not do this, then the cost of stamp supply, etc., should come out of the educational expense of each county, State, or municipal educational appropriation.

The American child would write to the Chilean child in plain English, while the one in Chile would answer in Spanish. These letters would be read in the school-room and translated, with the aid of the Spanish teacher. In Chile, again, they would be translated from English. One child in the room would ask for information regarding the climate of a certain district; another about the school system; another about the games, pastimes, or manners of the other nation's children. All in the same room or class would obtain the same information first hand and all would receive the same benefits. The plan could even be so arranged that of the thirty children in a room different divisions of them would write of different stages of our own history, or of facts about our government, geography, and so on. Before sending them off, the letters could all be read by the writers to their classmates. Thus all would learn more about their own country. Not only this, but they would have obtained practice in research work before writing, and while writing they would be more careful with their grammar than otherwise. They would naturally take a certain pride in their composition.

The advantages of this little plan are manifold. It can cost little, either in money or effort—less than nothing in comparison with the benefits to be received, both for the child and for the two countries in the years to come. Indeed, it is so reasonable a step toward peace, education, and a true pan-Americanism that I do not see why we should not try it.—CARL W. GROSS, in Advocate of Peace.

THE end of life is not to deny self, nor to be true, nor to keep the Ten Commandments—it is simply to do God's will. It is not to get good nor be good, nor even to do good—it is just what God wills, whether that be working or waiting, or winning or losing, or suffering or recovering, or living or dying.—HENRY DRUMMOND.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE LITTLE FEATHERED RESCUER.—It is almost unbelievable that our brilliant, little feathered pet, the canary, should merit such an important rank among the heroes of the world; but there is scarcely another living creature which has done as much to save the lives of men in danger.

The canary is recognized to-day as an indispensable helper to the rescue worker at great mine disasters; so much so, in fact, that Uncle Sam possesses about twenty of these birds which he keeps regularly in his service for this especial work. They have become the pets of the professional rescuers of the Bureau of Mines.

Whenever a mine disaster occurs, this bureau rushes its rescue corps to the aid of the entombed miners, and the little canary birds go along also. A few of the intrepid rescuers, with oxygen breathing apparatus attached to their backs to provide them with fresh air, break their way into the gaseous and dusty depths to save all of the men who have, perchance, been only injured.

These men start the fans going to keep the air moving and then begin to dig out the victims. Only a few men can do this perilous part of the work; the risk is too great for a number of men to be allowed to imperil their lives. But others press as close behind as they possibly can, to be ready to render first aid to the injured men delivered from within. In the company of these workers, the canary enters the scene to play its part.

Just a word to tell why the canary is picked for this heroic service and to explain what use he, a mere mite, can possibly be in any stupendous calamity. It has been found that the canary, of all tiny creatures, is the most sensitive to atmosphere. The slightest presence of an asphyxiating gas affects him. In the fresh air, he is happy and gay, preening his feathers and singing a gay song; at the least pollution of the atmosphere he wilts and droops. His very charm acts as a meter to indicate the purity of the air, and by its strength or weakness the rescuers are enabled to gauge the distance that they may safely penetrate in their aid of the imprisoned miners within.

Before the canary proved its effectiveness as a rescuer many other small creatures were used for experimentation. The white mouse was among this band and it was thought for a time that it would serve the purpose in an ideal manner; but the white mouse often takes to sulking and it sometimes sulks in action, which is not the way for a hero to behave at all, and the rescue men could not tell the difference between its sulking fits and its true response to asphyxiating gas.

Not so the canary; always chipper and sprightly, it proved itself the most dependable indicator of the condition of the atmosphere. So now the little canary's cage is held aloft at all of the country's great mining disasters; the little bird within is watched most carefully, for its actions regulate the position of the rescue crew.

Sometimes, while the men are waiting for the injured ones to be carried to them, the contaminated air rushes out and the little feathered hero is overcome. But he is as carefully attended as the stricken miners themselves. Quickly he is thrust into another cage which has an oxygen tank attached to it. Oxygen is pumped into this cage and the bird immediately revives.

One of the rescuers owns a bird that has been asphyxiated seventeen times, and seventeen times has it been revived! Now the owner, who treasures it most highly, says that it must not be taken in dangerous places ever again. Seventeen heroic experiences, which would indeed suffice for a man, constitute a splendid record for a tiny bird, and the owner thinks it should be retired from active service.

Not only at disasters are canaries useful. Every day, before the miners descend the shafts of the coal or metal mines, the foreman walks through the subterranean passages, oft-times two or three miles underground, to see that everything is all right. In his hand he carries a bird cage and his little pet flits about within. If the little chap makes this trip unaffected at the end, the miners are allowed to enter also and begin their work.

Thus, on the safety of one tiny life hangs the safety of many others, and on the service of a little bird does the great work of rescue at mining catastrophes depend.—DORA SIMPKINS.

SNAKES, THE FARMERS' FRIENDS.—Among the best although least-appreciated friends of the farmer are the harmless snakes, such as the milk-snake, the chicken-snake, the garter-snake, the bull-snake, the blotched king-snake, the blue-snake, the black-snake, and some others. All of them are the natural enemies of rats, mice, weasels and similar animals that infest farms and village homes, especially where there is poultry or other small live stock.

In an article in the Scientific American, Dr. Robert W. Shufeldt of Washington says that it would well repay every farmer in the country to keep half a dozen harmless vermin-destroying snakes on every acre of his place. Thousands of harmless snakes are killed every year by boys, ignorant farm-hands and misinformed women, although it has been proved that rats, mice and other rodents cause enormous losses to cereal crops.

Although most farmers believe that the common chicken-snake haunts their outbuildings in order to feed on their young ducks and chickens, the snake does nothing of the kind; but it does destroy great numbers of young mice and other pests.

Harmless snakes are the easiest animals in the world to tame, and it is high time that the false ideas about them should be corrected. More than that, it should be taught that, like birds, they are among the best animal friends that the farmer has. If we destroy them, we pave the way for the destruction of our forests, our staple farm products, and a good deal else that now and always has been protected by snakes and birds.—Our Dumb Animals.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE last issue of The Friend (London) to reach us contains the following:

The total number of men arrested on Twelfth Month 29th was 3249, of these 160 had been released, and 1172 were employed on work under the Home Office scheme.

ISAAC SHARPLESS returned to his home on the 21st inst., after an absence of a few weeks in England, where he had gone in the interests of Haverford College.

INFORMATION has been received within a few days by wireless from Berlin, that a message has been received there from Daniel Oliver and a German Doctor with whom D. O. is associated, that they are both well and are carrying forward their work as best they can under the existing distressing circumstances.

THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING, at its session on the 19th, reported that a bill for the abolishment of capital punishment in Pennsylvania had been proposed by a sub-committee, the same to be introduced this week into the two Houses at Harrisburg.

Independently of this effort the Wells Bill, of virtually the same intent and form, has been introduced.

Friends are urged to use what influence they can exert to foster the enactment of the Wells Bill.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.—On the 22nd inst. the subscriptions pledged amounted to $78,084, of which $54,721.50 have been paid in and mostly invested. In addition to a number of lesser size, there have been received one subscription of $2000 and two of $5000 each, one of the latter being subject to a life annuity at 4 per cent. Not all who have subscribed expect to make their contributions at once, one Friend expecting to contribute $2000 in four years, and another $600 in three years, while one young Friend and his wife were so interested as to subscribe $1000 payable within five years. The Committee feels much encouraged by these results and is making an effort to close the campaign by Second Month 15th, although subscriptions after that date will, of course, be welcomed. It will be remembered that the sum needed is $125,000.

A. G. SCATTERGOOD,
Chairman Collecting Committee.

At London Yearly Meeting held last Spring the suggestion was presented that "all bearing the name of Friends" be invited to join in a general conference in the interest of securing a lasting and general peace.

The subject was referred to the Meeting for Sufferings, and that body naturally referred it to a small committee. That committee has now had time to formulate a definite plan and has issued the following:

After careful consideration, the Committee has decided that the object of the Conference will best be served if it be held in Great Britain. It is earnestly desired that the Conference may be thoroughly representative of the Society of Friends as a whole; but in order to preserve its deliberative character it may be necessary to confine some of the sittings to appointed representatives, so far as the British Isles are concerned. It is hoped to arrange for Friends from America and elsewhere to visit various parts of the country for local conferences similar in aim to the main Conference.

The purpose of the Conference is thus defined by the Committee—

To consider and restate the testimony of the Society of Friends regarding war and international relations generally; to discuss the bearing of this testimony upon the existing international position, and upon other aspects of life, individual and social; and to consider methods for the preparation of the Society to uphold this testimony, and for the delivery of the message in all the world.

If this purpose is in any measure to be fulfilled, preliminary investigation is necessary, and the Committee proposes to form commissions to deal with the following subjects. American Friends are invited to form similar commissions. Other Friends residing outside Great Britain are asked to co-operate.

1. The fundamental grounds and the precise character of the testimony.
2. The implication of the testimony in national life and international relations.
3. The implication of the testimony in individual and social life.
4. Problems of education in relation to the testimony.
5. The life of the Society itself in view of the present demand.
6. Methods of propaganda.

The investigations must from their nature be in the hands of comparatively few Friends; they form, however, only one side of the preparation which the Conference demands. For the first time in its history the Society of Friends throughout the world will meet through its representatives for deliberation, and will seek unitedly to know the will of God at a time of great possibility for the life of the Society and the world. The fruitfulness of this opportunity depends on the growth among Friends of a living concern for the Conference. The subjects to be dealt with require careful study and prayer, and, if the Society is to speak with effect, the concern must be widely shared by its members.

While the war goes on it is impossible to fix the date of the Conference; it cannot be earlier than the autumn of 1917. Full advantage should be taken of the interval for personal preparation of heart and mind, and the Committee strongly urges that meetings be held in connection with Quarterly and Monthly Meetings and in Particular Meetings, at which the purpose and scope of the Conference may be explained. Study groups should be formed at which some of the important questions to be considered at the Conference may be carefully studied.

The Committee invites correspondence from Friends in Great Britain, and will particularly welcome agreed statements from groups of Friends on any of the subjects to be considered by the Conference. It is hoped that corresponding committees or individual correspondents will be appointed by other Yearly Meetings and groups of Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—This is from a New York paper: "Dr. William Wistar Comfort, Professor of Romance Languages at Cornell University, was chosen unanimously for President of Haverford College at a recent meeting of the corporation of the College. He formerly was an instructor in the College, of which his father was an official for many years. He will succeed Dr. Isaac Sharpless, who will retire at the close of the scholastic year."

It is reported that tomato growers throughout South Jersey are renewing their contracts for next season's crop with the canneries at figures that will net them $12 a ton for prime stock, an advance of $2 or $8 over previous years. At the average rate of production and with the increase of about twenty per cent. in prices, the crop will yield the growers from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000, outstripping white potatoes, which have heretofore enjoyed the distinction of being the "money crop" in this part of the State.

Representative Edward W. Wells, of this city, a well-known criminal lawyer, announced his intention to introduce into the Legislature, which reconvenes in Harrisburg on the 22nd, a bill to abolish capital punishment in Pennsylvania.

GENERAL.—Vice of all kinds in New York has been greatly reduced during the past few years, according to the annual report at New York of the Bureau of Social Hygiene, of which John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is the head. Probably at no time in the history of the city, the report asserts, have the conditions in saloons shown such improvement as in recent months. The so-called "vice ring," which flourished several years ago, no longer exists, and the owners of vice resorts either have gone into hiding or have left the city.

Fire insurance companies of the United States and Canada found 1916 a year of heavy losses. The total property destruction by fire exceeded $214,000,000, and the monthly average was about $4,000,000 greater than in 1915.

The railroads of the United States consumed 128,200,000 tons of coal last year, or 24 per cent. of the total production.

Trustees of the South Carolina Medical College have decided to admit women as students on equal terms with men. Dr. Robert Wilson, Jr., Dean of the Faculty, urged this action.

Now is the time to do the most effective work against the fly. New York housekeepers are being urged by the merchants of the city to help toward a summer of little sickness by fighting next summer's flies at this time.

FOREIGN.—An Englishman, presumably well informed, writes in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly that thus far 41,000,000 people have been slain or mutilated—6,000,000 dead, 39,000,000 wounded and crippled in the war. The most active imagination fails to grasp the diabolical significance of such a colossal blow to the human race. The whole United States in the civil war did not have 41,000,000 inhabitants. Think of a war that should kill or maim every soul in the United States of the year 1875!

In the year 1916 Mexico exported to this country products aggregating at least $100,000,000 in value, a sum in excess of the previous high record of $93,000,000, made in 1906.

Sound doctrine, held in the head, and on the tongue, will avail but little. We must submit to Him, who baptizes with the Holy Ghost and fire; who gathers the wheat into the garner and burns up the chaff with unquenchable fire. In this way only shall we know the possibility of being made free from sin in this life, and true witnesses of the Lord's saving power, and of the truth of the doctrines of the everlasting Gospel.—Wm. Evans.

"A PECULIAR PEOPLE."

There are two statements that are often in evidence among us to-day; one rests on the supposition that Friends have a "peculiar message" to advance, and the other, that some "special methods" have to be developed and fostered for effecting this.

I believe we do well to reflect upon our "peculiar message" and our "special methods" to see whether we have any real foundation for such conceptions.

The Christian who lives in the midst of ungodly men, if he follow the commands of his Master (and he is false to his name if he does not), must become peculiar to them, simply because he lives by a different plan and has a different goal as the object of his attainment, but he is not called upon to be peculiar because he belongs to some particular Christian sect. He will, if he minds the inward intimations to duty, walk in a narrow path, and he will experience many things pertaining to the natural man to be put behind him, and in this way he must become peculiar to his associates.

The Epistles to Timothy and Titus are often spoken of as the "Pastoral Letters" of the New Testament, they are largely devoted to helpful caution and advice for the shepherds of the infant Christian church, and in one of these Epistles (Titus ii: 14) the word "peculiar" occurs. Following specific cautions and exalting the universality of the Grace of God, the message continues, referring to Christ's sacrifice, "Who gave himself for us that he might purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." "A chosen people zealous of good works" is the language in certain translations. The revised version gives it "purify unto himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works."

A meaning attaches to the word "peculiar" to-day that did not when the King James' Version was made; it behooves us that we be very careful to place no false interpretations on the words of the sacred record that have been so marvelously transmitted to our times.

Strictly speaking, we have no peculiar message. We claim for the Early Friends that they simply tried to call men away from the lo here's and the lo there's, just as men and women are doing to-day, though in different ways, away from these to the inspeaking Voice of the Heavenly Monitor within them. One at all familiar with George Fox's Journal knows what his experience was. Other journals of the seventeenth century Friends are almost as rich as his in this special line of testimony.

It is an interesting task to trace the gradual unfolding of Christian truths, revealed to these men as they waited and wrestled for them, truths as old as the Christian era, but new and strange in a great degree to the age in which they lived.

Our message should not be different from theirs. We call ours "The Quaker Message," and we revert to it very often in our writings and encourage one another to keep so close to it that the Truth will mark us as its own, and others will see in us not merely what the world calls peculiarities, but instead a measure of that which was in the mind of Paul when he wrote to Titus.

This must be found in all true "followers," be they labelled by whatever names among men; the outward ways of attaining it seem to be diverse; that which is inherent in our constitution as a professing Christian church needs our constant, fostering care, and while we may be called upon to testify against this and against that, let us not undervalue the strong direct testimony for the Truth.

The men of all ages and of all types who have been the great spiritual leaders of the race, have been those to whom the practice of silent, regular and frequent devotion has become a confirmed habit, built into their lives and made a real part of themselves.

An Eastern proverb says, "A man of many friends has no friend at all." To cultivate real friendship we are not over-hasty in our effort; we are much in company with our friend; we respect his wishes, and we strive to show him our real self and not some counterfeit which we assume for the special occasion.

So if we are honestly striving to be the true friends of our Heavenly Father we must be willing to make a sacrifice that costs us something in order to gain so great a treasure. To my mind this is one of the greatest assets of a Friends' meeting. Doctrinal preaching and exhortation, vocal prayer for guidance and in giving of thanks, if called for by the Master of Assemblies will not return to Him void, but the rich outflow of communion when many hearts are bowed together in worship, must result in the fostering of a friendship with which all earthly friendships are as a shadow that passes away.

So, may it not seem that our "peculiar message" and our "special methods" are those that appealed to our forefathers as the universal truth? The simplicity of the Friendly plan of worship, its freedom from ritual and its spirit of democracy have gained for it an entrance among non-Christian people, where more elaborate systems have failed to gain anything but a surface footing. This practice of worship and what belongs with it and grows out of it lead into a purity and simplicity of life that men recognize, and it will make of those who truly follow it "a people for His own possession, zealous of good works."

MEETING WITH THE SEED.

"Some may desire to know what I have at last met with; I answer, I have met with the Seed. Understand that word, and thou wilt be satisfied, and inquire no further. I have met with my God, I have met with my Saviour; and He hath not been present with me without His salvation, but I have felt the healings drop upon my soul from under His wings; I have met with the true knowledge, the knowledge of life, the living knowledge, the knowledge which is life, and this hath had the true virtue in it, which my soul hath rejoiced in, in the presence of the Lord. I have met with the true spirit of prayer and supplication, wherein the Lord is prevailed with, and which draws from Him whatever the condition needs, the soul always looking up to Him in the will, and in the time and the way which is acceptable to Him. What shall I say? I have met with the true peace, the true righteousness, the true holiness, the true rest of the soul, the everlasting habitation, which the redeemed dwell in. And I know all these to be true, in Him that is true, and am capable of no doubt, dispute, or reasoning in my mind about them, it abiding there where it hath received the full assurance and satisfaction. And also I know very well and distinctly in spirit, where the doubts and disputes are, and where the certainty and full assurance are, and in the tender memory of the Lord am preserved out of the one, and in the other."—ISAAC PENINGTON.

QUAKERISM AND THE PRESENT CRISIS*.

While the subject which I have chosen for this paper is a comprehensive one, it is not my purpose to discuss it in all its bearings, but to deal with one aspect of it only—that which has to do with the spiritual life.

In these dark days through which we are passing it has seemed to many not only that the church has proved itself unable to hold men to itself, or to supply what will enable them to face the facts of experience, but that Christianity itself has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. We face the sad and disheartening spectacle of a nominally Christian world at war with itself, a world in which the fiercest passions and hatreds have been let loose, and in which all the powers of man's ingenuity and all the forces of organized effort have been set at work to compass the destruction of human beings, "the brothers for whom Christ died." We do not close our eyes to the fact that through this terrible experience there have been called into play heroic virtues also; that thousands, if not millions of men have gone into this conflict with no savage lust to slay, but in a spirit of loyal devotion and self-sacrifice; but with the fullest recognition of this fact and of the splendid illustrations of courage, devotion and self-forgetfulness which war may call out, we see even more strikingly the waste, the destruction, the incalculable suffering, the unchaining of men's baser passions; and over against these things we see an organized church which seems to find itself impotent, which has to a very large extent laid aside the Sermon on the Mount and takes the texts for its sermons rather from the darker pages of the Old Testament—a church which can no longer preach the teachings of Christ, or bid men live in His Spirit, though through its offices and sacraments it still bids men to commune with Him.

We, who in God's providence, and through the fact that our country is not directly involved in the war, have been in large measure exempt from its horrors, who have not seen our sons and brothers go forth, not by thousands, but literally by millions, nevermore to return, or to return maimed or blinded—wrecked fragments of manhood—we, I say, should not take it upon ourselves to judge those who are exposed to the full stress of this terrible and unparalleled situation. It is not for us to stand aloof and say that the Christian church in the warring nations has proved false to its Lord. We should not content ourselves with maintaining on the one hand that Germany is wholly absorbed in a passion for world-dominion, or, on the other hand, that England, the home of civil and religious liberty, is giving these up in furtherance of a war which she defends by declaring that it was undertaken in their defense. It is our duty rather to seek with the fullest measure of sympathy and helpfulness to share in the experiences and sufferings of our brethren of whatever nationality, and to become, if God so wills, a means of helping them, not in material things alone, by ministering to their sufferings and in seeking to repair the havoc wrought by war, but also—and upon this I would insist—by aiding them to regain their faith in God and their faith in man, and to lead them to see even through the clouds of their sore affliction "the sweet, sad face of Christ."

But it is not only of the warring nations and of the problems confronting the churches in those lands that we think at this time. Here among ourselves the effects of the world war on the religious lives of men are only too clearly to be seen. It is not merely that some among us seem to have their minds fixed solely upon gain, and to be able to forget the awful sufferings through which millions of their human brethren are passing. This of itself tends to stifle or to kill a genuinely religious life; but besides these there are many who for one cause or another, without perhaps expressing themselves as convinced that Christianity is a failure, have become apathetic in religious matters, and have seemingly lost all faith in the reality of religious experience.

Now this is a situation which the church of Christ in all its branches must seek to meet, and the thought which has long been upon my mind is this: How can we Friends meet this situation? What is our special duty in this crisis? What message have we to give to those who are thus drifting, or feeling themselves torn away from a strong and vital religious faith?

In the first place we must realize that the world of to-day is in no mood to accept shams or symbols as a substitute for reality. It demands reality itself, and demands it with no uncertain voice. Those, therefore, who would speak to the world's need must bring it a message that is vital, one that deals not with symbols but with truth. The message, again, must come from the heart of those who give it, not as something to which they have yielded a merely intellectual assent, but as something which they have themselves put to the test, and found to be true indeed. Only so can the message be delivered with power; only so will it find lodgment in the hearts of others. To say, "O taste and see that the Lord is good," is idle, unless the one who utters these words has found them true in his own experience. But we must go further. The truth of the message that is to meet the need of the world must be attested by the lives of those who give it. If the faith whereof we speak, and of the truth of which we declare our own experience makes us certain, have not had the power to transform our own lives, if we do not ourselves live in the power of the spirit of the Master of whom we speak, the world will turn a deaf ear to our words, and will see in our message but a sham, a formula behind which lies no real power, no truth. For the world is sick of cant. It has no ear for merely conventional phrases, and it is only too often inclined to discount the words of a professional minister; but it is quick to mark the fact of a transformed life. There is an enduring truth in Whittier's familiar words:

"From scheme and creed the light goes out,
The saintly fact survives;
The blessed Master none can doubt Revealed in holy lives."

Such are some of the fundamental characteristics which a religious message that is to reach the world of to-day must possess, if it is to bring men back to a living faith, or if it is to win a hearing with them at all.

Now where in this is a special place for a formulation of Quakerism? What ground is there for the hope that we can in any special sense bring to men a message that will have power to quicken them and revive in them true religion? It seems to me that there is such a place, and abundant ground for such a hope. Let us formulate some phases of the Christian message, as called for by the needs of to-day, and then see if true Quakerism is not peculiarly well adapted to set it forth. This formulation will be very incomplete; it will omit or take for granted many things that may seem of prime importance, and will limit itself to truths, or aspects of truth, which the unique circumstances which now surround us, suggest to me.

First, the world needs a realization of the fact that suffering, even though it is suffering on the colossal scale offered by this cruel war, does not prove God a lie. This we Christians hold, and hold most strongly, deep and impenetrable as some, or all, of us must at times feel the mystery of such suffering to be. But the mere assertion of this belief is not enough to convince the world that the statement is true. Here in a peculiar sense it is necessary that one's faith should have been tested and proved in one's own experience, if one's message is to be heeded by a suffering world. Have we taken over this belief on the testimony of others, at second-hand, or is it something the truth of which we ourselves know?

To know that God is, and that God is Love, and to find this knowledge unshaken even in the face of the sum total of human suffering, is possible only for those who have entered into some comprehension of the deeper meaning of suffering. Neither those who seek to crush it aside as unreal nor those who shut their eyes to it, can ever apprehend its meaning, or speak to the needs of a suffering world. Only those who have frankly faced the fact of the existence of almost incalculable suffering among men, who have met and shared the burden of the world's woe, can know the truth of the Divine Goodness in a way which the facts of real or potential experience are powerless to shake or undermine. For these see that suffering is not necessarily or wholly evil, but that it may be so glorified as to become one of life's highest experiences; that sometimes it is through suffering alone that humanity's highest qualities become capable of realization; that life would be a poor and barren thing were the capacity for suffering taken from it. Nay, more: these souls have found vicarious suffering so divine a thing that they have been led to see the truest interpretation of the sacrifice of Christ in the fact that it was only through suffering that the Divine Love could itself become redemptive. It is therefore imperatively necessary that those who would meet the fact of suffering as it must be met in this crisis of human experience, should have themselves apprehended the meaning of the cross, not as an article of a creed or as a mystical formula, but as the revelation of a Divine reality—a law of the spiritual world. They must have entered into the meaning of Paul's yearning to know "the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings;" they must see the infinitely deep significance of our Lord's own words, "As thou hast sent me into the world, even so have I also sent them into the world."

Suffering does not prove God a lie. But, more than this. It is in a human life, a life of suffering even unto death, that the supreme revelation of God has been given to the world. This is not the place, nor may I now take the time, to enlarge upon this thought. But surely, without a deep comprehension of the mystery of the Incarnation, a realization of the full import of the fact that God cares to reveal Himself, and that there is in man that which can respond to His revelation we shall make but little headway in interpreting "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified."

The above is in no sense meant as a complete formulation of the faithless Christian message. It is a statement of certain elements only which seem to me to be especially called for in the present religious crisis, and in stating them I have purposely avoided what might be considered as merely cant phrases or the Shibboleth of creeds.

Now is it not plain that for the emphasizing of these truths—truths verifiable in the laboratory of human experience—We Friends are especially happily placed?

We claim no monopoly of Christian truth, but we may with justice claim that in a higher degree than other denominations we hold this truth in its simplicity, unveiled by forms and symbols. We lay stress upon the inward spiritual experience, not upon outward ceremonial. We find the mainspring of all religious exercise in the direct, immediate breathing of the Divine Spirit upon the human soul, and we offer no substitutes for such an experience. Worship is in our view not the participation in an elaborate ritual, which may be a purely external act, not the listening to the words of one who is by profession a preacher, but the gathering together of men and women for the common purpose of direct, personal communion with God. It is to Him that we look for the ordering of our service; it is from Him that the message given us is to come; or it may be that without spoken word sweet breathings of His Spirit move over our hearts with healing, strengthening, hallowing influence. One is our Master, even Christ, and all we are brethren, knowing no distinction of clergy and laity, only a priesthood of believers.

Again, discipleship consists for us not in the subscription to man-made creeds, or in participation in this or that ceremonial. It is the entering into the new life, the "putting on" of Christ, and the living in His spirit. This means not so much the seeking of one's own salvation as the endeavor to save others, the going about doing good, and the finding of life's highest joy not in being ministered unto, but in ministering.

Surely, if we are true to these fundamental things in Quakerism, if we suffer nothing to serve as a substitute in their place, we have a unique opportunity in seeking to minister to the spiritual needs of a world that is sick of reliance upon ceremonial or upon symbols, and that craves a channel of religious experience and of religious expression which can be to it real and satisfying. This we Friends have; let us not prove false to our own spiritual inheritance.

AUGUSTUS T. MURRAY.

IF NEITHER EDUCATION NOR RELAXATION—WHAT?

In the general agitation, continually surging around the question of the benefits and dangers of moving pictures, especially for children, it is interesting to note what Professor G. T. W. Patrick says on the subject in his recently published book, "The Psychology of Relaxation":—

"In no sense can moving pictures be included in forms of relaxation for children. On the contrary, their effect is to speed up a mental life already under too much stimulation. The concentration of attention demanded by the plot interest and by the rapidity of the changing scenes is an effect quite the opposite of that which recreation and relaxation seek to attain.

"We hear about the educational value of the moving pictures. Surely, if this is education, it is of an antiquated kind. Every educator now knows that an education in which the child is passive and quiescent is of little value. The child must respond, he must react to his impressions. Flashing before his eyes a lot of scenes is not education, even when the scenes themselves are of a harmless character."—From the Journal of Education.

AN IMMORTAL SIGN.

Low bending o'er a dear one's wasted form,
From stress of soul a prayer goes forth to Him
Who for a moment, hidden seems in cloud—
"Oh God, at this last hour let only love—
The treasured love of all the years,
Fill out two hearts and closely bind as one!"
E'en as the echo died, a light crept in
And touched the features, as a painter's brush
Gives latest meaning to a pictured face,
Upon the noble brow a glory sat,
And in the rapture of a radiant smile
Was wrought the conquering love of all the years.
Then breathed a message to the waiting soul—
"It is thy sign; and when in other world
Thine eyes shall range along the gathered throng
Thou shalt behold that smile transferred from earth,
And glorified to lead thee to thine own."

WHITE WOLF CONVERTED.

Some two years after this, during which time the Kiowa and Comanches had given up their raiding and had begun to give some attention to agriculture and cattle raising, a fine school was established at the Agency and some were adopting the truths of Christianity. Among these was White Wolf. Frequently some of the Agency people went out to their camps to hold services with them. At one time the Agent, his wife and myself attended a meeting at White Wolf's camp, which proved to be a remarkably interesting and memorable occasion. The Indians had been closely reasoned with of "Righteousness, Temperance and Judgment to Come." I ventured to make a few remarks, in which I alluded to my visit to White Wolf's camp, and the kindness I had received, and of the interest I had henceforth taken in him and his people. It was observed White Wolf was much agitated, trembling and manifesting deep feeling. At length he arose and in much brokenness said,—"My friends, you have been talking to me and my people. If it is not improper I would like to talk to you." He was encouraged to proceed. "My people will be surprised to hear my talk. None of them ever heard such words from my mouth, not even my wife, as I am going to speak now. I do not know what you will think of me. You may think me very weak—maybe a woman. You see the springs of my heart are all broken up. You all know I have been a great raider, not only in my early life, but I encouraged my young men in raiding after all the Kiowa and Comanche chiefs had given it up. After the time 'Thomissy' came to my camp I feel very bad. I knew not what made me feel so miserable. I never felt so before. I think it all bad to raid. I look—my hands all red (with blood). I no wash it off, it still stay. My whole life bad—I think. I stop my young men going into Texas. I tell them raid no more. Then I feel better for some time. By and by I feel bad again. I say that the matter now, my young men no raid now. I look at my hands, all dark (old blood on them shed by himself). My heart dark like my hands. I no raid now. No fresh blood on my hands, but all the old dark blood there yet. It no come off. I feel miserable. Something tell me—Ask Great Spirit to take it off. I ask him—make all my bad life as though it had not been. I know those I kill no live again, but somehow the old black stain all come off, and I feel better again for long time. Then after some time I think of my boy; I want him travel good road, no travel the road I traveled. I could not lead him in road I did not know myself. I ask Great Spirit—'Show me good road for my boy.' Something tell me—'Send him to Agency school and he learn good road.' I send him. You know he there. You not know why I send him. Now to-day you come here. I know you come here because you love me and my people and want us to travel in the good way.

"When Thomissy came to my lodge I was afraid, although I knew before I ask him, he had no weapon. Still I afraid. I got to wondering why I afraid when I had revolver, bowie knife, and other weapons. Thomissy come to me, he have no weapons, yet he not afraid. Why was it? I see why it was. Thomissy good; he hurt nobody; he kill nobody; so he no afraid. I bad. I kill people. Then I afraid people kill me, that why I afraid. I say—'I no kill people anymore, then I will no be afraid, like Thomissy.'" Tears were coursing down his face while he spoke. Much Christian love was felt by all present as he made this talk to us.

Here was a Christian experience by one who knew not Christ; an exercise of faith by one who knew not what faith is.

"AMUSEMENTS."

Many Friends have been much stirred over the celebration in some of our schools of the Shakespeare Tercentenary. Like all others it is a question having two sides, and my plea is that we may have a free and earnest expression in order that each side may grasp the view-point of the other.

For the past few years the problem of allowing the production of plays in our Friends' Schools and colleges has been a steadily increasing concern among those in charge, and now it seems to have come to the point of decision for some of the schools.

The question is a vital one from the standpoint of the parents of younger children, for on these very children depends the future of the Society of Friends.

That the attendance at the theatre, to which these plays may lead, is becoming an almost general practice among younger Friends is a fact that must be acknowledged, and the resulting condition is one which we must face with an open mind, broad vision and prayerful consideration.

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new," and we cannot help seeing that the Society is in a transitional period of thought and customs. Our children are breathing the atmosphere of the present day freedom, and we can no longer be a "peculiar people," set apart from our fellows.

Shall our aim be to countenance the best that is given in the line of so-called "harmful diversions," at the same time striving with all the strength of the faith that is in us to fill our children's minds with the inspiration of the highest ideals of a spiritual Quakerism, or shall we close our eyes to the tendency of the times and lose the interest of our young people?

Which course will be the right one to pursue in order that we may become a people of strength and high purpose and a Society to which other denominations may look to see the outward shining of the Inward Light?

Has not the time come for an individual heart-searching for the solving of this problem and of some concerted action which might be of help and guidance to those who are striving to see the right path?

REVIEW OF "ACROSS THE DEAD LINE OF AMUSEMENTS."*

GRACE W. BLAIR.

The paper now submitted deserves this explanation. Friends at Media, Pa., held an evening session some months ago for the discussion of the topic—"The Right Place of Amusements."

Much helpful counsel was offered and the meeting was felt to have been a profitable one. A young mother present alluded to her own childhood days, calling attention to the loving care of a mother of a large family of children, who was never too busy nor too tired at the close of the day to enter into the life of the group about her.

The question was raised whether in these modern times, opportunities for home amusement and relaxation were not neglected, because the public offered so much, and this means of parents and children being drawn closer together in innocent pastimes being neglected, the best safeguard against the attractions of "commercial amusements" was lost to the rising generation.

We have little right to find fault with the present, until we have used all the means our parents employed to meet the dangers that were common to them and to us alike.—[Eps.]

From this dedication, "To my parents, the devoted mother still with me, and the sainted father, whose loyalty and love for Christ kept their children in the path that seemed to many 'straight and narrow,' but which proved to be the 'path of the righteous that shineth more and more unto the perfect day,'"—from these first lines to those at the close, "But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ," this little book is a strong plea for "whatsoever things are pure," that we may be of those who have "clean hands and a pure heart," that we may "receive the blessing of the Lord, and righteousness from the God of (our) salvation."

Dr. Stough, when a young man, could not understand why his parents and many other Christian people should object so strongly to the amusements which the young people enjoyed, and which to him seemed harmless. He believes now, he says, that "it was an inward conviction which God gives to those who walk closely with Him. I have been glad," he continues, "ten thousand times that they were firm and unwavering." Because Dr. Stough, when he was young, did not see the harm in these amusements, he decided that he would never talk to young people on the subject of amusements until he could give them "fair and adequate reasons for (his) opposition."

This little book is, then, composed of three lectures which Dr. Stough has given on "The Tragedy of the Theatre," "The Curse of Cards," "The Dance of Death."

In the first lecture, Dr. Stough tells us there is a difference to be made between the theatre "as an organized business and drama as literature. That the study of worthy drama is invaluable for education and culture goes without saying." The theatre, in the beginning, was intended to assist the drama in its work of education and culture, but it was soon turned into a commercial business, because so much money could be made from it. Dr. Brand of Oberlin said, "The ideal theatre is an ideal idea. It has never existed." The writers of moral truths in ancient times were opposed to the theatre. For a long time women did not act on the stage, and when they first appeared it was considered "shocking and monstrous." Under the classification, "The Church and the Theatre," Dr. W. P. Breed is quoted as follows, "There was a theatre in Jerusalem in the days of Jesus. Think you He ever attended it? Did the early disciples? So far from it that neither Jesus nor the apostles ever thought of forbidding their attendance upon stage plays."

Next we come to the Indictment which is separated into two groups: I. The theatre's effect upon the audience. II. The theatre's effect upon the profession. Under the first are given many reasons for Dr. Stough's opposition. First of these is the gloss that many plays put upon sin. He quotes Hannah More (a writer for the theatre and a patron of it), as follows, "The fruits of the stage perhaps exhibit as pointed a contrast as the human imagination can conceive. Jealousy, ambition, pride, revenge, are too often elevated into the rank of splendid virtues, and form a dazzling system of worldly morality, in direct contradiction to the spirit of that religion whose characteristics are charity, meekness, peaceableness, long-suffering, gentleness and forgiveness." To further illustrate his point, Dr. Stough gives from a magazine article the following, "In life there are two kinds of morals, yours and mine. In the drama there is a third kind, which has no relation to life whatever. We check our own moral code in the cloak-room before the play begins." He goes on to say that "the disastrous effect of such a 'checking of morals in the cloak-room,' is that when people leave such plays they, alas! too often leave their own code of morals permanently checked, and take home those that the theatre furnished."

The second objection is, "The Theatre's Positive Teaching of Crime," such as giving minute descriptions of how to commit robbery, murders and other crimes. As one of the illustrations on this point, Dr. Stough quotes a Director of Prisons in Paris, who said, "Whenever a noted play of a vicious character is put on the boards, I have soon found it out by the number of young fellows who come into my custody."

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Month 27, 1916.

The enclosed, from a letter to me, received from a dear friend in England, apparently was written with no idea of its publication; therefore, I do not give her name, but thinking this extract may be of interest to some readers of THE FRIEND, I have copied it.

Thy friend,
A. H.

NEAR RUGBY [England], Twelfth Month 4, 1916.

"My Dear Friend:—

" . . . The county prison for Warwickshire, at the small, quaint country town, Warwick, was a few months ago closed, on account of there being so few criminals that it was not worth while to run so large an establishment. It has, however, lately been reopened, as a sort of place of detention for 'conscientious objectors' who have served their sentences, or perhaps in some cases, parts of sentences. We are slightly acquainted with the person who is in the position of governor, and he very kindly makes us very welcome to visit the large family of upwards of three hundred under his care, and interesting it is indeed—perhaps to us in a peculiar degree, as we have, from time to time [formerly] felt keenly about various ones who have fallen into temptation, and been carried away to be incarcerated within the massive walls of that solid, grey structure, in some cases to come out no more.

"What a change! Instead of it being occupied by the worst of the population, the choicest of the youths and young men, some of whom have gone through much hardness in military camps, and also in prisons, where they were often treated as criminals. It is good indeed to hear them speak of the sweet communion and heavenly consolations, and the nearness of the Holy Spirit, which they were permitted to experience in an especial manner, during the period of solitary imprisonment, seated on their stools, at their allotted tasks of hard labor, in their prison cells.

"The treatment seems to have varied a good deal in different prisons. In some, the young men have been handcuffed for longer or shorter periods; and so far as I have heard, they are not allowed to write or to receive a letter or a visit for a month. Then at the end of the month they may write one letter, which is of course censored, and receive one letter, also censored, and receive one visit of twenty minutes in the presence of a warder; but the anxious mother—or whosoever the visitor may be—is only seen through two squares of fine mesh wire netting, with a corridor between the two. The solitary confinement is so rigorous, opportunities of a single word with a fellow sufferer are zealously guarded against, on pain of three days on bread and water. They do have a sight of some of their fellow-prisoners during the forty-five minutes exercise around circular pavements in the grounds of the prison—which seems to be the only break. Some of those who have served long sentences have felt it very trying to nature to be thus cut off from their fellow-beings (except the officers of the prison and a weekly visit from the prison chaplain, mostly quite unsympathetic); so much so, that they believe, had it not been for Divine support, their reason must have given way.

"There are, I believe, between seven hundred and eight hundred at Wormwood Scrubs alone; but I believe a proportion there, also at Warwick and various other such institutions, are not "Conscientious Objectors" in our sense, their objections being more from a political or socialistic standpoint. These make it much harder for the truly Christian objector, and their lives and their demeanor do not bring honor to the cause—thus causing prejudice in the minds of many. Good it is truly, and gladdening to one's heart, to hear some of the true yoke-bearers rejoicing in being thus counted worthy to suffer and to bear the cross of Christ, if so be they may also obtain the crown. One, a fully qualified physician, who was arrested while working at a good practice, remarked to us, "I can feel that whatever comes to us in Divine providence is good."

"Now, dear friend, I wonder if my having written so much on a subject which I believe will be of interest to thee may prevent this letter from reaching thee; therefore I intend to send a postcard, as a duplicate intimation of the safe arrival of thy letter and parcel.

"We have from time to time wondered to what extent passing events in this country at this trying time are mentioned in THE FRIEND (Philadelphia)."

GERMANY AND PACIFISTS.

Before the war broke out it was generally believed that Germany contained no inconsiderable Peace party. In the smoke of battle and under the ban of a strict censorship, it were easy to believe that this sentiment and this party had been obliterated. We are much indebted to Gilbert Hirsch in the New York Evening Post (magazine section) for a detailed article showing how this good ferment has been working even during the war. We make no apology for reprinting liberal quotations from Hirsch's article.—[Eds.]

And the pacifist and humanitarian movement in Germany, which was growing steadily up to the outbreak of the war, did not stop short when the war broke out. Within the next couple of months, in spite of the war spirit which was sweeping over the land, the German Peace Society received over a hundred new members. Its president, August Richter, died within a fortnight of the beginning of the war. But the legacy which he left to the Society enabled it to push its activities more vigorously than ever. Its local chapters at Berlin, Munich, Frankfurt, Stuttgart, Cassel, Königsberg and Ulm became very active. The Frankfurt branch led the way in doing relief work among prisoners of war and other "alien enemies" in Germany. The Munich branch held three times as many large open meetings as in peace times, meetings in which the talk was frank, and in which Germany was held strictly to account for its share in bringing on the great catastrophe.

"All those Germans who for years past have been talking and writing in a jingoistic way," declared one of its leaders, Professor Foerster, "might just as well realize that they are as guilty of bringing on this war as the envy of all other low motives of foreign countries. Much has been said in recent years about the 'isolating' of Germany (by the diplomats of the Entente). Her worst and most dangerous isolation comes not from without, but from the depth of our own popular notion that we, as Teutons, are in ourselves the source, essence, and aim of all culture."

Professor Foerster also initiated a vigorous and fearless campaign against sowing the seeds of hatred in the minds of young Germany.

Monthly discussions of the Berlin Branch of the Peace Society, held in the Vienna Café on the Potsdamer Strasse, sometimes gave rise to even more daring utterances. The extreme Tolstolian view found many adherents among the clergymen of various denominations who are among its leading members. The suggestion that when the German troops first came in sight of the enemy they should have thrown down their arms and refused to fight—although clearly treasonable—went unrebuked. Another member proposed the formation, after the war, of a new club—"The Society of the Deposed Sovereigns of Europe." Nor did he suffer the fate of Wilfred Gribble, the Canadian Socialist, who was clapped into jail for declaring that King George is a puppet.

One of the most zealous workers for peace has been the blind pastor of Stuttgart, O. Umfrid. Under his leadership, the Stuttgart Peace Society has, in spite of the war, managed to keep in almost daily communication with the National Peace Council in London. And this is only one of a large number of attempts on the part of German individuals and organizations to keep in touch with lovers of peace in the hostile countries. There is, for example, the Circle of Friends, organized since the war began, as an anti-militarist society. It consists of twenty Berlin pastors. Five of them had the courage not long ago to go to Switzerland to confer with an equal number of English clergymen on the possibility of a renewal of friendly relations between the two countries.

Another pillar of the German peace movement is Professor L. Quidde, of Munich, a member of the Bavarian Diet. Although professor of international law at the university, he is an absolute believer in the doctrine of non-resistance as applied to nations. He is a member of the Central Organization for a Durable Peace, an international organization formed during the war, with delegates from France, England, and the other countries hostile to Germany.

At Leipzig just a year ago there was held a meeting of all the pacifist organizations of Germany. It was described to me by one of the delegates as one of the saddest conventions ever held. For they knew that they were powerless, that all they could do was to protest. But at least they had the courage not merely to protest against war in general, but against some of the abuses of war which came very near home. One of the results of their conference was a letter sent to the German Chancellor protesting against the treatment received by the Armenians at the hands of Germany's Turkish allies.

But the most remarkable anti-war organization in Germany is the "New Fatherland" League. This body, which was formed soon after the beginning of the war, dared to proclaim itself to be a "sister organization" of the English Union of Democratic Control and of the Cobden Club, of London. Among its organizers are a number of the most brilliant of Germany's younger writers and thinkers, men like Herbert Eulenberg, the popular journalist and novelist. And the power which it has wielded toward the liberalization of German thought has been very great. It has published a number of brilliant pamphlets, in one of which it demolished the arguments of the German annexationists. In a letter written to the prominent Frenchman, Romain Rolland, asking for his co-operation, the League declares that "freedom must be won by the individual nations for themselves; and in so far as all have not sufficiently striven for it, each shares in the guilt of this war."

The League announces as its object: "The furtherance of all efforts tending to infuse into the politics and diplomacy of Europe the idea of peaceful competition and international co-operation. To make this possible, the present system must be thrown overboard. For it is a system whereby a handful of men are permitted to decide the fate of hundreds of millions of human beings."

The Women's Peace Congress, held at The Hague in the spring of 1915, however futile it may have appeared as an attempt to end the war, gave an impetus to the anti-militarist agitation among the women of Germany. The idea of a woman's peace movement in Germany is comparatively new. It was only two months before the outbreak of the war that the Woman's League of the German Peace Society was organized. At its first meeting it received a letter of greeting from Bertha, Baroness of Suttner, winner of the Nobel prize, and author of the great anti-war novel, "Lay Down Your Arms."

"It will not be made easy for you to champion the pacific ideal," she warned them. And she was right. They succeeded in sending "a splendid group of twenty-eight German women"—as a leading American delegate put it—to The Hague Conference. They proved their sincerity and their courage by taking the initiative in inviting the Belgian delegates to the platform. And it was an Austrian woman, one Lecher, who put the protest of Woman against War in dramatic form. For months she had served as a nurse on the firing-line. And she had come to The Hague to protest against what she regarded as a prostitution of women's finest instincts of devotion and sympathy to the end of prolonging a brutal and barbaric struggle.

"What is the use of healing wounds," she asked, "if they are to be torn open again?"

On their return to Austria and Germany these women were bitterly attacked as traitors to their country. They were placed under the ban of the League of Women's Clubs of Germany, of which Dr. Gertrud Bauemer, the leading German feminist, is the head. But they stood their ground, declaring that they had served their country much more wisely than their opponents, who were making Germany appear to the outer world as a nation entirely given over to hating. They restated their position and their aims; secured the endorsement of a considerable number of feminist organizations, such as the woman's suffrage organization of Hungary's capital city; campaigned for recruits for the peace societies; organized the German Women's Committee for Lasting Peace, with headquarters at Munich, Stuttgart, and Hamburg; and began preparations for a monster demonstration against all war, to take place at the end of this war, and to include a Peace Congress of Women which shall meet in the same city and at the same time as the Peace Congress of Diplomats which will decide the future of the world.

Not the least promising thing about the peace movement in Germany, particularly among the women, is that, although it may at times be dangerous to be a pacifist, it is not "bad form," as it is in England. They may arrest you, as they arrested Carl Liebknecht when he became too belligerently pacific in the middle of the most crowded square in Berlin. But they do not mob you as they recently mobbed Ramsay Macdonald, M. P., for sitting on the platform of a meeting on behalf of "Civil Liberties" in Cardiff. Even the most fanatical of the German jingoes tend to regard the extreme pacifists less as traitors than as idealistic eccentrics. And so, some of the most distinguished names of Germany, such as the Grand Duchess Luise of Baden and the Baron de Neufville of Frankfurt, are openly listed among the pacifists.

Among the leaders of the foremost women's social club of Germany, the Lyceum Club of Berlin, I met a woman who, with her daughter, is working night and day against the war. She told us that her activities made her liable at any time to Government interference—but not to loss of prestige. Like Bertha von Suttner, she is descended from the family of a great German poet. And she insists that in believing in the possibility of peace and brotherhood she is simply following in the tradition of the greatest thinkers and writers of Germany.

Another distinguished name which will go down in the history of the German Peace Movement of our time is that of the Baron Marschall von Bieberstein. From the field where he was fighting as captain of the First Infantry Regiment of the Guards, he wrote an "Appeal to the Peoples of Germanic Blood"—an appeal to end war. It was his reaction to the horrors which he had seen in the first few weeks of the fighting. He himself was killed, fighting, shortly before the article appeared. It was published in Alfred Fried's anti-war magazine, The Watch-Tower of Peace, and made a great stir in Germany, where it had the solemn effect of a warning voice from beyond the grave.

[The following has been handed us for insertion in the columns of THE FRIEND. We have no way of verifying the claims made.—Eds.]

THE SKEPTIC TURNS PREACHER.

It is the testimony of all careful observers that to France more than to any other country the calamitous war has brought a deepening of the national character and a strengthening of the moral and spiritual forces. This does not necessarily mean that the Roman Catholic Church will regain its lost ascendancy, though doubtless the patriotic sacrifices of the priests and the faithful and tender ministries of the nursing sisterhoods are not lost upon their countrymen. But our own mission superintendent, E. W. Bysshe, of Grenoble, who is just returning hopefully to his field, assures the Board of Foreign Missions that the war has removed obstacles to Protestant religious activity which two years ago seemed insurmountable.

The most striking instance of a public confession of such an altered view point that it might almost be classed as a Methodist conversion is that of M. Henri Lavedan, the brilliant journalist, whose cynical mockeries at religion won for him the title of "the Nietzsche of France." The Sunday School Chronicle of London quotes him as publishing this recantation, forced from him by what he has seen and experienced since his country passed under the harrow of war. He says:

"I once laughed at faith and thought myself wise. But as I saw France bleeding and weeping, my laughter could not give me joy. I stood by the way and saw the soldiers as they went light-heartedly to face death. I asked, 'What is it that makes you so?' I counted the sacrifices of our people and saw how they accepted them with praying hearts. Then it was to me a great comfort to know of an eternal fatherland. A nation must despair, if it does not believe that the sufferings of earth will become the joy of heaven. Who can hope, when everything is failing, save he who has faith in God? Oh!—I dare not name Him [Jesus Christ]. He was so good, and I . . . What would become of France, if her children did not believe, or her women did not pray? A vast people of the dead cover the field! How hard it is to be an atheist upon this national burying-ground! I can't do it, I can't be one! I have deceived myself, and you who have read my books and sung my songs. I was mad. It has all been an awful dream! O! France, France! Return to thy faith and to thy best days. To depart from God is to be lost. I know not whether I shall be alive to-morrow, but I must tell my friends, Lavedan does not dare to die an atheist. It is not hell that makes me afraid, but this one thought grips me. God lives, and thou art so far from Him! O! my soul, rejoice that thou art permitted to see the hour in which, kneeling, thou hast learned to say, I believe, I believe in God, I believe."

HITHERTO.

Hitherto the Lord hath helped me,
By the promise of Thy word
And the knowledge of Thy mercy
In this hour I trust Thee, Lord,
Dark the shadows press about me;
Great the terrors in my way;
Yet I fear not, Thou art with me,
Who hast ever been my stay.
By the memory of past sorrows
When Thy saving Power I knew,
In this dark hour Thou wilt help me
As Thou hast done hitherto.

Hitherto the Lord hath helped me;
Through deep waters I must go,
And I see no hand extended
And no earthly refuge know.
All Thy waves and all Thy billows
Sweep across this heart of mine,
My one comfort midst the tempest
That I still can call them Thine.
Though I stand here blind and helpless,
Nothing for myself can do,
Yet I know that Thou wilt help me
As Thou hast done hitherto.

God sees to it—and so does Satan—that every day has all we can stand of testing. There are enough problems, difficulties, troubles in each day to relieve us from any need of taking on the difficulties of to-morrow. Christ himself reminds us that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

THE CONFESSIONS OF A JAPANESE.

H. Kokubun is a Japanese Christian and the extracts that follow are taken from a letter written by him to friends in America under date Eleventh Month 10, 1916. If they sound a little strange to ears accustomed to a different mode of expression, let us remember that H. K. was trained under influences totally different from those that we have known, and that in embracing Christianity he has broken away from a traditionalism which has held his race for many centuries, and the new light that has come into his life calls forth a style of expression to which most of us are strangers.

H. Kokubun became a Christian fourteen years ago while he was working on the railroad, through reading a Friends' book. He became a station master near Shimodate, which is a Friends' Centre. In 1914, he resigned to go into railway Y. M. C. A. work, in which he has been caring for wounded men and has a small home for them. He has read practically all the books about Friends or by Friends that are published in Japanese and is making a collection of pictures of Friends, although his collection is as yet rather small. Kokubun has a daughter in the senior class of the Friends' School in Tokyo, and she is a fine, earnest girl. It is her account of the School which we publish with this.

In the summer of 1914, H. Kokubun was taken sick with a fever and was advised to go to the Hot Springs to recuperate. The letter in question was written from the Springs.—[Eds.]

"I am glad to say that I am on the way to recovery through the tender love of the Lord, and now even my wish of going to some hot springs to convalesce was granted me by the doctors.

"I did not know what hot springs would suit me, so I prayed about it and it seemed that Shiobara was the place to go. When I got to this place, I asked the station-master, a friend of mine, which spring was the best for my condition. He told me to go to Shio-no-yu, so I took a horse car for that place. The maple leaves on the surrounding hills were seen just like pieces of brocade. The flow of Hokiogawa, which runs through the valleys, with waterfalls in between giving the finishing touch to the scenery, could be compared with only fairy-land. It made me think of the Paradise of old. Just think of all this grandeur and beauty being a little manifestation of the work of God! I traveled praying in silence and praising the glory of God.

"There were seven passengers besides myself in the horse-car; several women, a baby, a student and a man. In talking with them I found there were many steps going down to the spring I had recommended to me, and in my condition I could not go up and down them, so I decided to go to Hato-no-yu. Without asking me where I wished to go, the driver took my things to a hotel called Kami. Although this Kami means paper, it has the same sound as Kami, meaning God. It is strange that I should put up unintentionally at a hotel whose name is pronounced as though it might be the 'Lord's House!' But stranger still that I should wash myself to get healed in the bath called Hato-no-yu (Bath of Dove). 'And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water, and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him.' Thus the word Hato is connected with the Spirit which is our ideal and to receive which we are praying incessantly day and night.

"The next day I went for a walk along the Hokiogawa and I saw a sign pointing to the 'Senshin no Taki' (waterfall of washing heart). I thought how full of sins I am and how many times I make the Lord sorrowful with my conduct. Then I came to a place commanding a view of the surrounding mountains. The maple leaves were beautiful. I stood still for a few minutes enjoying the scenery when I felt my heart filled with the Holy Spirit. I knelt for silent prayer to praise the God Almighty and it seemed that I received the message that we should absolutely obey the Lord and then God, who is Love, would never forsake us but fill us with blessings. The waterfall was nothing grand, but while kneeling here I was taught to wear the cloak of meekness and modesty. I began to feel that these two virtues are the essence of peace, by the use of which we could come closer to our neighbors and in our actions toward them manifest the glory of God.

"I am improving in health and have much time for prayer, meditation and reading. The books I brought here with me are: Individual Mission, John Woolman, Protection of Acquitted Criminals—T. Hara, Society and Humanity—Tommoka, New Testament and Psalms. I read the life of John Woolman through while on the train and it was a great encouragement to me.

"I have to thank Gilbert Bowles very much for his kindness in giving me the Lives of George Fox, William Penn Elizabeth Fry, Stephen Grellet, Daniel Wheeler and John Woolman, by the study of which I profited very much.

"I have many faults to confess, one of them is in regard to my home life. Of course, I admire and love my wife, who is true and faithful. But how can a man lead his fellow-beings when he cannot even manage properly his own household? To become a saviour one has to have strict faith in his own salvation. To become one of God's instruments one has to forsake his wife, children and all for His sake. Am I doing this? Is my wife doing it? Are we teaching the children who have been entrusted to us by Him in the way He wishes it to be done? Are we studying the Bible every day and trying to teach it to the people in the house? Do we encourage home prayer, treat travelers cordially, keep our house according to the teachings of the Bible? Oh, pity! how imperfect my home is!

"I have some questions I would like to have answered so as to make me understand the ways to better my home:

"What kind of manners and customs shall a Christian home keep to get the approval of the Lord? In what way could one make his children get the habit of reading the Bible? How shall one teach his children in manners of speech and action? How shall one manage family worship! By what rule shall one keep the economy of the house? What books would be good for a family to read?

"I am sorry to have given trouble with so many questions, but I would like to understand these subjects so that I could be in a better position to face the Lord."

THE MISSION OF THE FRIENDS' GIRLS' SCHOOL.*

As you know, the education of girls in Japan did not prosper before the Meiji restoration. Only the girls of high families went to elementary schools, and received an elementary education. The middle class were educated at home. At that time there was but a small number of books for women. Most of them were just like dictionaries on principles of literature, moral training, history or geography, all written from the Confucian standpoint, and the pictures, which were unlimited in number, explained the text in an exceedingly interesting way, and gave the pupils some exact knowledge. So there was a little accomplished in spite of the fact that there were no schools for the education of the middle class. But it was limited to a few only, for the common people could not study at all. And after the Meiji restoration, although they acknowledged the need for education of women, and the Emperor and Empress at that time encouraged it, still it did not prosper, because it was founded on the veneration of western countries' principles and was only an outward civilization, looking for material things without spiritual things.

Soon after this, however, missionaries came to Japan to preach the Gospel, and they opened schools especially for young Japanese women. But still, when the Friends came here in 1885, there were only nine government girls' schools. The others were all mission schools. The Friends saw the condition of Japan at that time and thought it best to try to raise up women's education, on spiritual and religious principles, and thus to save Japanese girls. Thus the group of women Friends in Philadelphia established our school in 1887, just at the time when Japan was unprovided with much of modern civilization and few people recognized the importance of education for women.

I have been told that at first our School was only in a private house in Tokyo and that knitting and crocheting were the only things taught. Afterwards the real school-house was built, and the number of students increased gradually. By teaching both Japanese and English lessons, they gave a rounded education. The length of the preparatory course was two years, of the regular course five years, and of the post-graduate course two years. At the present time there is no preparatory course, and the lessons are of a pretty high standard.

One aim of this School is to improve our knowledge, but the greatest aim is not only to increase the student's knowledge, but also to foster her spiritual life. This is a great lack in Japan, and our School attempts to fill it by letting the students know that the foundation of true life is faith in God. From the beginning if we want to develop into good Christian people it is not only a matter of theory and knowledge, but it is a question of life. On this point, the Friends' aim in life is governed by several principles. These principles are for the individual and also are to be worked out in the School. In order to see just what special things are taught at this School, because it is a Friends' school, let us look at some of the principles of Quakerism.

One of the special features is "sincerity" in thought, word and deed. In America and England there are many Friends and they believe it is right never to tell a lie or flatter. They do not use extravagant civility when people visit them, and sometimes they do not speak very much even though they welcome a person warmly. They are the same all the time, for they want to have no treachery and contemptible covetousness in their thoughts and no hypocrisy in their deeds. They believe in the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit, and should never speak or pray in meetings for worship without this guidance. Friends believe that God loves all souls the same. So wealth, rank, wisdom and knowledge of this world are useless as we stand before God.

Another special feature of Friends is "simplicity" in dress and manner of living. When the Friends were started by George Fox, life was very gay in England. Friends did not approve of such gay things. They used inconspicuous colors, such as black, brown and ashy grey in their dress. And inside the house there is also simplicity, for Friends do not decorate with many things, nor do they wish to worship God in a grand building. For as George Fox tells us, "the church is the spiritual family of the members and is the pillar and foundation stone of absolute truth and Jesus Christ is its minister."

Another principle of Friends is industry and honesty in business. There are many enterprising men in the business world among Friends and they want to be so industrious and so honest in their business that people will trust that the things which they make are honest.

Another principle which Friends try to practice is "frugality," with generosity to the poor and oppressed. An example of this is Elizabeth Fry who had many children, but she went to the prisons to preach after she had managed her household and she discovered that it was very pitiable the way the prisoners were treated in such places. So she tried to improve them and at last she accomplished a great deal by overcoming many difficulties so that prisoners were treated better.

On such principles as these our School is founded and we try to live out these teachings every day in our worship, our work and our play. And we feel that it is the mission of our School to give to others who are willing to receive it a Christian education based on these Friends' principles.

THE HEARING EAR.

There are vibrations that to one ear are perfectly distinguished as sound that are not audible to other ears. Along these lines we know of ears that vary in their alertness. Some of these we class as hearing ears, while others are dull of hearing. When we enter The Grand Canyon of Arizona, how distinctly the sounds break upon our ears, how that great temple of immensity is shrouded by mystery, as the eye fails to define its breadth or depth, and the ear in sympathy with it, makes wonders of the simple sounds that break upon the vast loneliness.

But it is of the ear and the eye as symbolical avenues to the soul that we have the greatest interest in our present consideration. "Incline your ear," "the hearing ear," the learning to hearken diligently, all illustrate that He who formed the ear as an avenue to man's outward environment made use of it in a similar way in speaking of spiritual perceptions. Following the conditions of the outward sense of hearing, we find an interesting analogy, as is always the case, between the physical and spiritual world. How often do we find men indifferent to the sense of hearing; they literally have no ear for the sounds that should impress them. On the other hand, how alert some become to every sound or noise. They have an ear to hear. Of the five senses it seems that sight and hearing are as much in advance of the others in spiritual literature as they are in physical life.

Those people who think to be heard by their much speaking are a trial to both the physical and spiritual ear. Perhaps the ear should close to such communications much as though it had an automatic shutter to shelter it from storm, inclement weather or idle breezes. The capacity to make a noise does not make the sound avail in the ear, but let a real message be sounded and there are always ears to hear. That announcement of great significance, "This is my Beloved Son, hear ye Him," sounded and still sounds upon hearing ears that welcome the glad tidings whether received by the outward or inward ear. May we not allow the many sounds that crowd upon our ears in daily life to drown the vast import of such a message or dim its distinctness.

As we have known people who have lost the outward sense of hearing to have the inward channel of communication broadened and deepened by that loss, so may we keep an open spiritual ear by resolutely guarding our outward sense, that it may not encroach upon the more sacred function. By that spiritual ear we must be enabled to hear not only what the Spirit saith unto the churches, but also its message to ourselves. While this love of the silence of all flesh has been a marked characteristic of many in our Society who were honored by the great Head of the Church to hear His still, small voice, yet many of us can testify that even in the riot of outward noises as we operate farm machinery and upon the more strenuous occasions when surrounded with men and many cares, a great peace of mind is our covering inasmuch that our inward ear is opened.

The child Samuel was sorely perplexed when he said to his father, "Surely thou didst call me." So are we of this day tried by the many voices. As Friends we have had a training in silent waiting that should preserve us from premature or uncalled for utterance and should distinguish the various sounds when we hear them. While many deplore the lack of ministry in some of our meetings or the quality of it in others, perhaps we should all look more thankfully to the hearing ear that will distinguish the voice of the Shepherd of the sheep when He calls. The owner of such an ear may give wise counsel to those who speak, that the sacred message be not cumbered by too many words or painted with too many colors lest we fail to know in it its author, whose language is so direct and simple.

You are to be perfect, as Christ is perfect.—you are to be "followers of the saints, as they were of Christ." How did the saints follow Christ? Surely by keeping hold of Him: by recollecting from morning to night, in little things and in great, those they were and whom they served; by wishing and contriving and praying, not so much how to do great and extraordinary things as how to do little and ordinary things extraordinarily well.—J. NEWS ITEMS.

JOSEPH ELKINTON writes from Orlando, Florida, that the Friends' Meeting originally held there under a religious concern of George Abbott, is attended this season by forty or more persons.

PLANS for the Sharpless Hall at Haverford College have been completed. Three floors will provide ample laboratory and class-room space. The cost of the building alone will be about $85,000.00.

THOMAS E. JONES, now of Columbia College, N. Y., attended Wilmington Meeting on First-day, First Month 13th, and had acceptable service therein. He urged the need of "caring" earnestly for what is best in life, and reminded us that indifference was the sin against which our Saviour most often warned His followers, when He was on earth. In the afternoon, Thomas Jones met with a group of Younger Friends of both Wilmington Meetings to whom he spoke of the "Young Friends' Movement." F. T. R.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Far-reaching measures for keeping the prices of milk as low as possible are recommended in a report just issued by the joint commission representing Pennsylvania, Maryland and Delaware. One of the drastic features of the report is the recommendation that milk distribution be regarded as a public utility.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has received four bills aiming at the abolition of the death penalty in this State. Two of these providing for the direct substitution of life imprisonment and one giving the jury authority to fix the penalty have been introduced into the House of Representatives. Another such measure, direct in its provisions, appeared in the Senate.

To reorganize elementary and secondary education and to attempt to create such a school as is outlined in Abraham Flexner's essay, "The Modern School," the General Education Board has announced that Teachers' College, Columbia University, has been selected for a trial of the "modern school" idea. Unlimited funds are available to make the experiment possible, and prominent educators have been called upon to give their assistance and their advice.

GENERAL.—President Wilson, in a personal address to the Senate on the 22nd, shattered precedents of more than a century, appealed to the Senate with its treaty-making power, as his counsellor in foreign affairs, explained why he believed the time had come for the world to know America's position, and discussed the underlying causes on which he believes a permanent peace of the world can be maintained.

The American Waldensian Aid Society, sometimes mentioned in THE FRIEND, has had a year of substantial gain. It now has forty branches and contributions last year amounted to $60,000.

Virginia expended last year more than a million dollars on school buildings, with no one large building in the record. Most of them were buildings costing less than $25,000 each.

The recent success of the Pennsylvania railroad in attracting 12,000 Negroes from Southern States into service on its Pennsylvania lines is a pointer as to what will probably happen if European immigration does not satisfy the demands of the country later on.

The completion this Spring of the Hell Gate Bridge, with the smaller bridges over Little Hell Gate and the Bronx Kills, the elevated approaches or viaduct, and the four and a half miles of line connecting with the Long Island Railroad near East Williamsburg, comprising New York Connecting Railroads, rounds out and perfects the plans of the Pennsylvania Railroad for its entrance into the heart of New York City and the building, in connection with the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, of an all-rail line between the West and South and New England via Philadelphia and New York.

FOREIGN.—Imports into Argentina from the United States for the first nine months of 1916 were greater, for the first time on record, than those from any other country, according to reports from William Dawson Jr., Consul at Rosario, and W. Henry Robertson, Consul-General at Buenos Aires.

Presbyterians are keenly interested in a movement to unite the Northern Presbyterian Church and the Southern Presbyterian Church, which have been separate ecclesiastical bodies since the Civil War. An impetus has been given the movement by the action of the New York Presbytery in adopting an overture to the General Assembly asking for a reunion of the two great branches of the Presbyterian Church.

FUNCTIONS OF THE ORGANIZED CHURCH.

The character of the church of Christ is set forth in apostolic writings under various figures. The church is the pillar and ground (or stay) of the Truth; it is a spiritual house, with Jesus Christ as the chief cornerstone; it is a living body, whose head is Christ, and whose several parts, framed from Him, are knit together through that which every joint supplieth. These illustrations also contain large import as to the place and work of the church in the world. If it is a pillar and stay of the Truth, it has somewhat to uphold and support; if it is a spiritual building, it is "an habitation of God in the Spirit", and every stone has its place; if it is a living body, its various members have offices to perform or functions to fulfil.

According to these concepts, then, the church is not simply an association, although association is the condition of its being made "visible". It is not constituted by organization, although some organization is essential to good order and to the greatest service, mutual and general. Such organization, more or less elastic, should certainly allow freedom for the members to work, either singly or in groups, according to the nature of the service, for the furtherance of the Gospel and the establishment of a Christian order in society at large. It does not follow, however, that a religious body or "church" must align itself corporately with all the philanthropic movements in which it has an interest and in which some of its members may be engaged, thus giving itself over chiefly to demonstrations in these enterprises.

In the simple organization of the Society of Friends in its early days, the primary concerns (as in the primitive church) appear to have been largely such as had to do with the welfare of those who "professed truth", and with their walking "answerable to their profession". Yet as Christians and as citizens the Friends of Truth were alert, courageous and diligent, active in evangelizing zeal, and "forecasting the years" in their advocacy of social and civil reforms. They have been called mystics, and such in a sense they were; but as a rule they were eminently sane and practical ones, out-looking as well as in-looking.

Herein—and because of the spiritual quality infused into all life and duty—they exemplified a balance and co-incidence between the different phases of Christian life that has not always been so well preserved. Of recent times and in most religious societies the tendency has been to emphasize the materialistic and social side; and the trend away from what was regarded as unwholesome introspection and self-centredness has come near to an extreme of the opposite kind. Again the results are not wholly satisfying and comfortable. Again there are warning voices, and questions relative to the position and influence of those organized bodies comprehensively spoken of as "the church" are obtaining serious consideration.

Within two years past there came from the press a thoughtful book bearing the title, "Mysticism and Modern Life",* from which it is a temptation to quote at greater length than our space warrants. The author, while cordially recognizing the "spiritual revival" shown in humanitarian activities, and welcoming "the awakening of the church to social righteousness", makes this observation.—"And yet there is a danger that this movement will either die of inanition or become a purely mechanical and heartless thing, unless it is fed with the spirit of faith and love which burns on the altar of Christianity, but which will not take care of itself"; and he quotes from Shailer Mathews ("an exponent of the social gospel") a sentiment of similar tone:—"Religion, to be anything more than humanitarianism, must give us companionship with the God of our spirits".

A point to be especially noted here is that this testimony to the necessity of an often-renewed (in a sense unbroken) contact of the human spirit with the Divine—this call to inwardness and attention to the soul's life—comes from some of those who are greatly devoted to the cause of "social redemption". Their solitude, therefore, does not proceed from ignorance of this work nor from lack of sympathy with progressive movements; it arises rather from a realization that a solid personal experience underlies the most effectual and permanent work for humanity, and that some danger threatens the spiritual life in the constant and urgent incitements to activity in what is rather vaguely called "service".

Many people are apparently feeling the stress of this "troubled pre-occupation", and we are told that a reaction is already setting in; but it seems that this reaction is not always most evident in the places where we should naturally look for it to be, though it is not less significant on that account.

"It should be a cause of serious concern," writes Professor Buckham, "that the present revival of mysticism is not so much in the church as outside. The church, which has always done so much to nourish the mystical life, has of late years too far forgotten the unfailing need and value of this quiet, inconspicuous ministry and has been somewhat feverishly throwing herself into social service, as if this were her chief mission. It is her mission to undertake the task of social reform when no other agency will assume it, but her chief mission is after all to nourish motive, to enkindle the passion that sends men and women out into social service with a faith which removes tenement house mountains and transforms desert areas of cities into gardens. Whatever the church does, as a church, in social work, should be done more for the purpose of showing that she is in earnest in her spirit and message than because such service is properly hers. Hers is the higher mission of developing spiritual personality, of kindling and replenishing the fires of faith, of bringing men into touch with God, and thus sending them forth enheartened for individual service and for larger co-operation in social service than any single church can secure."

This may not perfectly express our own views in every particular, but we can endorse the spirit of it no doubt; and in some of the succeeding paragraphs we are brought pretty close to familiar Quaker thought, if such a term may be allowed. "In nothing", says the writer just quoted, "is there greater need for the realization of the dependence of the church upon the Divine Spirit than in the movement toward Christian unity now in progress. A common experience alone can supply the basis and bond of unity."

A step or two farther and we shall be on the ground of the first Friends—of all true Friends, in fact—not only as regards the tie of spiritual fellowship, but also in their recognition of the possibility and the reality of Divine guidance for an assembly as well as for an individual. A method of procedure based upon this principle distinguishes our "meetings for discipline", together with those of committees and the like, from other deliberative bodies. Here we can neither limit nor prescribe; for in the light and authority of the Spirit of Truth it is competent to the church in any of its branches to enter upon divers concerns and into various fields of labor, without (as Barclay says) "contradicting the inward freedom" which any individual member may have in the same Spirit, and, we may add, without canceling the primary responsibility for the care and nurture of the spiritual plantation. In George Fox's quaint phrase, "When the seed is up in every particular, there is no danger."

Without such leadership, however, it is easily possible—and the present tendency is somewhat in this direction—so to overload our "business meetings" with matters not pertinent to them that attention to the spiritual welfare of the membership and to our own particular calling may come to have too little place.

Doubtless, the condition of greatest strength and growth, and hence of greatest service, is much the same now as it was in apostolic days, when the church, "walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit, was multiplied."

AN ANCIENT APPEAL.

There has lately been handed us by Sarah H. Allen, of Moorestown, N. J., an original copy of the Epistle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting addressed to "The President and Executive Council, the General Assembly of Pennsylvania and Others Whom it May Concern."

It is signed by John Drinker, Clerk, and is dated Eleventh Month 22, 1781. It is too long for insertion in full in THE FRIEND, especially as it is not conspicuously relevant to the present times; it is interesting because it reveals the fact that men of that day were alike willing to write long addresses and to listen to them, and contrasts strikingly with the present time of telegrams and 'phone calls. The address was called forth by certain riotous demonstrations in the streets of Philadelphia on the evening of Tenth Month 24, 1781, when considerable property was destroyed by vandalism, and some Friends lost heavily. After referring to the foregoing, the Epistle proceeds:

Although we believe that most of you are not unacquainted with our religious principles in general, and the reason of our difference from other professed Christians in divers matters relating to faith and practice; yet as such riotous proceedings are shameful to the Christian name and dishonourable to government, and many of us have suffered great loss and damage, we apprehend it our duty to bring into your view the grounds of our not complying with the vain modes of rejoicing, in which many indulge themselves, as also for the information of others, who through misapprehension or prejudice too freely attribute our conduct to obstinacy and a party spirit, and are thus prompted wrongfully to judge and condemn us.

It therefore appears to us requisite to put you and them in mind, that at the beginning of the Reformation, a few centuries past, the day of the Lord gradually broke forth in divers nations of Europe, raising up pious men to declare against the gross superstitions and impositions, contrary to the nature and spirit of Christianity, which for many ages had prevailed, and enabling them to stand faithful, many of them even unto death, according to the discoveries of duty made known to them, in that revival of Gospel dawn on their minds. And in process of time it pleased Almighty God further to cause his glorious day of light to advance and the sun of righteousness to shine in great brightness, whereby not only the gross, but also the more specious as well as minute branches of corruption were manifested to our worthy ancestors, which divine principle of light and truth we also profess. . . . It is not from imitation or for the support of ancient custom, but from a conviction of judgment, that we are led into the same practice with our ancestors; being firmly persuaded that the holy spirit will in like manner lead and guide such who are faithful to its dictates, in their conduct and conversation among men, and especially in matters of faith and worship; and therefore we can neither really worship, nor put on any part of the appearance thereof, merely in conformity to the injunctions of human authority; believing it our duty rather to shew our neighbors by our practice, that in this gospel day the holy Spirit hath led us out of the formality of public fasts, which though in practice under the Jewish dispensation, it does not appear that they are enjoined on Christians, either by precept or example from the New Testament.

We are not incited by party views or vindictive motives in this representation, but to awaken your cool and dispassionate attention to our multiplied sufferings and the abuses we have received, knowing that magistracy is intended for a terror to evil doers, and an encouragement to the virtuous, but where the necessary care and exertions are not used for the prevention and suppression of profanity, tumults, and outrage, and a virtuous part of the community are oppressed and insulted, the true end of government is neglected, and anarchy, confusion, contempt of authority, and insecurity to persons and property will succeed, and altho' public fasts may be proclaimed, and days under the name of humiliation recommended and appointed, and confession of sin and transgression verbally made, yet unless there be a true and sincere fasting from ambition, strife, ill-will, animosities, infidelity, fraud, luxury, revelling, drunkenness, oppression, and all manner of evil, it cannot be a fast or acceptable day to the Lord nor can we have a well grounded hope that the scourge with which the inhabitants have been visited will be removed, and the days of peace and tranquility restored.

The dispensation of war, bloodshed and calamity which hath been permitted to prevail on the continent is very solemn and awful, demanding the most serious and heartfelt attention of all ranks and denominations among the people, individually to consider and examine how far we are each of us really and sincerely engaged to bring forth fruits of true repentance and amendment of life, agreeable to the spirit and doctrine of the Gospel. And although we have been exposed to great abuse and un-Christian treatment, we wish to be enabled, through the assistance of divine grace, to cherish in ourselves, and inculcate in others with whom we have influence, that disposition of forgiveness of injuries enjoined by the precepts and example of Christ our holy Lawgiver, and to manifest our desires and endeavors to promote the real good of our country, and that we are your Friends.

QUAKER IDEALS: ARE THEY WORTH WHILE?

BY JAMES WOOD.

The development of the meaning of idea and ideal from the early classical times is an interesting study in philosophy and literature. The present meaning is primarily that an idea is a resultant of thought, and an ideal is that which is pertaining to or consisting of ideas. An ideal is that in which an idea is conceived to be completely realized—a mental conception of what is most desirable.

Quaker ideals are the embodiment of Quaker ideas which are the resultants of Quaker thought. There was deep thinking when the Quaker standards were established and their eternal verities given to the world.

Truth is eternal. It is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. That which was truth when Christ taught is truth to-day, and what was true two and a half centuries ago is true to-day. God is the same, humanity is the same. And the relations between them are ever the same. If the Quaker ideals were verities in the beginning they are so still. Changed conditions may, in some degree, make necessary some change in their application, or change in the emphasis to be placed upon different phases of truth, but the verities are the same forever.

Are the Quaker ideals "worth while" to-day?

The highest conception of human life is wrapped in the truth that God is in it. That which was declared in the Old Testament, and taught so clearly by our Lord and elucidated so especially in the Gospel of John and in Paul's epistles is confirmed in human experience. The coming of the Holy Spirit is a stupendous reality. This fact makes the possibility of human experience and development limitless. All religions that make man's advancement dependent upon the training and development of human qualities lift him to a certain level beyond which he cannot go. But Christianity says the almighty forces of Deity make man's possibilities limitless. No body of Christians has laid greater emphasis upon the Divine indwelling than have the Friends who conceive of Christianity as a religion of life. Is this ideal still worth while?

God would have man worship Him because it is a recognition of their relation to and dependence upon Him and results in blessings to them not otherwise obtainable. It is the highest act of which the human consciousness is capable. It can only be performed in response to the influence of the Spirit of God. The surrendered heart and the seeking mind find the Holy Spirit ready for co-operation and ready to bring the help and refreshment and strength that are needed. God is not limited by any rule nor are human faculties confined to any set road in their approach to Him.

Among the evidences of the omniscience and the omnipotence of the Creator is the fact that of the untold millions of human beings He has created there have never been two precisely alike. Each has had his distinct individuality. This distinctness runs through all parts of our being. We think (or we should think) independently and our emotions are stirred by different influences. We must concede that varied exercises may be effective in bringing the members of a congregation into a worshipful attitude of heart and mind.

The Quaker ideal of worship is very simple. The fundamental idea of worship is that of prostration before our Lord and King. With the Orientals that includes prostration of the body. In Western civilization the subject of a King shows this prostration by kneeling or by bowing the body. In worship it means the prostration of the soul. The subject of an earthly King, who kneels before his sovereign does not rise until he is bidden, nor does he speak until he receives permission. The same principle holds in worship and therefore it is begun in silence. The sovereign spirit determines how long this shall continue and whatever the exercise may be that follows it must be under the prompting and leading of that spirit. Communion is an important part of worship, but it cannot be experienced without opportunity. The idea of silent communion has been trenchantly expressed in the words "Give God a Chance. He has His part to do." God is the most courteous of beings. He rarely forces Himself upon any one. It is always "by your leave." His "still, small voice" can be heard only with concentrated attention.

It is admitted that this ideal finds its highest realization with those who habitually live and worship "in the spirit." There may be many others in a congregation. For these there should be instruction and exhortation and warning. It must be admitted that formerly the Quaker ideal was unduly exercised.

In the evangelical revival of thirty or more years ago there was a marked reaction from this and in this, the writer, as chairman of the Evangelistic committee of his Yearly Meeting, participated. But reactions rarely stop at the "golden mean." In so far as practices were adopted that were but weak imitations of those of other denominations they are to be avoided. In their regular use we violate an important principle.

The first two commandments embody the whole duty of man. We have considered a portion of the first, and the second requires that we shall do justly and love mercy toward our fellow-men. The ultimate wrong in human relations is found in war. The whole Christian world knows what the Quaker position is in reference to war but its fundamental principle is seldom recognized. Friends are not more humane than others, nor have they a greater horror for the human side of human suffering, nor do they object more strenuously than others to the economic waste which war entails. Their objection is based upon higher ground than these. Human life is divine. When God created man, as He did the other animals, He breathed into him the breath of life and he became a living soul. God is pleased to place something of Himself in every man. Every earthly father does this also. This divine element George Fox called a seed and so did Jesus Christ in one of His parables. The nature seed remains dormant in the soil until God's grace through the agency of light and heat and moisture quickens it into growth. The element of life within itself responds to this grace and we see the result. So in the human soul there must be an element of life to respond to God's grace. Without this response conversion is impossible. The ordinary view of conversion omits the absolutely necessary first step in the process.

When we destroy a human life we destroy this element of divinity, with all its infinite possibilities. God intended each human entity to become His habitation. To destroy it is nothing less than an attack upon Deity. To the Quaker this is unthinkable desecration. This applies also to capital punishment. Friends have held that what is wrong for one person to do is wrong for two, or two hundred, or a state or nation. In short, Friends believe that Jesus Christ meant just what He said in the Sermon on the Mount. Much of the Christian world has openly questioned this.

Is this ideal in respect to war worth while? It admits of no compromise. In all the history of the world there was never a time when there was more urgent need than now for its emphatic assertion. In the reckless legislation of our states and nation in reference to military training and military service Friends must be true to their great ideal.

But the Quaker ideals do not leave us in a negative relation to our fellow-men. The second commandment is positive in its injunction. If we love our fellow-men we must desire to serve them and in serving them we serve their Maker. When we help a human body we help repair a possible temple of God, when we help a human mind we help God to a better instrument for His praise and service, when we help a human soul we help that part of Himself which God planted there. This gives to Social Service its true dignity and character, and it gives to every devout worker the highest stimulus to his service. And the devout worker finds in a large percentage of cases the evidence of this great fundamental truth. Among the thousands of delinquents with whom the writer has come into personal relation he has been continually impressed with the evidence that all are the children of God and he has witnessed the response in darkened souls to the touches of their Father's love. This led Elizabeth Fry into her blessed work and made her name to shine throughout the ages when those with less lofty conceptions failed in their work and are forgotten. Those who see most of human unfortunates know that those who are not of sub-normal mentality, or on the border line of insanity, do have that element within themselves that responds to divine teaching and responds most and best to that teaching and that service which is most like that of Jesus Christ.

Are Quaker Ideals worth while?

The Quaker ideal of morality is worthy of notice. It grows out of the conception of life. It is not a morality of rule like that of the Pharisees of old, but that which springs from the initiative of spiritual life. It has a fresh application in every case and is an unerring guide to those who seek its leading.

Again, are Quaker Ideals worth while?

Quaker ideals apply to all the relations of life, both public and private. Enough of them have been mentioned for our present purpose.—From The American Friend.

REVIEW OF "ACROSS THE DEAD LINE OF AMUSEMENTS."

GRACE W. BLAIR.

Dr. Stough's third point is, "The Theatre's Unreal Presentation of Life." Everything is overdramatic, as he expresses it, "Anger is madness, ambition, frenzy; love, delirium."

Fourth harmful effect: The Indecent Dress. Fifth: Breaking Down of the Moral Barriers of the Audience. "Much of the tragedy of the divorce court can be traced to the tragedy of the stage," Dr. Stough asserts. The second part of the Indictment, or The Harmful Effect upon the Theatrical Profession next claims our attention. Under this we are told, first, it breaks down the moral barriers between the actors and actresses by constant and undue familiarity. Second, Assimilation of the characters played, and the consequent demoralization of one's own character. "The artificial is always dangerous to character," Dr. Stough says, and he gives graphic illustrations to prove this assertion.

Now we turn to the so-called "Good Play." We find that even here Dr. Stough wishes to caution his hearers. He tells us there are some plays which are "clean and wholesome, but there are very few." Dr. Stough talks of the Christian's attitude in regard to the "good play," for as he expresses it, "Of course, it is taken for granted that he will not think of patronizing any other kind." He quotes a play writer thus: "You do not take your daughter to see any play? You are right. Let me say once and for all, do not take your daughter to the theatre. It is not merely the work that is immoral, it is the place."

As regards reforming the theatre, Dr. Stough lost all faith because so many devout and conscientious Christians have tried and failed, and he says, "The underlying motive of the theatre must be reformed if it ever proposes to be a moral educator. It has always been run purely for the box office."

We are therefore left to face the following facts:

I. The theatre needs reforming.

II. Attempts in the past and up to the present have failed.

III. The failure is due to the dependence of the manager upon the patrons, the majority of whom demand the questionable play.

Finally, Dr. Stough gives us his conclusions that, "Somewhere imbedded in the heart of the theatre seems to be, in spite of all reformatory efforts, that which is not only not conducive to devotional and spiritual living but a positive menace to it." And he reminds us that Paul "has given a fair and rational rule by which to settle this and every question of Christian conduct, 'Prove all things. Hold fast that which is good. Abstain from every appearance of evil.'"

Leaving, then, the theatre we come to the second part of the book, called "The Curse of Cards." Dr. Stough tells us, "Games should never be classified together and then denounced together. All games are not harmful. Many are wholesome, helpful and recreative. Certain ones, as baseball, tennis, golf, bowling, etc., are pre-eminent in giving needed physical exercise, and should be encouraged. Others are mentally stimulating and afford splendid training to the intellectual faculties. Such games are checkers and chess. Still others train the eye, the muscle and the nerves, like crokinole, billiards and pool. To denounce," Dr. Stough says, "any of these in the same breath with cards is to show a lack of careful thought, and to do a great injustice to those who enjoy real recreative games." Games, therefore, Dr. Stough separates into two classes: games of skill and games of chance. Games of skill may be used improperly, but in themselves they are "right and proper."

Under games of chance, he places all card games, all dice games and all domino games. Of all these, he considers the euchre deck the most harmful. Authors, flinch, etc., are games of chance, but there is so much less of chance that they are not so harmful. Besides that many of these games have an intellectual side, and although Dr. Stough considers them games of chance, he wishes, as he expresses it, "simply to discriminate even between games of chance."

On cards he lays the blame for "the lost art of conversation." Players are not allowed to talk for fear it will interfere with the games. Following this discussion, we come to the topic, "The Inter-relations of Intellect, Conscience and Will." Dr. Stough gives this thought, "Every act of our lives must be submitted to three psychological forces. But there is one realm over which they cannot preside. . . . and that is the realm of chance. Here they lose their prestige and power. This it is that makes cards and dice so dangerous to players." And again under the destructive element of chance, Dr. Stough writes, "What intellect cannot positively determine, conscience cannot morally estimate and in consequence, will hesitates to act." Therefore the nerve is set on edge, the blood rushes to the brain, and the player loses his temper. This thought carries us to the heading, the effect upon the temper.

Demoralization of honor and honesty are next enlarged upon, which lead to the subject of brazen cheating. All through these pages the reader is treated to stories most sad and shocking, and Dr. Stough has enough incidents at hand to prove his assertions.

"Scientific Whist Most Dangerous of All," is another subject discussed; followed by, "No Difference Between Card Playing and Gambling." The whist game when played for money is legally considered gambling and is played in exactly the same way as when played for pleasure. "Why Card Players Become Gamblers," is next enlarged upon.

"The Danger of Home Card Playing," Dr. Stough portrays by many pathetic stories. We are told that "seventy-five per cent. of all the gamblers who were said to have been interviewed by the Civic League in Chicago, during the World's Columbian Exposition, declared that they started by parlor card playing."

(To be concluded.)

GOD'S JEWELS.

I love the little stars the best
That gleam with modest light,
The tiny orbs that hardly show
Upon the breast of night.

I choose the blossoms wee that spring
In hidden nooks and aisles;
I crave their glad humility,
The sweetness of their smiles.

The shy bird of the forest
To me is doubly dear:
More than the eagle's boldness
Its sad reproof I fear.

Not in extent and vastness
Did God his jewels mold.
I love the meek and shrinking
More than the proud and bold.

PREACHING THE POWER OF THE SPIRIT IN GERMANY.

Better victories may be won by love than by blood and iron. The principle is not one uttered by Germany's enemies, but by a German himself who belongs to the party which even before the war saw that spiritual victories are greater than those won by brute force. As the spokesman of a small group, Professor F. W. Foerster, of the University of Munich, rejects altogether "the modern interpretation, so popular in Germany, of the blood and iron theory of its old Chancellor—the man who thought that German life could be modeled permanently on the stories of medieval Germanic heroism." So declares a writer in The Churchman (New York), who gives the motto of this movement as the word unlernen, which means not only "to unlearn," but to learn anew. Furthermore, the purpose preached by this new evangelist is "a Germany restored to its ancient ideals of cosmopolitanism and humanity." We read:

"As opposed to pan-Germanism, this new platform is a platform of universal brotherhood. When Professor Foerster left Vienna in 1913 he asked the students to give up singing Die Wacht am Rhein and to work for the racial conciliation of the Germanic and Slavic elements in the Dual Monarchy.

"The outbreak of the war has not interrupted Professor Foerster's propaganda. Moreover, he is not fighting alone. A Swiss scholar, Paul Seippel, who was a close friend of Professor Foerster when they were both at the University of Zurich, tells of a conversation he had with his German colleague some years ago, when they agreed that they saw evidences of a disintegration in German nationalistic sentiment. Pan-Germanism, we are told, has little attraction for the newer generation of German students under the age of thirty years. That this impression is true is shown by the fact that in many parts of Germany among the student body Professor Foerster is receiving sympathetic attention and cordial support in his warfare against militarism.

"The latest book of Professor Foerster, 'The German Youth and the World-War,' contains a selection of letters which bear out the truth of his statement that German militarism no longer controls German young men. They fully understand the meaning of the word unlernen, and the writers of these letters, far removed as they are from theoretical pacifism, show their abhorrence of the German gospel of Schrecklichkeit. One of them speaks feelingly of the arm-chair patriots who are devoting themselves to writing hymns of hate. Another, a volunteer, already in service for two years, writes, 'A simple soldier, free from all of the historical and political prejudices inculcated hitherto by education, can understand the value of your ideas better than is supposed. When, as in my case, one has come to know near at hand for nineteen months the fury and the burden of war, one is glad to think that in our country there are men who have not yet forgotten that there are better victories to win than those won by blood and iron.'

Another speaks of the value of Professor Foerster's propaganda in restoring to public view the fact that public life and policy should be based upon righteousness and ethics."

Present-day civilization is named by Professor Foerster not "Kultur" but "Babel," a word by which he means "technical efficiency without love." There is no chance, he preaches, "of mutual understanding without love, and no peace is possible except through religious and moral regeneration." Further:

"The durable peace of the pacifists will never be realized until the altars of gold and mammon are overthrown. In his vision Professor Foerster sees the victory of spiritual forces, and the destruction of brute force. 'In this struggle of giants,' he says at the close of his book, 'the people who, blinded to the very end, remain attached to the idea of force, and filled entirely with this idea, will apply to its internal conflicts the crude and myopic instincts of a brutal egoism, and in the end will go to destruction. But the people, who, by the shattering forces of the experiences of the war, are led to recognize the sole real world-policy in the idea of right and in the will for reconciliation, this people will find in such moral regeneration the most blessed results for all its conflicts over its social and economic problems. Through this channel in a thousand ways it will heal the wounds of the war at home and abroad.' Professor Foerster comes out unequivocally for the principle of international federation. Only in this way can international anarchy be ended and a new world order founded—an imperium based upon the idea of right."—From Literary Digest.

HOLLAND: THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

In Holland's budget for 1916 no less than one-eighth of the nation's expenditure is allocated for the maintenance and relief of the Belgian refugees. This shows concretely the noble efforts made by the Dutch in behalf of the refugees settled temporarily within its borders. But not only has the State itself spent money; there has been an equal disbursement of voluntary aid in the work of relief organization. From the first days of the war Holland welcomed without any selfish reservation all the panic-stricken Belgians who came flying over the frontier before the advance of the invading Huns, and what renders the service the more honorable and more distinctive is the disinterestedness of it. The Dutch had nothing to gain either in good-will or future interest, but spontaneously local committees sprang up in all directions, and, in addition to general private hospitality, camps were organized with extraordinary rapidity for the housing and relief of the destitute. One little Dutch village of 1,300 inhabitants made means to welcome 25,000 refugees. Since then the work of mercy and relief has proceeded along lines of well-thought-out and methodical philanthropy, as the problem of dealing with some 100,000 homeless exiles called for something which even abundant sympathy cannot continuously supply.

In four large camps are now concentrated some 16,000 persons who have neither friends nor means to find hospitality like more fortunate refugees. These camps are complete cities of refuge, fully provided with hospitals, crèches, dispensaries, isolation wards, and schools. Doctors, nurses and nuns give their services, and they work in conjunction with the Society of Friends, whose organization is one of the most remarkable features of the scheme of relief. But in addition to the poorer refugees thus provided for, there are over 80,000 being relieved otherwise throughout the country. The refugees have found a special friend in Baron van Tuyll, the minister specially allocated for the purpose, who has applied a generous contribution from Denmark to the building of transportable houses, and has also devoted his energies to the establishment of technical schools, and cooking and dress-making classes. Better class refugees who have fallen into complete lack of funds, and have thus become unable to support themselves, have been assisted by the government. These various forms of relief are being continued, and they are as ample and as hearty now as in the first months of the war.—The Churchman.

A BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER.

"Into the woods my Master went,
Clean forspent, forspent,
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him;
The little green leaves were kind to Him;
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him;
When into the woods He came.

"Out of the woods my Master went,
And He was well content,
Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When Death and Shame would woo Him last,
From under the trees they drew Him last;
'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last
When out of the woods He came."

MEDICINE DAY.

Sometime after White Wolf began to walk the better way in obedience to the Spirit of Christ within him, he rode to the Agency one First-day morning and asked to see the Agent. On being admitted he said, "I want you tell me whether I a wise man or a fool. I wake up this morning, something tell me, 'This is Agent's medicine-day (meeting-day). You go, make medicine (worship) with Agent.' I know not what it was told me, but you know whether it is your medicine-day. If it is I stay—I wise man. If not, I go home—I fool."

The Agent, clapping him on the shoulder, said, "White Wolf you are a wise man. This is my medicine-day. You stay and make medicine with me." So the Indian chief stayed and attended the Sabbath-school and the meeting, receiving also his breakfast and dinner. He went home fully satisfied that again he had been obedient to the Voice that speaks within. He lived many years after this and became a missionary among his people—a noble Christian man.

HISTORY OF SATANTA AND BIG TREE AND "THE UNWELCOME MESSAGE."

Satanta was perhaps the most influential of the Kiowa chiefs; a notorious raider and a great lover of whiskey, but not without good qualities and marked ability.

He was taken prisoner in 1860, but was released by General Sheridan at the place where Fort Sill now stands. In 1871, at the head of one hundred warriors, he made an attack upon a corn train in Texas, killing seven teamsters and committing deeds of barbarity, of which he boasted on his return home, whereupon General Sherman and Agent Tatum ordered his arrest with his accomplice, Big Tree. They were turned over to the State of Texas, tried for murder, found guilty by the jury and sentenced to be hung.

This sentence was afterwards changed to imprisonment for life. About this time a number of the raiding chiefs becoming friendly to the Government, did no raiding themselves, did not allow their warriors to go raiding and prevented some of the other tribes from going into Texas and Mexico on those expeditions.

Both Kiowas and Comanches returned the captives they had taken, also their stolen mules, and were doing all they could to live on friendly terms with the white people. On account of this good behavior, the release of their imprisoned chiefs had been promised to a delegation of Indians who visited Washington, D. C.

These chiefs, being under the jurisdiction of the State of Texas, the General Government had no authority to promise their release, but the State of Texas was about to comply with this agreement, when the Modoc tragedy occurred in Oregon. General Canby and Dr. Thomas were killed and Colonel Meacham almost lost his life, and the cry, "Exterminate the whole race" resounded throughout the land. Colonel Meacham, whose life was spared to tell the whole story, plainly shows the Indians were not the aggressors in that terrible tragedy, though guilty of a treacherous deed. In consequence of this tragedy, Government refused to release these chiefs, and official information to this effect was forwarded to the Agency that Satanta and Big Tree would not be released as promised to the delegation at Washington. An unjust countermand.

Well knowing what the feelings of the Indians would be when they ascertained that "Washington" had broken his agreement with them, the Agent withdrew all requirements on the part of the Government of my going to camp at that time, and under these conditions, saying, "It is all thy life is worth to go now," but leaving me at liberty to act according to my own convictions of duty.

From discussions I had heard in camp, I greatly feared that upon learning that their chiefs were not to be released, as soon as the great Medicine Dance was ended, the more unfriendly element among the Kiowas joined by some from other tribes would enter upon a system of raiding and murder upon the frontier settlements.

I had gone among the Indians under an apprehension of its being of Divine requiring, in order to exercise a restraining influence over them, and ultimately to bring them into more friendly relations with the nation, if possible. I found if I would preserve my own peace of mind I must not now turn back from the work I had undertaken, even though dark and threatening clouds appeared looming up from the horizon, but must myself be the bearer of this most "unwelcome message."

Accordingly on the morning of the fourteenth of Sixth Month, 1872, I set out in company with a man and two women, who had come in for me and for rations. We spent the first night in an Apache camp, where most of our rations were consumed, and the balance the next day, so the second night we encamped without rations. While preparing our beds for the night we were surprised by the appearance of a Comanche man and woman, with a mule laden with buffalo meat. They explained that after dressing the meat, it was too late to go farther, and seeing our camp-fire they came to us, and were warmly welcomed. In return for our hospitality, each member of our party received a choice portion of buffalo meat; soon after we all stretched upon the ground for a night's repose.

On the morning of the sixteenth we continued our journey, reaching camp about three o'clock, P. M. We had traveled, mostly on the gallop, for twenty-five hours. The distance from the Agency must have been one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles. We found assembled the whole of the Kiowa tribe, some five hundred Comanches, Apaches, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Caddoes, Wichitas, and many other Indians, to be present at the great annual festival of the Kiowas, some thirty-six hundred in all.

On approaching the camp I observed a very long building (if so it might be called) made of the green boughs of the cotton-wood, covered overhead with muslin; towards this we made our way. I was directed to dismount and enter it. On doing so I found all the chiefs and war chiefs of the Kiowa and Apache tribes, nearly all the chiefs of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and most of the Comanche chiefs, to the number of about one hundred, assembled in council, with the pipe in circulation among them, and I observed that every one took it. Although they were thus assembled partly in anticipation of my arrival and all anxious to hear the news I might bring, not a word was said to me beyond the customary salutation and motioning me to a seat beside Kicking Bird, until I had partaken of the meal prepared for me. Then I was asked, "What news from Washington?" My situation at this time may be more easily imagined than described—alone among savages—afar from civilized men—the bearer of a most "unwelcome message"—without any outward thing to look to for protection—entirely dependent upon them for subsistence and the means of returning to civilized life if such return were even permitted.

After a short pause, during which I was enabled to feel my confidence somewhat renewed in that unflinching Arm of Power which holds in its grasp the destinies of men and of nations, I answered, "Bad news."

EXTRACTS FROM RECENT LETTERS OF JANE C. BALDERSTON.

Eleventh Month 16th.—"To-day I have added to the interesting store of things which I have seen, a Mohammedan mosque. We visited two, which were not far apart. I do not know how many others there are here in the city. These two are said to be in all essentials like what one would find in 'Arabia, the cradle of Islam,' though of course there are Chinese touches here and there. We were allowed at one place to go in and look round, after we had taken off our shoes at the door. But at the other, they said we should do some kind of washing before going in." (So they did not enter.)

Eleventh Month 19th.—Under this date J. C. B. tells of the departure of her companion, Mary Naish, for Tungchwan, to assist Irene Hutchinson who is in charge of the school there, and states that it is probable she also will be sent to that place after a time.

This letter narrates an interesting experience with some mothers, in reference to the binding of the feet. It may be worth while to quote it as given.

Eleventh Month 21st.—"To-day I have been out on a new errand . . . trying to persuade two mothers not to bind their daughters' feet. Soon after we began to play with the little girls last summer, Mary and I noticed that one was beginning to hobble on her heels in rather painful fashion. She is eleven years old and her feet already fairly good sized. It will be frightful if she has to have them cramped into an inch or two of space. I think they begin at about six years, if they want to make really 'beautiful lily feet.' Then, just last First-day, we found another bright little girl of nine beginning to hobble. I talked it over with one of the family and a Chinese helper in the house, and we decided to go out and see what we could do. We found that the girls would welcome us as deliverers, if we could persuade their mothers. But the mothers are a different proposition. We tried to make them realize that even Chinese public opinion is now against this, but I don't know how it will be. I would be so thankful if they would only give it up now before the two girls' feet are seriously injured."

Eleventh Month 23rd.—"What do you think! If I understood correctly those two little girls have their feet unbound already! Almost afraid to believe it, till I ask Sin Da Niang about it, to-morrow."

Eleventh Month 26th.—"Yes, it seems to be really true about the girls' feet! And yesterday there came an order from Peking that all women under thirty are to unbind their feet. I do believe the days of 'lily feet' in China are numbered; but, doubtless, for many years yet the majority of women to be seen here will be hobbling on their heels. The Manchu women have never bound their feet. A great number of them are living near us. They are easily distinguished from the real Chinese by their large feet. They also differ slightly in the way they dress, and in the manner of arranging the hair. The Manchus, you will remember, were the rulers of China, previous to the revolution of 1900."

"Since Mary left, last week, I have been trying in some measure to take her place in the children's meetings, and they are most interesting. On Sixth-day evenings we have games.

Mary has worked it up to a point where the little girls are not afraid and join in the games with fine spirit. This morning (First-day) came the regular children's meeting, 11:06 present, 46 girls and 70 boys. Hymns are taught (first the words and then how to sing them). The children are addressed by students from the University. Mary Naish assisted these students to plan the first meetings, and now they attend to it themselves. They are not Friends' meetings, I know, but I believe they are a very good thing for this mass of little folks, who as yet have little idea what Christianity means. The girls all wanted to escort me home. It was only after quite a little coaxing that I persuaded them to go back. . . . If I knew how to reach the women as well as Mary Naish with the help of those students has reached the children, I should be very glad.

"After the meeting I walked out to the University and had dinner with the Silcocks. I had our coolie to go with me, for it is considered hardly right for a girl or woman to walk as far as that alone. It takes about an hour, either walking or going by chair, so the distance must be about three miles, of which two miles are within the city walls, and the University is at least a half mile beyond the wall (on the farther side of the city from J. C. B.'s home), but there are plenty of houses all the way.

"My chief purpose in going out was to attend a Fellowship meeting . . . a good helpful time."

FRIENDS AND CONSCRIPTION.

[The belated numbers of The Friend [London] contain many records of courage and patience under persecution of true seventeenth century faith. Not unlikely some of our most notable chapters of history are now being written. We commend the whole record to the weighty consideration of Friends, and re-print a few extracts from Reports from the Tribunals. —EDITORS.]

A. Barratt Brown is well known to some of our readers. The following is from his statement before the Tribunal:

"I believe all war—however noble the aim—to be both un-Christian and immoral. I understand the life and teaching of Jesus to mean implicit faith in God and unalterable love of man. I cannot reconcile this with dreadnoughts and high explosives. Therefore, although I do not live up to this ideal, I am sure I ought not to take any part in warfare. The Military Service Act is intended to organize the national resources for war. I cannot allow my services to be conscripted—however indirectly—for such a purpose. I should feel even civil alternatives to be a bargaining and compromise of conscience. Hence my claim for absolute exemption from the provisions of the Act. I must continue to try and serve my country by working for the welfare and liberties of my fellow-citizens and for peace among the nations. To give up that service—which is the highest I know—would be disloyalty to my country and my God."

After discussion on the State and the Individual, applicant was asked a few questions as to his work at Woodbrooke and elsewhere. He was told by the Chairman that "a man of his type and intelligence encouraged men to become conscientious objectors."

A. B. B.: "I must take exception to that."

Member of Tribunal: "I think you are doing a great deal of harm."

A. B. B.: "I have absolutely refused to prompt a man to abstain from fighting if it were not according to his conscientious objection."

Member of Tribunal: "Your influence is such that a man who wants to get out of fighting would be glad to shelter himself behind your views."

Applicant admitted that his teaching might lead a man to his way of thinking.

Another member said that a man like applicant was responsible for the manufacture of hundreds of thousands of men who alleged conscientious objection.

Applicant protested against the word "manufacture."

Members of the Tribunal commented on A. B. B.'s "dangerous influence," and the Chairman summed up somewhat as follows: "We entirely disagree with all your views and activities, but you are clearly one of the people on whose account the clause was inserted in the Act, so we exempt you."

The question of "alternative service" is clearly dealt with in the following:—

Mark Guy Pearce (Purley) said in his statement:—

"I cannot conscientiously accept any work of national importance as a condition of exemption from military service and my chief reasons are as follows:—

(1) I can make no bargain or compromise on the question of war.

(2) Under the Military Service Acts the country is avowedly organized to prosecute war, and I object not merely to military service but to war. One of our leading statesmen has said: 'We must consolidate and co-ordinate all our energies for the purpose (that is, complete military victory) . . . we should coldly, scientifically and systematically arrange our national life for the one supreme business in hand.'

(3) I might be the means of displacing another man to do the military service I cannot undertake; and I cannot, of course, be a party to assisting in this way what I think to be wrong.

(4) I believe I am called upon to maintain a distinct and uncompromising witness for my principles, and that this is the best kind of national service I can render."

Some of our readers probably know Joseph H. Tregelles. He has not only the courage, but the humility of the martyrs.

Extracts from letters by Joseph H. Tregelles:

On the 21st: "We are to be ready for our court-martial tomorrow at 8.30 a. m., a walk of nearly three miles. . . . they have not put the uniform on me. . . . My convictions have only been made stronger by my experiences, and they gain strength every day." On the 20th: "We are to be ready to leave our cells at 8.30. . . . Trust wholly in our loving Heavenly Father. Praise God always. . . ."

On the same day, in the train: "We are now on our way to Wormwood Scrubs. It is something to be thankful for to have fresh air and to see the country and to be able to converse with another again. A young soldier came to my cell after breakfast this morning and said the commanding officer sent him to thank me for my note. I am thankful I was faithful and wrote to him."

Dorothy G. Tregelles writes: "I had a letter from my husband, Joseph H. Tregelles, yesterday (2nd inst.) to say his sentence was one year's hard labor (commuted to 112 days) for refusing to wear the uniform."

The account of the death of one conscientious objector and of the cruel treatment of another make painful reading, but they are so much a part of the cruel tyranny of conscription that we need to hear the details.

THE DEATH OF W. L. ROBERTS AT DYCE.

A Friend (W. M.) writes: "W. L. R. was a brave man with a far from robust body unfitted for the hardships which both soldiers and conscientious objectors are having to put up with. . . . When in prison an old complaint made him suffer very much, but he would not allow me to send him for a prescription that would relieve it, lest his people should be anxious. The weekly chats we had were great times for us both. He was allowed to receive books from outside, and his pleasure on reading a copy of the 'Story of Quakerism,' that was given as a prize at Sibford School, was a revelation.

"His constant hope was, that upon his release he would be given some useful work that he could do 'well' (he was an architect). As a sidelight to this, the information to himself and his fellow prisoners that they were making mail-bags to carry bread to prisoners in Germany was an inspiration to them. His face quite lighted up when I first was able to tell him.

"And then one day the prison visitor found they were gone: handcuffed together as one of them wrote later. He wrote cheerfully from the quarry, and his end there has been as noble as that of any soldier—for he laid down his life willingly for the highest."

A. Fenner-Brockway was present at the Bredford Local Tribunal before which W. L. R. appeared. In reply to the Chairman's question, "Are you not very youthful to hold such decided opinions?" applicant said, "I have been taught from my mother's knee that to hate and to kill are contrary to the teaching of Christ." Before the Appeal Tribunal at Stockport appellant's father spoke of the Christian teaching he had given to his boy: "I and his mother are responsible for the views he holds. We have taught him to love his enemies and to be kind to all men." In spite of all this, the Appeal Tribunal refused any exemption. Since W. Roberts' death, his younger brother has written as follows: "Walter's death has strengthened me in my determination to continue, if need be, the glorious fight in which he has laid down his life. It has also made me feel that we should love more and more and more."

TREATMENT OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

For some time no cases of brutal treatment of conscientious objectors have been reported. The following case shows, however, that the danger of such treatment still exists:

G. B. was refused any relief under the Military Service Acts, because it was maintained by both Local and Appeal Tribunals that his objection to military service was a political one and not moral. He was refused leave to go before the Central Tribunal. He was handed over to the military and sent to ——. From the beginning he refused to be medically examined, to sign papers or to obey military orders. He was then sent to ——. The escort tied his kitbag round his neck, nearly choking him, but a soldier cut the string and placed the bag in a cart. On a morning following for an hour and a-half before breakfast several men told off for the purpose tried to force him to obey orders, and on his refusal, he was pummelled until he was bruised from head to foot. In this state he was dragged out to parade after breakfast, and dragged by main force round the field. When he refused to march or mark time, his ankles were kicked until they were swollen and a source of torture, fresh ryles of men keeping up the fusillade of blows and kicks, and arm and wrist twisting. B. had taken no food for some time. . . . The Major was riding about the field, and sent for B. to interrogate him as to the reason of his attitude. B. pointed out that he had already stated his attitude, and under proper conditions he would be willing to re-state it. He was then handed over to the gym. squad for a further course of "discipline" . . . in a public park before a large number of men and women and children. At 11 a. m. the wife and sister of B. arrived in the park and were eye-witnesses. The treatment included ducking and harrying round the field time after time, being thrice pitched bodily over a seven-foot palisade and allowed to fall clear on the other side like a log, repeatedly thrown head over heels from a platform, with intervals of "physical exercise"—B. being placed on his back on the ground with a man's foot in the pit of his stomach, while other men worked his limbs.

B.'s wife and sister and other ladies spoke strongly to the officer responsible, but without effect. Eye-witnesses expressed their sympathy to the wife and sister and their loathing of such treatment. Later two friends and the wife were refused permission to see the prisoner or the officer commanding. Finally the wife was informed by a non-commissioned officer that her husband had been shot. From the beginning of his surrender B. had disobeyed orders and was therefore entitled to court-martial.

A strong deputation of — Trade Unionists and others visited the park with a view to seeing if this was to be continued. It was unnecessary for the time being, as B. was too broken physically to resist.

The future progress of mankind is to be sought, not through the strifes and hatreds of the nations, but rather by their friendly co-operation in the healing and enlightening works of peace and in the growth of a spirit of friendship and mutual confidence which may remove the causes of war.—BRYCE.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND:—

Among the important questions which our approaching Yearly Meeting will be called upon to decide are these:

Shall Philadelphia Yearly Meeting be represented by delegates in a Conference proposed to be held somewhere in England soon after the close of the present war, for the consideration of the attitude of Friends throughout the world upon the many grave questions then confronting the Christian Church?

Shall the policy adopted last year for the maintenance of a Peace propaganda, and which was then understood to be for a single year, be renewed and continued indefinitely? This service was committed to thirty-four men and twelve women—a Committee of forty-six, representing all parts of our Yearly Meeting, and also a wide diversity of thought in reference to the Christian testimony of the Society toward war under the political, social and industrial conditions of twentieth century life. Shall the subject hereafter be dealt with by such a Committee? If so, shall the present membership be undisturbed, or shall a new appointment be made? Shall it be instructed by the Yearly Meeting as to the vital principles which shall guide its action, or has the Yearly Meeting confidence that the Committee will ever seek to be ministers of righteousness and maintain unwaveringly the principles illustrated in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ?

I present these questions at this time in the hope of centering the thought of many upon them, that we may come together conscious of the mind of Christ and anxious to obey it, be the personal consequences what they may.

The sentiment of the world at this time seems to be divided into three groups, as follows:

FIRST—Those who justify war as the means of adjustment of any or all international questions.

SECOND—Those who justify war in extremis, while claiming to be peace-lovers. These generally subordinate the question of terminating the Great War to determining how future wars may be avoided. Some go so far as to urge that the present war should be continued until the participants agree to recognize that the spirit of militarism has been overcome. Peace brought about through War.

THIRD—Those who believe that the teachings of Christ forbid avenging wrongs by taking human life, and that this law is of present, immediate, universal application, in individual, national and international relations. These accept the law of love toward our enemies. They see the necessity of making for the life and happiness of our enemies as well as of our friends. Such leave the avenging of wrongs with God, who claims this as one of His prerogatives. They believe that the blessings pronounced by Christ upon the meek, the merciful, the peacemakers, are real, ample and of present-day application. They also see in war one of the greatest obstacles to the establishment upon earth of the Kingdom of God—the supreme object of human existence.

Upon our alignment with one or another of these groups depends the course of our approaching Yearly Meeting in the solution of the vital questions outlined in the earlier paragraphs of this letter. May grace be given us to know the will of God and to obey it.

NEWS ITEMS.

At Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends, held First Month 24, 1917, a Committee was appointed to prepare a suitable memorial on the subject of the abolishment of capital punishment in the State of Pennsylvania, to be presented to the members of the Legislature.

CLEMENT B. WEBSTER,
Clerk.

THE recent appearance of a new edition of Bellows' French Dictionary will doubtless recall the days when our late friend John Bellows was engaged on the original compilation of this work. Many were the difficulties which beset his path—yet his devotion to the task and his faith in its final outcome carried him successfully through, and he lived to see his work known and appreciated by a very wide circle. As our friend himself stated under the word Love in the pages of the dictionary, its compilation had been a "labor of love" to him; and so also was the task of adding to its literary matter whenever opportunity offered in the years following its first publication.

FROM a list of students and others who have been associated with Aekworth School, England, it appears that there are sixteen officers and servants of the School, each of whom has been associated with it for forty years or longer. The present Headmaster, Frederic Andrews, tops the list with fifty years as pupil, apprentice, teacher and headmaster.

REFERRING to the fact that Dr. Rendel Harris was among the passengers on the submarine City of Birmingham, the Westminster Gazette of recent date, remarked on the "fairly adventurous life" which he has experienced, "with a good many surprising combinations. . . . He has been to Mount Sinai, and he has traveled in Armenia in massacre times or just after them, and he has discovered Syriac MSS, which restored lost books to early Christian literature in the 'Apology of Aristides' and the 'Odes of Solomon'; and he helped to decipher the great Sinai Syriac codex. And now, at or near 65 years of age, he goes out to India and is submarine. The telegrams report that all the passengers were saved, so that there is every hope that after a winter of sunshine in India, Dr. Harris will be back among us, with fresh interests and a great story to tell. One can conceive that the presence of such a man must have contributed to the reassurance of his fellow-passengers. Between the 'Ataraxia' of which he writes and the 'Uncle Remus' which he quotes, there are apt to be consolations in his company."—The Friend (London).

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL—A permanent playground for the children of Haverford and Preston is assured by the completion of the work of the Preston Park and Playground Committee, composed of prominent men. Their report, after more than three years' work, was made public recently.

GENERAL.—Negroes from every section of the South, attending the Twenty-sixth Annual Tuskegee Negro Conference, adopted "declarations" at Tuskegee, Ala., admonishing Negroes to remain in the South and co-operate with white people in the improvement of labor conditions. The "declarations" deal principally with the migration of Negroes northward, the boll-weevil, and distress among colored people because of floods.

A nation-wide campaign for the abolition of capital punishment is under way. Sponsored by a group of men and women prominent in the world of philanthropy and other public affairs, propaganda against the hangman's noose and the electric chair is to be directed through every possible channel. The first of a series of weekly broadsides, issued in New York by this group of propagandists, cites several active steps already taken by the committee.

It is reported that 1,225,000 heard William Ashley Sunday in Boston. A hundred times, also in round numbers, he stepped to the edge of the platform and gave the call to "all who will take my hand for Jesus Christ," and the 52,818th individual came down the saw-dust aisles to give his answer at the concluding meeting.

More than $2,500,000 has been administered by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian relief, according to a statement issued by Dr. James L. Barton, of Boston, Chairman. These funds have been distributed in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Turkey, Persia and Russia through the American Embassy at Constantinople, through consular offices and by missionaries.

The Arkansas Senate and House passed a bill at Little Rock, Ark., that prohibits the shipment of liquor into Arkansas for any purpose save medical or sacramental.

Professor W. H. Schofield, of Harvard University, was elected President of the American-Scandinavian Foundation to succeed Dr. Frederick Lynch at the annual meeting of the trustees at New York. The Foundation was established to promote friendly relations between the United States and the Scandinavian countries, as outlined recently in THE FRIEND by the able Secretary.

Four Lights, called by its editors an adventure in internationalism, is just out. It is a little four-page fortnightly publication, edited by three women, Anne Herendeen, Edna Kenton and Zoe Beckley, to voice the young, uncompromising woman's peace movement in America, whose aims are daring and immediate—to stop the war in Europe, to federate the nations for organized peace at the close of the war, and meanwhile to guard democracy from the subtle dangers of militarism.

The Federal Bureau of Mines has issued a warning against operating automobile engines in small garages with doors and windows closed. There is a hint of this danger in the popular mind, and this official evidence may well serve to deepen it. The scientific tests which have been applied in Washington show that there is danger of death after the automobile engine has been running fifteen minutes. The gas generated is carbon monoxide, which is colorless, odorless and tasteless, but extremely poisonous.

Change of name of the Danish West Indies to "The Dervey Islands," in honor of Admiral Dewey, was proposed in a joint resolution introduced at Washington by Representative Allen, of Ohio, who announced that he was submitting letters to President Wilson and to the Foreign Affairs Committee of Congress urging the change.

FOREIGN.—British efforts to increase trade with Russia after the war are taking the extremely practical shape of encouraging the study of the Russian language by young men training for commercial life. At Leeds University a chair for the study of Russian has recently been created through the generosity of Sir James Roberts.

The Gazette of Lausanne says that the population of Switzerland has decreased as one consequence of the war. According to the paper, both marriages and births are much fewer, a fact which it attributes to the increased cost of living.

Operations were begun recently in Shanghai by a new flour mill, built entirely with Chinese capital, the machinery for which was purchased in the United States. It is known as a "thousand-barrel mill," but has been able to turn out about 1400 barrels a day. The total investment in machinery is 175,000 taels, or about $130,000.

NOTICES.

TO FRIENDS IN CALIFORNIA.—I desire to call the attention of all friends in California to bills now before the Legislature of that State, which call for the compulsory military training of boys in high schools in California.

If the liberty of our country and rights of conscience are not to be put in great jeopardy, immediate action must be taken against all such bills.

Many educators do not want military influence introduced into our schools. As far as I know, leading church organizations, and ministerial unions, when the matter has been brought before them, have altogether opposed it. The State Church Federation opposes it; the labor unions are against it; the San Francisco Congress of Mothers has gone on record in opposition to it.

Such a law would bring conscientious Friends with children into difficulties. The moral dangers to decent boys will be great. It would strike at civil and religious liberty; it will result in our children learning one thing in the home, school or places of worship and acquiring another ideal on the parade ground. It would tend to blur their consciences and to create a lack of faith in God and the sincerity of the religion of their elders. A New Zealand clergyman has called military training for boys "paganism in excelsis."

I do not ask for money. Experience has taught that many people can easily see their way clear to spend $500 for some object of pleasure, whilst they would not see the necessity of contributing $5 to defend their liberties or those of their children; but do not let us be slack in this matter in other respects. I only ask for the immediate hearty co-operation of Friends everywhere in fighting these bills. Strongly protest against them. Also urge legislation favorable to compulsory physical training in our schools for both sexes. We are pretty sure to have one or the other sort of legislation. Let it be the right kind.

Please therefore at once send communications—if nothing else post-cards will do—to our new Governor, Wm. H. Stephens, Sacramento, and to your State Senators and Assemblymen. Be sure to write all your Senators and Assemblymen. If not knowing the addresses of these men, get them from a nearby newspaper office. Also write to local newspapers and agitate the matter everywhere. Send to me, Hotel Vendome, San José, Cal., or to Robert C. Root, 1119 Hobart Building, San Francisco, for free literature for distribution. There is absolutely no time to lose.

LECTURE ON THE STARS AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—A cordial invitation is extended to all interested to be present at an illustrated lecture at the School by B. R. Baumgardt, of Los Angeles, Cal., well known as Lecturer, Scientist and Explorer, on the subject: "What Everybody Should Know About the Stars," on Sixth-day, Second Month 16, 1917, at 12.45 P. M.

ALFRED C. GARRETT leads a class for young Friends at Friends' Institute on Fifth-day evenings, at 7.45. A teacher training course is being followed. Emphasis will be placed upon Biblical foundations of Friends' principles and views. All interested young people are cordially invited to join the class.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL LYCEUM LECTURE.—J. Howard Whitehouse, M. P., an English Friend and a member of the House of Commons, will deliver an address on the subject, "Conditions in England During the War," in the lecture-room of Friends' Select School, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, on Sixth-day evening, Second Month 9, at 7.45 o'clock. As Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Secretary of Toynebee Hall, London, Organizer of Social Work for Cadbury Bros., Birmingham, and in many other positions of prominence and responsibility, Howard Whitehouse has had an extraordinary experience, which reaches into educational and literary fields as well as political and social. He has only spoken before the Contemporary Club and one or two other audiences in this city, and Friends generally will doubtless be glad of an opportunity to hear him. As a speaker he is said to possess unusual charm and power.

All interested are cordially invited to be present.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.—The following books have recently been added to Friends' Library:—Cope—Religious Education in the Family. Fry—Christ and Peace. GETTING AND GIVING.

The recent announcement that the revival campaign of William A. Sunday in New York City this Spring is to be conducted without the usual accompaniment of begging has excited no little interest, not only in religious circles but among hard-headed business men as well. Not a few are inclined to believe that it will be difficult to maintain attendance on this new basis, so ingrained is the feeling that loyalty in such matters is directly related to what is put into them, rather than to what they yield in interest and inspiration. The reported hesitation of Sunday to accept the plan of a millionaire to guarantee expenses, is doubtless based on his understanding of this trait of human nature. We shall not be surprised to find that he is forced to return to the old basis. Loyalty, even as demonstrated in much of our personal experience, is to be looked for in those who serve us rather than in those whom we serve. Is this anything other than a demonstration of the activity of a great spiritual law in the domain of the material world? Are not getting and giving two sides of a single act? Do we not impair the usefulness of either act in human society by divorcing them?

It is not unusual to speak of the paradoxes of New Testament teaching. The climax in seeming paradox is reached in the declaration that he who would save his life must lose it. Interpreted by actual experience, saving and losing—getting and giving and numerous other ideas that sound like antipodes are perceived to be what the mathematicians call reciprocals. In the spiritual world they are not paradoxes at all, and even on the material plane their relation is at least complimentary. A recognition of this underlying principle in paradoxes is no doubt quite general; the new program for the New York revival has disclosed this recognition. What perhaps is of interest to us is the practical application of the principle—especially as regards the relation of giving and getting to the welfare of our own lives as members of a religious Society.

Our late dear friend John H. Dillingham had a very lively and life-long concern on this matter of getting and giving in his relationships to the Society of Friends. He made it a matter of personal conduct rather than of public teaching, although more than once he was drawn to put the basis of his feeling before groups of Friends as his message to them. His mental process in the case was somewhat like this: to get the greatest possible good out of group activity—especially out of the activity of worship—one must give himself, "body, soul and spirit," to the joint exercise. The greatest possible energy of will—wrestling in the Old Testament phrase [Jacob wrestled for the blessing], fighting in the Apostle's injunction [fight the good fight of faith] alone could command the blessing. But when the point of blessing had been reached for our dear friend the act was but fairly begun. He might be led by what he received to engage in vocal ministry. We all remember how he was favored to do that. But when a meeting had ended he was asking himself how he could clinch the favor of the occasion in his spiritual growth. So, very often he would be found hastening from the meeting to some act of mercy in calling at a house of distress, or it might be in taking some poor object specimen of the street to a warm meal or to a night's lodging. Should it be disclosed later that the object to which he gave himself was an unworthy one, he knew how his obedience had been to the higher law. In the spirit in which he thus lived, we would challenge ourselves to make the favors we get as members of a religious Society more fruitful in what we actually give as a result of these favors.

Those who have read the minutes of our earliest Monthly and Quarterly Meetings will remember that they mostly conclude with a record of the contributions of money for the day. None of us probably would wish to return to that method of support for meetings or for good causes that meetings may wish to foster. If we have made any point in what we have said of the reciprocal relation of getting and giving we may hesitate, however, in our feeling of assurance that the present plan has all the advantage over the more primitive plan. At times there is reason to fear that it is made too easy for us not to recognize our corporate privilege in frequent and liberal giving. A check drawn once a year may be the method of greatest ease to a treasurer or to a collecting committee. Every one knows that opportunities of useful giving apart from our meetings come to our notice daily. What we might fairly question for ourselves at least is, whether the annual and somewhat perfunctory check keeps in healthful activity the reciprocal relations which only can guarantee the health of the Society. Often is it charged that in some particulars we are lacking in this group loyalty. A very cursory inquiry into the leakage of membership from the Society is not without the suggestion that we have not always successfully maintained this relationship between getting and giving. Our members have drifted away from us under a sense of not being needed. If the Sunday campaign in New York fails because too little is asked of the audiences the religious world will have an old lesson brought home in new form. Even should this departure have no such effect we may be sure that the law is operative through giving in service if not in money. The money always and at best should be nothing more than a token of a surrendered self.

THE MAJOR PREMISE.

The appalling conditions in Europe bring a great opportunity, and with that opportunity a subtle danger, to those of us who are proud to be known, in the half-patronizing, half-approving term of the day, as the Peace People. The opportunity lies in the fact that—barring a few professional soldiers and others lacking even that excuse—the whole world stands aghast at the realization of what war actually means. Never before in history did men loathe war as they are loathing it to-day. The harvest truly is ready.

The danger is that we may lose our unique opportunity through the scattering of our energies, through getting confused and ensnared in the multitude of considerations and possibilities which the war brings to the minds of thinking men and women. Our task is to keep one single issue burning into the general human consciousness: That the world can and must find some other way to settle differences of opinion than by the slaughter of men and the starvation of women and children. This issue is clear-cut enough and big enough, surely, to demand the undivided energies of every one of us. The late Professor Cramb to the contrary, there is nothing in it that transcends human reason. Our road is clearly marked, but it is far from an easy thing to stick to it. The by-paths are many and lead alluringly from the main road—and they lead to things worth while in themselves. We can perhaps resist the temptation to which some newspapers are already succumbing—to treat the war as a gigantic sporting event, a sort of cosmic football game. We may turn away from the enjoyment of the grim humor of a situation where nine nations are all fighting a defensive war. It is harder to put aside the study of the technical factors in warfare, artillery, and aircraft, dreadnought and submarine, contraband and blockade. The economic effects of war are for the best of reasons demanding our attention, even in this neutral country. We have a human interest in searching for the immediate causes of the conflict, and a human wish for the triumph of whichever we may believe to be the better cause. We are tempted to speculate upon the probable result, to forecast the changes upon the map of Europe, and the terms of peace. And there is the final temptation to expound the lessons for our own land, whether, for example, the war has pointed to a big navy for us, or a little navy, or a middle-sized navy.

All these things are of vital human interest, but for the moment they are not for us. It is not for us to suggest compromises or even solutions. Our task is to keep hammering away at the major premise. These things have all to do with minor premises or true or false conclusions. The major premise is that after this there must be no more wars. Delendum est bellum. The world has been aroused, but it will be no slight task to keep it from falling back into lethargy. We must remember that people can get used literally to anything. We are to-day so numbed by the daily stories of death that the frightful destruction of life in the Italian earthquakes leaves us almost untouched. Our senses are drugged with horror.

To reiterate, our opportunity and our task is to keep the emphasis in the right place, upon the sanctity of human life and of the individual human career. When enough men and women are saying that war must go, and are making this the major premise in their reasoning, and not before, war will go, and the question of deciding how it will go may then be left to the experts upon international relations—the lawyers and financiers, the diplomatists and legislators.—K., in Advocate of Peace.

SOULS AND TEMPLES.

Souls are built as temples are—
Inch by inch in gradual rise
Mount the layered masonries.
Warring questions have their day,
Kings arise and pass away,
Laborers vanish one by one,
Still the temple is not done,
Still completion seems afar.

Souls are built as temples are—
Here a carving rich and quaint,
There the image of a saint;
Here a deep-hued pane to tell
Sacred truth or miracle;
Every little helps the much,
Every careful, careless touch,
Adds a charm or leaves a scar.

Souls are built as temples are—
Based on Truth's eternal law,
Sure and steadfast, without flaw.
Through the sunshine, through the snows,
Up and on the building goes;
Every fair thing finds its place,
Every hard thing lends a grace,
Every hand may make or mar.

—SUSAN COOLIDGE.

"BE YE STEADFAST."

Elizabeth Fox Howard is personally known to several of our readers; the following message, taken from Fellowship Papers for First Month, 1917, will be welcomed by all and will recall words of a like import that appeared over G. M. W. in a recent issue of THE FRIEND.—[EDTROS.]

"Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. . . therefore be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

These quiet words, coming almost as an anti-climax to the wonderful triumph of the resurrection chapter, with its sure note of victory and of life through death, are in reality the crown and seal of it all. The victory is absolutely sure, because it is Christ's battle, and He has won it, so that if we are fighting on His side we need not fear the ultimate issues. It is because life is stronger than death, love than hate, Christ than all the forces of evil, that our labor is not in vain.

The wise old psalmist in the days when his people were perilously rebuilding the waste places of Jerusalem said, "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain; except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." Much is tumbling about our ears to-day, which we used to feel wholly secure and permanent, but nothing built in the Lord can ever fail in the long run.

And so the call comes to us as we face the opening of another year, to be above all else steadfast, not tossed about with fear and despair, but quietly going on building for the future even in this dark present, sure even in the turmoil and perplexity about us that our labor is not in vain in the Lord.

This steadfastness was surely one of the hallmarks of the early church, learned from the Master Himself. We know that as the shadows gathered round Him he "set His face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem," and which of us can realize all that was implied for Him in those simple words? It was not all at once that His followers learned their lesson. It needed the cross and the resurrection, and the great inflowing of the Spirit, to bring them out from fear and cowardice into the glorious liberty of children of God. But the lesson was learned at last. We do well to read again and again the Book of the Acts, and many a man is finding inspiration from it in guard-room and prison cell, for we too, seem to be living again in one of those great periods when sorrow and joy go close together, and we know that it means to "continue steadfastly in fellowship and in prayer." We are re-learning something of what it means to have all things in common, and it may be as the days go on we shall need to learn it practically and carry it out efficiently. We know more of fellowship and its deeper meaning than ever before, as perhaps men and women knew it in those early days of our Society which seemed in so many ways like a re-birth of the primitive Church.

Think of the Yearly Minute of 1675, "Friends who suffer are advised not to let out their minds into too much expectation of outward relief . . . but that they patiently and principally depend upon the Lord and His power to plead their cause." And George Fox near the end of his life bears witness: "There was never any persecution that came but we saw it was for good, and we looked upon it to be good as from God, and there was never any prisons or sufferings that I was in but still it was for the bringing of multitudes more out of prison."

Perhaps what we need most of all to-day is to be "rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, continuing instant in prayer." It is just this steadfastness in prayer which alone can let loose the spiritual forces in our lives, and through us to other lives in their dire necessity. Prayer which is fellowship with God, co-operation with Him, an active acquiescence in His will, as far as ever we can see it, this is the kind of prayer which is worth putting all our energies into in this coming year.

It may be that even now God is waiting for us to let Him make a fresh spiritual invasion of the world through our lives, that we may be God's open doors into the lives about us. Of course we are unworthy and weak and impotent in ourselves. We know it only too well. Yet "in the Lord" our labor is not in vain. We are filled with an unquenchable hope for the world, and for our Society, and for all the causes we hold so dear. God has placed great and wonderful opportunities in our hands to-day. We have known in our own lives something of the upholding power of God, and nothing that may come to us or to those we love can shake that power. Let us face the future unflinchingly, for "who shall separate us from the love of God? In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." E. F. H.

THE JAPANESE PROBLEM.

On Second-day evening, First Month 29, 1917, in his address at the Annual Meeting of the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends, Henry St. George Tucker gave a brief outline of how each one of us should feel it a personal duty to make our relations of every kind more friendly with Japan.

He said the development of Japan during the last half century has been almost incomprehensible and that the motive back of this development is power. The force which is driving Japan continuously forward is the desire for power but not the selfish hatred which this word often implies. The kind of power Japan longs for is the kind which would be helpful to all humanity. He believes it to be the sincere desire of the great mass of the people of Japan to use this power in an absolutely peaceful manner and in co-operation with each and every other world-power.

He believes the sentiment of Japan to be too big for selfish motives, but that there are elements in China, Japan and the United States which are continually instigating opposition and misinterpretations. What these forces are and how they operate is unknown, but they are known to exist and examples were cited as evidence.

Another cause of dissension among the Japanese is discriminative legislation which is passed frequently by selfish or unscrupulous legislators. But the lives and teachings of the missionaries have done more to dispel these fears than any of us can comprehend. The farther the work of these missionaries progresses, the more confidence is instilled into the minds of the Japanese, and the more indifferent they become to their old religion. Consequently they must strive to substitute this distaste for their old religion with that which will immediately appeal to their better instincts and yet will not prejudice them against Christianity.

Japan is no longer satisfied with the social life and ideals of her forefathers, but is groping in the darkness for something she knows not what, but her desire is to grow in strength with the other great nations of the West.

Japan is leading the reformation of the Orient. Therefore if we are not to have a great peril in the East, Japan must be won for Christianity, and this can be advanced by having living examples before them of the highest reputation and ideals.

Missionaries are not expecting to come into personal contact with the fifty-five millions of the population, but are endeavoring to teach and educate a few loyal countrymen to do as Christians should, and then to send these Japanese, thus fortified with the strength of a Christian, forth among their fellow-citizens. At the present time there are about 200,000 Christians in Japan and among them are some citizens of the highest rank and esteem.

The problem, therefore, of Christianizing Japan rests, so far as human agents are concerned, largely with the schools. These schools must have as their leaders men who feel a call to the service, men of will power and ability, and they must receive a living wage at least, which necessitates financial aid, but this aid amounts to nothing if our lives do not stand up to our professions.

These people have become skeptical of late as to the earnestness with which we treat these matters, and as a result have appointed a committee to investigate. As a result of this investigation it was decided that Christianity was not necessary in conducting such institutions as ours. This we all felt was a direct blow to our self-respect, but is it not too often the case that we acknowledge and profess the highest ideals and yet fail to live up to them? Therefore we, here at home, are in reality playing a larger part than we think. Let us ponder this verdict, and may each one of us do all he can to make Japan and the Orient his best friend and help her to fully realize the gravity of this decision in spite of the seeming indifference of the Christians. W. RUDOLPH COOPER.

REVIEW OF "ACROSS THE DEAD LINE OF AMUSEMENTS."

GRACE W. BLAIR.

Dr. T. Dewitt Talmage is quoted as follows: "Some young converts say to me, 'Is it right to play cards? Is there any harm in a game of whist or euchre.' Cards in my mind are so associated with the temporal and spiritual damnation of splendid young men, that I should no sooner say to my family, 'Come, let us have a game of cards,' than I would go to the menagerie and say, 'Come, let us have a game of rattlesnakes,' or into a cemetery, sitting down on a marble slab, and say to the grave-digger, 'Come, let us have a game of skulls.' How will you feel, if in the great day of eternity, when we are asked to give an account of our influence, some man shall say to you, 'I was introduced to a game of chance at your house, and I went on from that sport to something more exciting, and went on down until I lost my business, and lost my morals and lost my soul!'"

There are several convincing stories under the heading, "Saved from the Thralldom of Cards." An ex-gambler writes in a letter to Dr. Stough, "Every parent who permits a deck of cards in the home and teaches young children how to play the supposedly innocent game, is really committing a crime against his own offspring, yet he does not realize it. From my observation," he continues, "children who are not permitted to play cards, nor taught the game at home, when they reach the age of twenty-five and are invited to card parties, decline the invitation."

Under "How Card Playing Destroys Spirituality," Dr. Stough says that by playing cards, "All interest in spiritual things and above all, the love for the souls of others, not to speak of Christian influence over them, is gradually undermined, and finally destroyed." "From Card Playing to Murder" comes next, and you can readily imagine the kind of proof given under this. Under "Card Players are the Church's Menace," Dr. Stough gives this story from the lips of Major J. H. Cole: "In one of our morning meetings a tramp arose and said, 'This pew was the first and only one I ever sat in. My father was an elder in this church and my mother a member. Seven Sunday-school scholars occupied this seat. I was one of the number. We had a lady teacher whom we almost worshipped. Saturday afternoon we went to her home and studied our Sunday-school lesson, then had some refreshments and later amusements of various sorts. One day she taught us the game of cards. We all said our parents never let us play cards. She said, 'Nice boys like you will never gamble and it will rest your minds.' Our parents did not agree with her, but said, 'Well, she is such a good woman, I guess the boys will not go wrong.' Gradually we were fascinated with cards and spent less time on the Sunday-school lesson. One Saturday we said to her, 'Teacher, never mind the lesson to-day.'"

"Presently on our Saturday holidays, we began to go down to the cotton gin to play cards. Later still we began to gamble. Soon no Sunday-school lesson for us, no church, but gambling, drinking. At last we became drunkards. I haven't been in this church for years. Two of those Sunday-school boys have been hung, three are in prison for life, and if the authorities knew where I am and another of the class, we, too, would be in prison. My father and mother are dead—and I am glad they are! Would to God I had never had such a Sunday-school teacher!" At that a scream came from a woman on the front seat. She arose and fell on the floor near the tramp, crying out, 'And . . . I am that Sunday-school teacher.' She was carried out while the tramp hurried away and was never seen again. Hearts were broken because seven Sunday-school boys were ruined by a respectable Sunday-school teacher."

Dr. Stough closes with this plea, "Why need more be said? Lives ruined, homes wrecked, parents, church officials, Sunday-school teachers, not only robbed of influence, but cursing the lives of others, how can we indulge or endorse the card game? May God impress the message on every one who reads!"

Now we have reached the third section of the book, "The Dance of Death." "The dancing of the present day," Dr. Stough tells us, "is no more like the dancing referred to in the Bible than the 'Twentieth Century Limited' is like the 'prairie schooner,' except that both are dancing." After describing the dancing referred to in the Bible, which was done entirely as a religious act, and by maidens only, he goes on to "Dancing Past and Present." Then follows, "The Wrong Principle in the Dance." We are told, "Music and motion never make that thing right, which is otherwise wrong," and then comes the query, "Can music and motion destroy a moral principle? What is ethically wrong," continues Dr. Stough, "off the dance floor, is ethically wrong on the dance floor."

Under the several headings, "The Lure of the Dance," "The Dancing Position vs. Morals;" "Passion the Basis of the Dance," there is enough of proof to show to the public that the immorality of the dance cannot be questioned. Prof. Amos R. Wells is quoted as follows, "Dancing, like all Gaul, is divided into three parts one-third is esthetic, one-third is physical exercise, one-third is sensual. . . It never recreates a Christian; it dis-creates a Christian and creates a sensualist."

In the discussion of "Opinions of Dancing Masters," "Deterioration and Debauchery of the Dance," "Dancing the Cause of Immorality," there are given descriptions which are too terrible to relate, but which it would be well for us to read if we would realize even partially the horror and crime to which the dance leads.

The testimony of the clergy shows that some of them, at least those who are interested in the young people, realize the gravity of the situation as it is to-day. Also the opinions of other trustworthy witnesses go to show the results of the dance hall.

In regard to reforming the dance, Dr. Stough declares that "the essentially wrong principle abides, whatever the conditions." He also says that "if dancing is not moral, it seems to me unnecessary to consider it from the higher Christian standpoint and standards of holy living and influence," and further that if his "arguments had been fairly proven then no person who has the simplest notions of right and the ordinary standards of morals can indulge conscientiously and modestly."

In conclusion, I should like to sum up (by using a quotation from his book), the thought which it seems to me Dr. Stough would have us all ponder. "A party of young people were about to explore a coal mine. One of the ladies appeared dressed in white. A friend remonstrated with her. Not liking the interference, she turned to the old miner who was to conduct them, and said, 'Can't I wear a white dress down into the mine?' 'Yes, mud,' was his reply, 'there is nothing to hinder you from wearing a white frock dawn there, but there'll be considerable to keep you from returning one back.' There is nothing to hinder a Christian from conforming to the world's standard of living, but there is a good deal to keep him unspotted if he does."

BETTER THAN BURDEN LIFTING.

What helpless creatures we should all make of ourselves if we could persuade God to do for us as we ask! Our first cry, when a heavy burden strikes us, and our continued cry while the burden remains, is that God will take it away. Fortunately God is not so cruel as to do us the harm that we ask for. When our children beg us to let them omit certain school lessons, or give up school entirely, we love them too much to yield to their entreaty. How much better was this petition in a pastor's public prayer: "If any are here with special burdens, if Thou dost not lift the load give them strength to bear it?" The power to bear burdens makes a richer life than a weakening freedom from burdens.

THE SPAN OF LIFE.

Life is too brief,
Between the building and, the falling leaf,
Between the seed time and the golden sheaf,
For hate and spite,
We have no time for malice and for greed;
Therefore with love make beautiful the deed:
Fast speeds the night.

Life is too swift,
Between the blossoms and the white snow's drift,
Between the silence and the lark's uplift,
For bitter words.
In kindness and in gentleness our speech
Must carry messages of hope, and reach
The sweetest chords.

Life is too great,
Between the infant's and the man's estate,
Between the clashing of earth's strife and fate,
For petty things.
Lo! we shall yet who creep with cumbered feet
Walk glorious over heaven's golden street,
Or soar on wings!

RELIEF WORK IN RUSSIA.

MOORESTOWN, N. J., First Month 17, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND:—

We received lately a journal letter from Florence M. Barrow, who with several other English Friends has gone to Russia to help the refugees. The letter was written the latter part of Eighth Month, but the work is still going on.

I thought some extracts might be of interest to readers of THE FRIEND. This work is being carried on in villages near Buzuluk in the eastern part of Russia.

A. K. C.

LUBIMOKA, Eighth Month 13, 1916.

My friend and I started off on our visiting soon after breakfast. I wish I could make you see the very wide dusty village street with one-storied wooden or mud-covered houses, joined to each other by high doors or gates, with curious pointed roof.

We have the names of the refugees, but no addresses, so we go from house to house asking if refugees live there. Sometimes the refugees live in the front houses with the villagers, but more often in some of the outhouses at the back. The rooms are low and close, often no windows open and flies swarm. Sometimes there are twelve or fourteen men, women and children besides ourselves in these tiny close rooms, and one feels nearly suffocated. I sometimes suggest we should go out and take in the sunshine. The furniture of all the outhouses consists of a bench round two sides of the room and a small table, occasionally a stool and sometimes a chair. The beds are fitted in in the dark recesses on each side of the stove, with a straw mattress or two and rough coats for bed-clothes. The baby's cradle hangs from the ceiling and is usually covered with a cloth, which has the advantage of keeping off flies, even if it keeps off air, too.

I will describe one or two visits which are typical of others. In one of these tiny bare rooms we found a pleasant-looking man of medium height, but looking quite dignified in his coarse grey white homespun linen suit, with long blouse and a girdle round his waist. His wife, who was only a little over forty, but looked seventy, was in a similar homespun, but her apron and blouse were decorated with a beautiful pattern woven in red; on her head was a bright red scarf. She was sitting on the long bench under the windows with her arms around a little girl of ten, dressed on the same lines and looking very white and suffering. We found the child had been ill for a week. We urged that she must be taken to the hospital as soon as possible. Then we heard the story we hear so often. The little farm and comfortable house, then the war and the soldiers and the village to be left. The homespun linen and some of the treasures buried in a hole in the ground (will they ever find them again?) then the hurried start with the cart and horse, and all they can bring with them, and some of the cows. Then the cows forcibly bought, a scrap of paper which promises payment; then the days by the way and the want of food. Finally the horse and cart sold and the family, five of them, told to take the train for Tarparent. Then the crowding and illness—one little girl dies by the way—then the miserable winter, herded in barracks, then another girl dies, then the eldest son must go to the war, then last Fifth Month the journey to this out-of-the-way village, where no work can be had and food is dear and the allowance is not paid. The villagers are kind but ignorant, and they give what help they can, but they are very poor. Now their one ewe lamb is ill, and tears streamed down their faces as they thought of all their trouble and present anxiety. (It is a pleasure in a week's time to know that the little girl is in the hospital and a trifle better.)

In one house, in a fair-sized room, there are twenty-one people living (five families). The tragedy of it all is almost more than we can bear, and we long for a time when we can have some clothes to give and food for the children and can show our sympathy in some practical form.

In every house they need clothes and would often have no food but for the kindness of the villagers with whom they live. Poor things, our hearts ache for them, and one feels how little some of the people in England realize how they have suffered. I certainly did not until I had the chance of knowing the people, and hearing them tell of it all.

Eighth Month 12th.—We had to pack up for our time at Bogdanofka. A patient brought in the morning to the hospital a card from the priest saying our team was ready for us and he and five hundred refugees were awaiting our arrival.

The distances are tremendous here and the driving slow. I feel very sure, however, that we have come to a district where we are needed. The places are so out of the way, and no one but the priests to take much interest in the people. The hospital is doing splendid work. We discussed the possibility of having a dispensary open here once a week, and a nurse to live with a relief worker for the winter.

Medical help is greatly needed we find in all our visits. I think probably in the winter we may need to provide food, at any rate for the children.

THE PRESIDENT'S PEACE MESSAGE.

Telegrams and letters from all over the world have been received at the White House thanking the President for his message to the Senate. One of these, from the American Union Against Militarism, was delivered in person by Lillian D. Wald, of New York. This organization, which has not always agreed with the President's policies, did not hesitate to commend heartily a step that it believes to be in the right direction. The President was deeply touched, he said, by the contents of the memorial which was delivered in person by L. D. Wald. The text of it was as follows:

“TO WOODROW WILSON, President of the United States:—

“I bring you on behalf of the American Union Against Militarism their profoundest gratitude for your noble speech to the Senate of the United States on the twenty-second. In their judgment, this day and this utterance will remain memorable in our history and that of the world, and they will be surprised, indeed, if it does not mark a new epoch in the world's annals.

“Ever since the beginning of this war men and women have been hungering for a new kind of diplomacy which would brush aside chancelleries and all the old forms of intercourse between nations which have so often misrepresented the views of the plain peoples and led them to disaster. You, sir, have answered this longing for direct action, and you have done it not merely in the spirit of the America of Abraham Lincoln—you have done it in the spirit of the brotherhood of man. You have spoken outwardly to our Senate, but in reality to the common people of the entire world. Never, we believe, in the history of this world has any message of a single individual found its way to so many minds and hearts and in every case the reader has been compelled, whether in complete agreement or not, to think and to ponder upon a great and statesman-like proposal to rid the globe of its worst curse—war and militarism.

SERVICE TO ALL HUMANITY.

“It is a service to all humanity which it is impossible to exaggerate, and we believe that its profound wisdom and philosophy will become more and more apparent as it recedes into the past. To our minds it is destined to an immortality as glorious as that of the Gettysburg Address. For we are certain that whatever may be its reception in the marts of trade and commerce and at the hands of journalists who are without vision and without the passion to free humanity from ‘the sum of all villainies,’ it will find its way straight to ‘the silent mass of mankind everywhere’ whom you were fain to reach and now have reached.

“In every American town and hamlet the prayers of men and women have gone up to you and will continue to go up to you because you have voiced their hopes and desires, and the vaulted roofs of every church should echo the grateful supplications of worshippers come to give thanks that there is one in mighty office to deny that men's hearts may be chastened only by the scourge of the sword. If there were no other service which you have rendered than your admonition that if peace is to be permanent there must be peace without victory, that alone would make this speech a document of which not only Americans but Liberals of every faith and clime will be proud as long as men write and speak of these times in which we live."

We have reached a time when we have got to fix our thought not so much on what a man gives away as on what he keeps for himself.

The Old Testament doctrine of the tithes has misled much of our thinking. As illustrative of the principle of the systematic support of the temple, the priesthood and the poor, it was valid and adequate for its time; as a standard suited for all time it is not only inadequate but unchristian. Christ undoubtedly supported the temple, but it would seem irreverent, if not blasphemous, to think of the Christ who gave Himself to the cross and denied Himself even a place to lay His head, spending His thought on tithing His income. We must determine the use of our money under the spell of Christ's absolute self-abandonment to the service and will of God, rather than on the teaching of Old Testament legalism. Instead of asking how much of our possessions we shall give to God, we must ask how much of God's possessions entrusted to us we may use for our own selves. To some persons of large responsibilities and meagre income the proportion set apart for benevolent work may be less than a tenth; to others, receiving the enormous incomes of to-day, to give only a tenth would be mockery. To allocate five thousand dollars of a fifty thousand dollar income to unselfish service, should not close a man's eyes to the fact that forty-five thousand dollars is probably more than any man could spend on himself with the approval of God.

There are many Christian people to-day who would be far nearer meeting God's desire, if they would tithe their incomes to determine what they might properly live on, than to discover what should be used for God. There are still others who will never release their souls from the bondage of possessions until they begin to devote to the service of God not only all their income, but also much of their capital. There is no peril more threatening to the church to-day, and particularly to the American Church, than the blight which great possessions put on a man's spiritual life. Like a great tree, stricken with the pest, he dies at the heart. Before he is aware of it, the paralysis of selfishness has rendered inactive all those primary spiritual graces without the expression of which he cannot grow into the likeness of his Master.—The Assembly Herald.

The great medicine man proceeded with the utmost solemnity and most imposing formality to refill the pipe. The pipe used on this occasion was made of Red Pipe Stone, found in the Northwest. It was lying upon a clean spot of earth. The tobacco and other sacred plants mixed in due proportion, were now put into the bowl of the pipe without lifting it from the ground. Then a small portion of it was taken out with the thumb and finger and put into the ground and covered up with sand, an offering to the mother earth. The stem was then adjusted to the bowl, a glowing coal removed from the fire and put into it, and the medicine man applied it to his lips.

When the smoke came freely, three whiffs were blown towards the Sun, the dwelling-place of the Great Spirit; three whiffs into the closed hand, and opened upon the ground, a second offering to the mother earth. The pipe was then removed from the ground and circulated by passing it to the chief sitting at the extreme end of the right side of the lodge, he taking two or three whiffs, passed it to the chief at his left, each making his offering to the Great Spirit and the mother earth, as it passed to each of them. When it came to me I filled my mouth with smoke with becoming gravity and passed the pipe to my next neighbor. One whiff was all they required of me; I had taken the pipe with them; I was one with them.

In perfect silence this continued until it failed to yield smoke, when it was taken apart and laid upon the ground by the Medicine Man. I was then addressed, "You say bad news! What is it?" With these people all important questions are duly considered before being answered. Therefore I sat in silence for some time—every eye was upon me—the time had come when the message must be made known. At length I answered, "Washington's heart has suddenly become cold and hard; he has closed his hand upon your two chiefs, Satanta and Big Tree." I was asked, "Why has Washington's heart become suddenly so hard?" I explained the "Tragedy of the Lava Beds," as then understood by us, saying, "The Modocs have killed three of his big chiefs (as we thought Colonel Meacham was also killed) and Washington's heart became very hard towards all of his red children." The whole assembly sat in silence for some time; then commenced a discussion as to what they should do.

Washington had without any cause from them violated his agreement, and they were no longer bound by theirs; what if the Modocs had done bad; they had never before heard of that tribe; did not know there were such a people on the earth. Little Robe, Satanta's brother, was violent in speech and gesture, and had to be moderated by his chief, who explained to me, "He papoose." A stormy council followed. I never witnessed so exciting a discussion among Indians. Kicking Bird was openly censured for having advocated the "Peace Policy" in order to secure their release. Some of the chiefs were so far forgetful of their dignity as to rise to their feet while speaking.

When the excitement rose too high, the Medicine Man, who preserved his composure, would commence to fill the pipe; the storm cloud continued to darken. All present had taken the pipe. This was a pledge of friendship and alliance. Fifteen hundred warriors could be sent into the field by these allied tribes. The sentiment prevailed to go on with the Medicine Dance, make war medicine, divide the whole force of warriors they could muster into small raiding squads of fifteen or twenty, send them secretly into the vicinity of the frontier settlements to await a specified time, so as to make a simultaneous attack along the whole frontier line of Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico and Texas. In the meantime the old men, women and children should go to a place near the centre of the "Staked Plains," where they afterwards told me was a place of concealment of which the white people knew nothing.

Kicking Bird had not yet spoken. Satanta's father said to him, "Why you no talk? Are you a woman now, sit there and say nothing."

Kicking Bird, in a calm, subdued voice, though his chin quivered with emotion, repelling the taunt, replied, "I shall speak by and by. I am not now ready. There is one other man who has not spoken, I want to hear Thomassy. He is one of us; he has taken the pipe. He knows Washington has broken his agreement. I want to know what he will say to us now." Silence reigned. The pipe was again filled and lighted with unusual solemnity, and being circulated was again offered to me. Gravely I took it under the searching gaze of all present. I filled my mouth with smoke and passed the pipe to Kicking Bird. My mind was all in the dark. After the pipe was exhausted, I was addressed substantially as follows: "You was present when Washington made the agreement by which our chiefs were to be returned to us. You saw him hold up his hand before the Great Spirit when he promised it. You know the Kiowas have fulfilled their part of the agreement, you yourself have brought us the message that Washington has closed his hand upon them. Now what counsel do you give?"

When was ever man placed in such a situation. I felt that the question upon which I was called to speak was a question of life or death to many, myself included, and yet all was dark to me, not a word presented for me to utter. Deep silence settled upon the council. A silence it seemed to me might be felt. How long it continued, I know not. I felt that wisdom beyond that of man was needed at that moment, and endeavored to draw near to the Source of it. At length, light dawned, an answer was given me.

I said, "It is hard for me to give advice upon this question for two reasons. The first is, as you see, I am a white man. The second is, you Kiowas are my brothers; I am one with you. I know that Washington has broken his agreement with you. I have been with you and know that you have kept yours, and now I can give you no advice but this. Do nothing suddenly or rashly. Be deliberate and cool. I have a request to make of you, after I tell you why I make it. When Washington's message came to the Agent and I had read it I wrote a long letter to him in which I informed him that the Kiowas had fulfilled their part of the agreement, and were anxiously awaiting the fulfillment of his. Now my request is this: sit down here where you are, neither go raiding on the settlements nor go to the Agency, until you hear from Washington after he reads my talk. Washington was very angry when he heard three of his big chiefs were killed. Angry men are seldom wise and many times do wrong. Washington shut his hand very quick, before he take time to think. By and by he will not be so angry. Maybe when he see my talk he think. Maybe his heart grow warm toward the Kiowas again, and he will open his hand."

Kicking Bird was then ready with his talk. He counselled them not to act rashly, and in anger, angry people seldom do right or act wisely. He thought my request was reasonable; there was time enough, nothing would be lost by waiting and much might be gained.

Strange as it may appear, the council settled down to a calm conclusion to wait here until a message should be received from the Agent. My request was acceded to and the council ended quietly. They erected their Medicine House, and held their annual Medicine Dance, as described in his book, commencing page 167.

WHAT TO DO WITH TROUBLE.

"And she went up and laid him on the bed of the man of God, and shut the door upon him, and went out." (2 Kings iv: 21.)

The Shunammite woman referred to in the text affords one of the most striking illustrations in the whole Scriptures of the way we all should commit our troubles and trials to our Heavenly Guide, trusting Him to work them out for us according to His way. She had lost her only son, who had been given to her as the special gift of God. She held him dead in her arms. What could she do? She had a consecrated room where she entertained the great prophet of God, and this room meant to her the very presence of the Almighty. She took up her precious burden "and she went up" there. O, how blessed it is to be able to go up to this Secret Place of the Most High, and there bring all our troubles and anxieties under the shadow of the Almighty! What a blessed privilege! This is the place of refuge where the weary, helpless and heart-broken find relief.

"And she laid him on the bed of the man of God." To me, this is the beautiful picture of the committal, laying our troubles, our business, our joys, our whole life, and ways over to Him. "Commit . . . trust . . . and He work-eth." (Psalms xxxvii: 5.) This poor, bereaved mother was laying her burden upon her Lord, and leaving it there. What are we doing with our burdens, burdening ourselves and others, or giving them all to Him, and leaving them with Him after we have placed them in His hands? "And shut the door . . . and went out." The temptation is to not shut the door; we still see our trouble, we still handle it, we go over it again and again, we think our presence is needed, while His presence is more than sufficient. It takes faith to "shut the door," and go out! It takes real confidence for us to let the matter that is troubling us pass entirely out of our hands into God's hands. In no other way can God fully work out our plans for us. The corn of wheat must be hidden from the eyes of man, if it is ever to bring forth fruit.

"Casting all your cares upon Him, for He careth for you." (1 Peter v: 7.)

"Not a care—no, not a burden
Does He ask His child to bear,
Yet how often in my folly
I insist their weight to share,
'Take no thought,' His best injunction,
'E'en the sparrows He doth feed,
If they neither want nor hunger
Can He not supply my need?
Yes, dear Lord, Thou art sufficient,
All the fulness dwells in Thee,
Fountain-head of every blessing,
Teach it day by day to me,
Why should my heart then be distressed
By some dread of future ill?
Or why should unbelieving fear
My trembling spirit fill?"

Then let us resolutely take time to pray, to get alone with God. Satan will hinder us by crowding other things into our lives, if he can. We need daily to watch unto prayer, not only have regular seasons of prayer, but fill in the life with many extra seasons. Let us give a few moments of waiting upon Him, without making any special request.

L. E. H. S.

BRAND WHITLOCK, United States Minister to Belgium, says: "I believe in a philosophy that has no faith in the efficacy of force in making people good. It teaches that people get better and improve, not by the destructive processes of hatred and wrath, but by the constructive method of love and reason. It teaches that goodness comes from within, not from without, that you can not beat goodness into people, or give them a prescription for it, to be taken in doses, like medicine, but that they must generate it out of their own hearts; and it believes that if we will only make social and economic conditions that will give all men, instead of a few men, a chance to live, they will naturally and inevitably become good. It teaches that you can not make people good by law, nor by policemen's clubs, nor by guns and bayonets, for it sees only hatred in these processes, and it knows that 'hatred ceaseth not by hatred; hatred ceaseth but by love.'"

SO VERY, VERY TRUE.

There are no idle words where children are.
Things spoken in their hearing carry far,
Producing fruit of evil or of good
To our great future human brotherhood.

The word dropped lightly from our earless lips
Into the fertile child mind seeps and drips,
And intertwines with thought and impulse so
It may decide the path some soul shall go!

The eager child mind may not know it hears—
The words may fall upon unwitting ears.
But, nonetheless the record's graven deep;
Subconsciousness a copy clear will keep.

So speak not thoughtlessly when they are by;
Your words fall not on sterile soil or dry.
Thoughts sown in plastic minds are carried far;
There are no idle words where children are.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WATSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

There is a loftier ambition than merely to stand high in the world. It is to stoop down and lift mankind a little higher. There is a nobler character than that which is merely incorruptible. It is the character which acts as an antidote and preventive of corruption. Fearlessly to speak the words which bear witness to righteousness and truth and purity; patiently to do the deeds which strengthen virtue and kindle hope in your fellow-men; generously to lend a hand to those who are trying to climb upward; faithfully to give your support and your personal help to the efforts which are making to elevate and purify the social life of the world—that is what it means to have salt in your character.—HENRY VAN DYKE.

SPECIAL TEMPERANCE MEETING IN JAPAN.—Early in September Month I had a letter from a place about fifteen miles from Mito and from a man whom I had never met. He said that he is a president of a temperance society organized in the village year before last, and that they now have twenty-five members. In their village they have never had any Christian teaching, but they do not think that their temperance society can be a success without religious faith, so would I please give them a Christian temperance lecture. Two men, one from Shimodate and one from Mito, went with me.

They wrote us that they had gotten the use of the public school-house for the meeting, and that we could give lectures in the afternoon and a magic lantern meeting in the evening. There were probably 60 or 100 people present at the afternoon meeting, and amongst them the former head of the village. In the evening there were about 250 or 300 people present. We used a good set of slides which show the evil effects of alcohol upon the different parts of the body, and some showing the awful cost of the drink habit. Besides, one of our number gave a good talk in the evening meeting on temperance from the Christian standpoint.—GURNEY BINFORD.

SEEING GHOSTS.—The hotel men of New York had a convention the other day and from press reports it appears that they paid unusual attention to the Prohibition question. They are laboring under the delusion that the hotel without the bar would be a failure. We affectionately commend them to a consideration of the report of the Denver Hotel Men's Association on this subject. It is practically the unanimous opinion of the Denver men that the hotels have prospered more during Denver's dry period than ever in their history and many of the proprietors, formerly wet, have become open advocates of Prohibition.—American Issue.

SEE THE ADVERTISING MANAGER.—In the Philadelphia Bulletin of Eleventh Month last appeared an editorial on the new Prohibition law of Virginia, which went into effect on that day. The character of the editorial may be accurately measured by the closing sentence, which reads as follows: "The saloon and its bar are put out of existence, but it is only make-believe Prohibition, after all, and the covert traffic which it invites contains the possibility of social dangers worse than those of the bar."

After reading this editorial we confidently expected to find somewhere in the paper some liquor advertising. Only a brief search was necessary. Occupying no small amount of space was a suggestion that the fellow who has one of the new dimes recently put out from the mint should couple it up with a "meek nickel" and spend it for "three fingers of Maroney's Army and Navy Whisky, a beading tippie that Cæsar would have ordered war to get."—American Issue.

WEBB-KENYON LAW.—The United States Supreme Court has, finally, after two elaborate hearings and after months of study and consideration, completely upheld the Webb interstate law.

The decision, as reported in the press dispatches, appears to sustain to the limit every contention of the drys as to the powers of Congress over interstate commerce, either to regulate or to prohibit the interstate traffic in a given article. Had the decision been written by the dry attorneys themselves, it could not have been more satisfactory. Commenting on the decision, Wayne B. Wheeler, General Attorney for the Anti-Saloon League of America, says: "The States may now prohibit the possession, receipt, sale and use of intoxicating liquor and not be hampered by the agencies of interstate commerce."

The vote on the decision by the court was practically unanimous, standing seven to two.

The States are now free to enact whatever laws they choose against the liquor traffic without the fear of complications with interstate commerce powers given Congress by the constitution.

The decision is peculiarly well-timed for the Legislatures of most of the States are now in session or are about to meet, and most of them have legislation of one sort or another in reference to the liquor evil under consideration.—W. E. JOHNSON.

A MIGHTY BOOST.—By sustaining the Webb-Kenyon law the Supreme Court has not only put "teeth" in existing State enactments, but it has opened a door for Congressional action which is destined to be a mighty boost for the Prohibition cause. It has certainly put an end to a whole catalogue of adroit evasions by which prohibitory laws in some of the States were to a great extent nullified. But, far more important even than this, the ruling makes it clear that the commerce clause of the constitution is so wide in its application that should Congress elect to prohibit altogether shipments of liquor in interstate commerce its action would be sustained by the Supreme Court. The effect of this would be to localize the traffic in liquor wholly in the States which still permit it to exist.—Public Ledger.

WISE LIQUOR LEGISLATION.—The Senate has passed, and there is now before the House, a bill whose purpose and provisions may be understood from the following quotation:

No letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented or other intoxicating liquors of any kind, or containing a solicitation of any order or orders for said liquors, or any of them, shall be deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or be delivered by any postmaster or letter-carrier, when addressed or directed to any person, firm, corporation or association or other addressee, at any place or point in any State or Territory of the United States at which it is by the law in force in the State or Territory at that time unlawful to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors, or any of them, respectively.

Such a bill is in entire accord with the spirit of the Webb-Kenyon law, the law which places the Federal Government, through its control over interstate commerce, behind the endeavors of the prohibition States to enforce the liquor laws upon their books.

The proposed law represents another step forward in the direction of putting the Federal Government actively behind the efforts of the States to protect themselves. In the past the attitude of the Federal Government towards the liquor question has done much to nullify the efforts of the States towards self-reform.—The Outlook.

PROHIBITION AS AN ASSET.—It is no easy matter to overcome in a few years the habits and customs and ways of thought of untold centuries, the weaknesses and appetites of human nature, the power of entrenched greed and organized interest, and the predatory forces of the underworld. It is the marvel of the times that this is precisely what the supporters of prohibition have deliberately and determinedly chosen for their task. It is not an easy task, and there may be temporary recessions, and occasionally a halt, but from month to month and year to year, the daily papers record their constant, unceasing progress.

The final result of so great a movement is, of course, conjunctural, but throughout the country there is growing expectation and conviction that it is only a matter of comparatively few years when the entire nation will be dry.—Commercial Traveler.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

This month, when we celebrate the birthday of the man who said, "God must have loved the common people, for He made so many of them," an article by the President of Girard College, "Lessons From the Life of Abraham Lincoln," seems especially appropriate.

He begins by telling the story of John Morley, who was asked by an American visitor, who called just after he had completed his great biography of Gladstone, what had most impressed him in his study of Gladstone's life. Morley answered, "To me the marvel of marvels is that this little island could have produced a man so great as I have found Gladstone to be!"

Still more remarkable, it seems that the American frontier could have produced a Lincoln! The two great men were born the same year, but in very different surroundings.

"As every influence in the life of young Gladstone called forth his powers, so every force surrounding the life of young Lincoln would tend to keep him in obscurity. That Lincoln rose from such conditions, triumphed over the obstacles of his environment, and claimed a supreme place in modern history, is a miracle so great that the world has not had an adequate explanation for it. Of such a man as Lincoln the last word never can be said.

"First as a lesson from Lincoln's life is his triumph over obstacles. In all his career, he was the rough-and-ready frontiersman. He studied surveying a bit and went at it. From his contact with frontier life, he had learned the patience with which to bide his time. When it was urged upon him that he make decisions in advance, indicate his probable policies, he made answer that he had learned long before 'not to cross the Fox River' until he got to it.

"We have much to learn from Lincoln's education. Of schooling he had less than a year all told, and this was secured at great sacrifice and would hardly seem to have been worth the effort. The school term was but for a few weeks in the year with long periods of vacation intervening. During such periods, most boys forgot much that they had learned, but not so with Lincoln; he retained the teaching of the school and added to it. During the vacations he studied to perfect himself, and to build upon the foundation which had been laid in school.

"Lincoln had the best form of education—contact with and interest in a few great books. The English Bible, 'Æsop's Fables,' 'Weems' 'Life of Washington,' and Shakespeare's works came into his hands. He read and re-read these until not only their thought, but their very language, became his own. His speeches and papers indicate that his mind moved as it were in the grooves made by some one or other of these great classics.

"Lincoln early formed the habit of attempting to state in his own language the thought of what he had read. If he did not succeed in doing this at first, he made repeated efforts. This was a form of intellectual honesty. He became master of his own thought, and by this means, was able to lay the foundation of that mastery in logical process which made him so successful a lawyer and so skilful a debater.

"Another phase of Lincoln's education which should give great encouragement was the slowness with which he learned.

He described his mind as like steel which took impressions with difficulty, but having taken them, retained them indelibly. Lincoln learned slowly, but he continued to learn throughout his whole life.

"Few characters illustrate as well as does Lincoln, the differences between education and schooling. His schooling was indifferent, for but a brief time, and had little effect upon his life. His education was a lifelong process, the result of his own effort, which gave him the mastery over both men and events.

"Another supreme lesson in the life of Lincoln was his Americanism. Whatever else he was, he was pre-eminently an American. Indeed, so largely did he exemplify the best traditions of American democracy that he can well be termed our 'typical American.'"

NEWS ITEMS.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.—The amount subscribed to Second Month 13th was about $88,435. The campaign for funds is now closing, and to many Friends a copy of the following has recently been sent:

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Dear Friend:—

About $85,000 of the $125,000 needed have already been subscribed to this fund, in amounts varying from $2 to $10,000 by over 100 Friends. Nearly every one visited by members of the Committee has given an attentive and sympathetic hearing. One Friend was so interested as to subscribe $2000, payable in four years, and another young Friend and his wife felt so deeply the importance of making the plan operative that they were willing to pledge themselves to give $1000 payable within five years. It is just such instances as these that encourage the Committee to feel that it has undertaken a task that most Friends want done and that it can, therefore, be accomplished, and that speedily, if everyone that this letter reaches will consider the matter, first, in the light of its importance to the Educational System of our whole Yearly Meeting (for it applies to every Friends' School in it) and, second, in the spirit of subscribing what he or she can do, not just what may be thought proper, when compared with what others do or have done. If everyone were to do that, the remaining $40,000 would be subscribed in two weeks.

Remember—

First, that while some large gifts are needed, no subscription is too small to be welcomed, and if there are enough of them, they will bring the result as well as would a few large ones. We want subscriptions varying from $1 to $250 or more, each, from 500 Friends.

Second, that payment may be made later, if more convenient.

Third, that this movement represents the active concern of the whole Yearly Meeting and every one should have some share in its success.

The five Trustees chosen for the first year by the Committee on Education are: Charles Evans, Clerk; M. Albert Linton, Treasurer; Thomas K. Brown, Jane S. Jones, Alfred G. Scattergood.

Asi S. Wing and Charles J. Rhoads have consented to act as advisers in investing the fund.

To anyone to whom the brief outline of the proposed plan contained in the accompanying folder does not make the same clear, we shall, when notified, be glad to go into a detailed explanation.

Enclosed also are card and envelope for use in making reply. May we hope to hear from thee in time to close the campaign by the end of three weeks?

SECOND MONTH 8, 1917.

EXTRACTS FROM A PERSONAL LETTER RELATING TO THE RECENTLY ESTABLISHED MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS AT WINNIPEG, MANITOBA.

"We have already held two Monthly Meetings since being recognized as such, subordinate to Yonge Street Four Months' Meeting. We found that, owing to the majority of our members holding subordinate positions in places of business in the city, from six to ten miles distant, it would be impracticable to hold it during the week-day, and to hold it at night time obliged some of the members to remain from home too late at night, so we finally concluded to hold it in the afternoon of the first Friday in each month at 3.30 p. m. We read and answered the six Queries asked for by the Discipline, and the Advice and I believe our Friends are becoming more and more closely united in true Christian fellowship, and we are deeply sensible that it is not the mere number of those present that makes the meeting profitable to the attenders, but it is the promised presence of the Lord that conduces to our being built up in our holy faith.'

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

It is said that smoke nuisance abatement is under way throughout the city, the greatest industrial plants, like the Midvale and the Baldwin, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on devices to check fumes.

On the 3rd President Wilson severed diplomatic relations with Germany, and in an address before a joint session of Congress issued a grave warning to Germany against any overt act under its new policy of ruthless submarine warfare. The intimation in the event of such an act is war. Major-General John J. Pershing rode out of Mexico into Columbus, N. M., at 10.05 a. m. on the 5th at the head of more than 10,000 soldiers of the American punitive expedition.

Congress has overridden a veto by President Wilson at Washington for the first time and enacted into law the immigration bill with its long-fought literacy test provision.

The physical education bill, which has already been introduced in the Legislatures of Massachusetts, California and Indiana, is backed by the newly-formed "Committee For Promoting Physical Education in the United States," which has opened headquarters in Washington, with Harriet P. Thomas as secretary. The committee consists of Dr. John Dewey, of Columbia University; J. Y. Joyner, State Superintendent of Public Instruction of North Carolina; Ella Flagg Young, former Superintendent of Schools in Chicago; David B. Johnson, of South Carolina; Carroll G. Pearce, of the Milwaukee State Normal School; Mary C. C. Bradford, of Denver, State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Colorado; Francis G. Blair, State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Illinois; Josephine Preston, State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Washington, and Dr. Dudley A. Sargent of Harvard, who drafted the bill.

Much interest is being shown in the Greater New York home visitation movement, when it was planned to visit every home of the more than five million people. The purpose of this vast undertaking was to place printed invitations in many languages in each home, inviting the people to attend the church, synagogue, and Sunday-school of their choice, and to secure records of the church connection or preference of every individual, which are given to the pastor, priest, rabbi, or organization preferred.

Of the 22,000 public school teachers in New York City between 500 and 800 of them are not American citizens. President Wilson's comment on the matter will meet with a good many seconders: "Every person appointed as a teacher in the public schools should furnish proof of American citizenship as one of the required qualifications. I had assumed that this was already the rule, and I am surprised that it has not been so."

The mountain folk of Cumberland Gap, where Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee touch sides, planned to lead the country in honoring his memory with a three-day Lincoln Congress, under the auspices of Lincoln Memorial University. The occasion marked the twentieth anniversary of the institution, and hundreds of notable men and women, representing every State in the Union, gathered amid the giant hills that once echoed back the words of Henry Clay, of Calhoun and Andrew Jackson.

The Rocky Mountain Club of New York will postpone the erection of its luxurious club-house in New York City and devote its energies at present toward feeding Belgian children. The Governors are unanimous in this action, and the President, John Hays Hammond, announced the change of plan.

Coal was selling in New York City two months ago at about $13 a ton when the Federal Grand Jury began its investigation, according to Assistant Attorney-General Swaeker, and rumor said that it would go to $20. Now the price is about $8, and the attorney believes that the activity of the Department of Justice has caused the change.

The American Bible Society announces that it must have, almost at once, Bible houses in many countries. It states that it owns but two, one its principal house in New York, and the other one at Christobal, on the Isthmus of Panama. Even for the first named it asks $500,000 with which to modernize it, perhaps to move it further up town. It needs Bible houses in Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires and Santiago in South America, in the city of Mexico, in Japan, Korea, and at least three centres in China.

Berea College has established for its work among southern mountaineers a model rural school, which the United States Bureau of Education regards as a new type peculiarly adapted to sparsely-settled districts.

Strong additional evidence that cancer is not hereditary and practically conclusive evidence that it is not contagious are emphasized in a communication from the American Society for the Control of Cancer, which recognizes that there is therapeutic value in the good news.

NOTICES.

TO THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE.—Dear Friends:—The Overseers of Germantown Monthly Meeting join in sending you a cordial greeting and an assurance of deep interest in your Conference.

We are glad that the higher interests of life and the desire for a fuller measure of usefulness in your several communities has drawn you to confer together at this time.

We are confident that we are all united in the belief that the desire of every true Christian is for a deep and strong spiritual life, and that the highest conception of our being and its most complete fulfillment lies in the realization of this desire.

But it may not be equally clear to all that this attainment requires a somewhat exclusive dedication. That like good athletes we must go into training, chose a disciplined life and prepare ourselves to endure hardships. That just as he who makes an athletic team joins a training table where he cannot eat everything he wants or that others indulge in, so the Christian must practice discipline and self-denial for the development of his spiritual nature. For the soul that is content to dwell on the levels of ease, indifference and selfishness cannot diffuse that joy, courage, sympathy, helpfulness, peace and love which are the manifestation of the spirit of God.

In the light of this high purpose how trivial and even harmful must appear some of the common pleasures and amusements of the world about us. Undue indulgence in these must almost of necessity bind the freedom of the spirit and exclude from the mind those serious subjects of meditation or objects of endeavor by which the inner life is made strong and effective.

We therefore plead with you to "think soberly" on these things and in your earnest desire to seek first the Kingdom of God, to watch for that impulse within which bids you "renounce some ease and embrace some hardship in the service of others and of God which shall replenish the fountains of your holiest life."

The Society of Friends and Philadelphia Yearly Meeting need you not to serve these organizations exclusively, but to help smooth the way for those less favored, to sympathize with the sorrowing, and to handle wisely the social problems of the day.

To these ends you are called and for these privileges you will all gladly lay aside every weight and run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith.

HE LEADS HIS CHILDREN.

Sometimes men learn wisdom by their grievous errors. It is thus in the experiments of science. The very failures are often so much precious information. The time and labor of trial is not lost. It is the glory of God to bring good out of evil. Life is not a human scheme, but a Divine providence. It is God's affair from the day of birth until the day of burial. It is a matter in which the plans and purposes of the Lord mean everything. God calls us to be His, and He does not send us forth in our own strength, but He promises to supply all our needs, everything we need. The only hope we have in this world of eternal salvation is that, though we go astray, God will follow us and watch over us, and lay His hand upon us, and bring us back into our right place. In this one thing let us be confident that the trials of this life will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.—Selected.

THE STILL, SMALL VOICE.

It was a long journey for the Hebrew prophet to take before he came to the revelation of the Divine method of working, namely, by a Voice, both still and small. And it is a long journey still which the majority of earnest souls have perforce to take to reach the same end. The professing Church, speaking generally, has never properly learned it, even after nineteen centuries of straining after the effects produced by other methods, those symbolized by the whirlwind, the earthquake and the fire. And neither have the nations comprising Christendom, whose evil politics are a reflection of their false religion; or else the terrible upheaval of the present world-war would never have taken place.

It is natural to associate power with such elements as the stormy tempest, the earthquake and the devouring fire. The ministry of Elijah had been characterized by these spectacular and sensational manifestations; and it had apparently succeeded on Mount Carmel where the priests of Baal were put to the sword. "But the Lord was not in the wind . . . the Lord was not in the earthquake . . . the Lord was not in the fire."

How much reliance there is in the great camp of religious profession upon carnal force and energy! Nothing is considered of any account that does not make a noise and create a stir. The eloquent preacher is, of course, a necessity. Hurricane-campaigns are the order of the day. And yet as it has been said: "Souls may go away, admiring—excited—agitated; but there has been no intercourse with God."

The people called Quakers were raised up to demonstrate the power of the Still, Small Voice. They went "outside the camp bearing His reproach" following its guidance. They had found within what many were vainly seeking abroad: "Immediate Divine revelation" by the inshining light of the direct visitation of Christ—of God—in the temple of the heart. And recognizing that none were left out, or overlooked, or missed, or passed by, or neglected, by this visitation of Divine love and light; that it was one in high and low, learned and ignorant, male and female; that it knew neither social, national nor racial barriers; they perceived the basis of human brotherhood, and "peace on earth and goodwill towards men" became their watchword. How could they hate whom God loves! How despise whom God visits! Said George Fox in one of the classic utterances recorded in his Journal: "And I saw that there was an ocean of darkness and death, but an infinite ocean of light and love flowed over the ocean of darkness: and in that I saw the infinite love of God."

God speaks to men by a Voice—and that not a voice of harsh command or angry accusation, but by a voice of gentle stillness and insignificant smallness. The Society of Friends has yet a great work to do in the earth to bring men, churches, communities—yea nations—to hearken to that Voice. For the tempest, the earthquake and the fire are abroad in the world to-day and are doing their deadly work. And yet these things are often a preparation for the Voice of God. The Lord was not in the tempest, the earthquake and the fire. But the wind, the earthquake and the fire went "before the Lord" all the same.

May we not believe that the present fearful overturnings and the daily augmentation of broken hearts, bereaved homes and blighted lives are precursors for the ministry of the Still, Small Voice? Not yet is the need of this diviner ministry felt. The nations all profess to desire peace. But they want to attain peace by the ordeal of war, and they have to learn by bitter experience that the Lord is not in their methods.

And as the Voice which bowed the head of the prophet was both small and still, may we not expect Divine wisdom to employ very insignificant instruments to bring the heart-broken nations into His kingdom of peace? God's good things still come out of men's despised Nazareths. Weak things of the world still confound the mighty. "The big trees in California have sprung from seeds, each of which is no larger than a grain of wheat, and the river which at its source is a tiny, tinkling rill over which a child may stride, is at its mouth broad enough and deep enough to bear a navy on its bosom."

But whether this present generation will heed our message or not, it is ours to continue to work towards its certain, eventual triumph, our hearts set not upon temporary popularity, but upon eternal values, fearlessly following the direction of the only Sovereign Authority, the still, small voice of the Living God, heard by reason, conscience and spirit in the inner sanctuary not made with hands, assured that love never faileth, no matter how often it be crossed.

"Loud mockers in the roaring street
Say Christ is crucified again:
Twice pierced His Gospel-bearing feet,
Twice broken His great heart in vain.
I hear, and to myself I smile,
For Christ talks with me all the while.

"No more unto the stubborn heart
With gentle knocking shall He plead,
No more the mystic piety start,
For Christ twice dead is dead indeed.
So in the street I hear men say,
Yet Christ is with me all the way."

MAX I. REICH.

AN INFORMAL CONFERENCE FOR YOUNG FRIENDS OF ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

Three members of Abington Quarterly Meeting attended the Young Friends' Conference at Cedar Lake, Indiana, during the summer of 1916. While there, each one of the three found a fresh meaning in Quakerism that made it seem a far greater thing than it had before. At Cedar Lake we caught a glimpse of the opportunity that lies ahead of us as Friends in America: to share with other Young People everywhere that portion of the Christian Message which has been given us.

When we returned to Philadelphia we were eager to tell what we had learned and the idea of the Conference took definite shape. We asked about ten other members of the Quarterly Meeting who we knew were vitally interested in our meetings, to help us plan a Conference to be held on Second Month 3rd, in Germantown. We wished that the Young People might get together and in an informal discussion consider the problems related to our meetings.

The Conference was opened at 4 P. M. in the school-house. Wm. E. Cadbury spoke briefly of its purpose, and as our time was all too short we divided promptly into smaller groups to discuss either the "Fellowship of Reconciliation" or "Our Attitude Toward Amusements." The first topic seemed especially suited to the crisis which our country was facing. The second topic brought forth a very lively discussion but a rather inconclusive one. The desire was generally expressed that whatever stand we took, each individual should feel a deep conviction that he was striving for the highest development not only of himself but of the whole social order.

The Conference then met as a whole to listen to five short papers read by Irvin Poley, Carroll Brinton, Susan Roberts, C. Reed Cary and Rebecca Carter on "Why I Remain a Friend?" The question is one which each should answer for himself and therefore these papers were most helpful. We should think clearly for ourselves that our convictions may become stronger. We believe that our denomination, more than any other, recognizes the power of the individual and the fruits of his experience. The responsibility which our meetings afford gives a greater opportunity for personal development.

After about an hour and a half the Conference broke up for a social supper in the Tea Meeting Room of the Meeting-house. Here supper was served, cafeteria fashion, and the discussions were continued in a more formal way.

At 7:30 P. M. the Conference settled down for the most important of its subjects, "Our Meetings for Worship: Its Possibilities and Privileges." Margaret M. Cary presided. There was a free and interesting discussion for about an hour and a half. Preparation is necessary for everything we undertake and the problem of the proper preparation for our meetings for worship was much spoken of. Purity of spirit, a believing and trusting attitude, and a desire to know God were three points on which much emphasis was laid. The question of speaking was also discussed and several gave very helpful experiences. Public service is often meant for only one or two and young people should not necessarily expect any great elation to follow a vocal service. Willingness to serve in whatever way we feel called upon is the spirit for which we must strive. Then, in a believing spirit, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth unto the things which are before we may press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of Christ Jesus. The Conference closed with a silence, truly living and impressive.

As those of us who planned the Conference met together from time to time, it was our united feeling that the responsibility for these meetings was far greater than we could carry alone. At each meeting therefore, we set aside a time for silent waiting upon God with the earnest desire that He might guide us. To these periods of devotion we would assign the success of the undertaking. FOR "THE FRIENDS."

GREY DAYS AND GREEN DAYS.

BY ROBERT R. TATLOCK, Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee.

In rural Russia, in place of the peace of the English countryside, we have stagnation. Jolting and crawling along in my Tarantass vehicle I have time to remark such things, for in that position one cannot read or even think consecutively because of the irregularity of the bumps and falls and leaps. Irregularity and stagnation! Oh! friend Russia, casual of intention; late of awakening; generous soul; these are thy name! In England, quiet prevails in the country places, quiet and, after all, content and comfort; in Scotland, ruggedness and movement; in France, the stateliness of open prospects; in Russia, irregularity, stagnation, monotony, sleep.

When I leave "town" (as I most frequently do) in my humble vehicle, the two little windows of the last house of Buzuluk drowsily wink at me a sleepy invitation to stay. The town is left, and what would be the countryside in any other place surrounds me. I am going to Lubimooka. What I see before me is a faint track stretching irregularly to the horizon, over what at first seems nearly flat land, but which is soon found to have many undulations and bumps and holes. On this ground are no houses, no hedges, no trees, no people. I am alone with two galloping horses, a ruffianly-looking driver, and a Tarantass which jolts and shakes me as a riddle shakes a pebble, as a terrier shakes a rat.

Presently comes a bump of even more violence than usual; for a moment we are in the air, then come "crump" on the ground like a stone. But the driver has awakened. He sits up and yells at the horses (apparently to their mutual delight): "Noo-Noo-oo; fly away, my pigeons." Then changing key upwards violently, "Noo, vot!" and they run like the cloud before the wind, and I wonder what the Russian word is for "steady!" So we drive for a verst or two. The horses would continue, but the man grows tired of his song. The new-born enthusiasm dies, Russian like, within him; his eye wanders again over the fields, the horses shake their heads. Five minutes more and they have forgotten him, and he them.

Before I reach my resting place the rain begins to fall; and what with the wet and the cold and a melancholy chant the man has begun, I am glad to get inside of the very dirty house where I habitually consume my luncheon. Here sit no less than eight cronies, in different attitudes of sublime content, and one of them, a scholar, reads aloud from a book of fairy stories, spelling out the words as he goes, and following with a large and grimy finger the boldly typed lines. In the centre of the table is the samovar or tea urn, shining; in each mouth is a papiros, or cigarette with long white stalk. The room is heated. They are in perfect content. The tale goes on, the whiffs of contentment puff approval every line, until the samovar turns into a silver king and the papiros change to eight white-robed princesses. I enter and the spell is broken. Two of them laugh when they see me and call for the book to be closed. That with a sigh is done, though more than one look through the window with an air they have, whimsical and dreamy, as if to say: "No, no, do not laugh, the earth is wrong, that was a better world we were in just now."

When I start again the air seems to have grown still colder. We shake out of the yard and shake down the village track. It is the Sabbath, I suddenly remember. A church bell swings gently and irregularly, as if in the wind. On either side of the road are wooden houses, built of heavy logs, and ornamented with a sort of wooden fretwork facing—for this is a rich village. Some of the houses are very far apart. Those which are near one another have between them a very tall gateway of wood, with a wedge-shaped wooden watershed running along the top, most distinctly Turkish in conception. Sitting with their backs against the house walls and the gates are rows of people dressed, men and women, in colored clothes as one might see in a very gaudy theatre setting. They eat sunflower seeds, the husks of which lie around them by the hundred. They crack them in their white teeth and cast away the shells while talking, unconsciously, like birds, and with a dexterity so great as to tempt one to think it must be one of those hereditary gifts which have been the plague and the delight of anthropologists.

I am soon gone and the silent steppe stretches before me again in breathless grandeur. Low hills, which seem to have grown almost flat with age, stare vacantly at one another and counsel patience to the clouds. A vulture stands bare-necked upon the plain. Hawks wheel round, discovering life where none is seen by man, and high above my head, a brown mark against the blue, an eagle frowns upon us all. The rain has stopped, the dust begins to blow, then suddenly the sun breaks out and bathes the world in living gold and green, but the vulture shakes his head, moving for the first time, as if he disapproves of the sun. I have started on the second of my trio of three hour stages.

So the day passes, morning, noon and evening; fallow fields and stagnant pools, no rugged outline anywhere, nor heather struggling with the wind as in my northern land, no sense of pure peace as in England; for how can you observe and feel the influence of a peaceful thing when all is utterly still besides itself? These heavy, heaving undulations remind many travelers of the Atlantic, but how, I do not know, for here a whole century may pass and never a twig stir. Nature has clothed the land only in pale and languid green, and man adorns it with nothing gayer than unpainted wood.

I started in the early morning, and now beyond a wide expanse of evening shade, the last full beam of rich and tender-colored light strikes on the walls and dome of Lubimooka church. As I see it standing like a silver crown among the poor mud huts and thatches and the square roof of the hospital, already with a light or two in the windows, I gladly remember the good work that is being done there, and the cheery English voices who will soon be clamoring for their letters.

Next morning, after an early breakfast, I start once more, and going over exactly the same track in the same vehicle, I arrive in the glow of the evening again at Buzuluk—the second of our three little homes in the east. Here I find Theodore Rigg up to the neck in rice. He performs wonderful feats with sacks of refugee foodstuffs in a little dingy room, and converses in a mixture of English, French, Russian and Serbian all in one to a Tartar carter speaking through the window from outside. We spend the rest of the evening at a Zemstvo meeting, which begins at 7:30 p. m. and winds up at 1 a. m. Committees are always dull; but personally, whatever the reason, I find those conducted in the Russian tongue more trying than the usual variety. The Zemstvo meeting raises points connected with our work, and Rigg and I discuss them over bread and tea after we come home, finally retiring to rest at the cheery hour of 3 a. m.

I am off again at 7:30 a. m. to commence the second stage, the third day of the complete round. To-day has two sections in the journey, thirty verses each. The weather has broken down. Now, added to the jolt and jar, a quivering stream of mud and black water leaps from each wheel and stretches towards me and my goods like a living thing. At times we splash through water which makes a sound like the sea around a boat, and leave a wake behind us as we go; or else we are gripped by solid inches of stiff black paste as a fly in treacle, the horses pulling and panting with an anxious, longing eye upon the firmer ground before.

The land that was green last night is grey to-day; grey, stagnant and irregular, asleep in the rain. I almost lose the familiar landmarks by reason of the veil of grey water all around.

After a pause to change horses, on we go again, this time through the deeps of a forest of pines. The rain has almost gone. As I come in sight of the trees I am aware of a change. The summer is gone. Last time I passed, whole companies of brown and reddened leaves were mustering in the woods. Now birches, stripped of every leaf, trace slender lines of white against the pines; and other little trees whose names I do not know, whose presence formerly I scarcely had noticed, now are massed, a wilderness of brown, on either side of the way, the single late ones standing green among them, shedding water and leaves silently. The jar of the wheels passing over the sodden leaves is smothered, the air is thick with them, falling like tragic confetti into my humble conveyance itself.

I was beginning to regret the necessity of the return journey, making the last of the series to-morrow; but now I see in the midst of a glade a peasant's hut, and under the shed of the house a man and his son working about the wheels of a cart, a woman who has a pot she was cleaning in her hand having come out to watch them. I realize with a qualm that they are removing the wheels and putting on runners for the snow—runners for the snow—for the snow—snow! I ask the driver, pretending to be cheery, if the snow lies deeply in the forest during winter.

"Deeply," he replies.

I gather my wet overcoat round my legs, and forgetting that there are grey days and green at all, I give my mind entirely up to wondering how we all shall fare throughout the long white days and nights that are to come.

THE RISE AND FALL OF NATIONS.

DR. INAZO NITUBE.

NOTE.—The following is a summary of an article from a Japanese volume of Dr. Nitobe's published addresses, "Various Impressions of Human Life."

As seen in history, the rise and fall, the prosperity and decay of nations, is uncertain. There are two standards by which to judge a nation—the material and the spiritual.

We may compare Judea and Rome. Judea was a small, weak nation, but the thought and spirit of the Hebrews is a power in the world even now. On the other hand, Rome was once the supreme nation in the world, but it crumbled and is no more. Again, compare Greece and Persia. When the Persian Empire was at its height, Greece was an insignificant country. Persia is now almost forgotten, while Greek civilization plays an important part in the advancement of the world. Military rule over vast territories is for a day, thought-leadership of the world is for ages.

Although failing in the race for world-leadership, the small nation may do much to lead civilization on to real, spiritual prosperity. So, also, with the individual; he must not confine his efforts to things which pass away, but must look to the future and shape his thoughts and actions according to that which is eternal.

Japan ought to lay to heart the lessons of history and seek to lay hold on those things which abide.

PEACE.

Like sentinels the rocks unflinching stand,
To meet the onslaught of incoming tide,
The turbid waves, from wanderings far and wide,
Roar news of battles, fought in distant land,
And toss themselves exhausted on the sand,
Quelled by the calm and peace, which here abide,
In their recoil all signs of discord hide
Abashed—conquered by silent reprimand.

Sail safely Ship-of-State o'er troubled waves,
Your tiller held by firm and trusty hand,
To guide the helmsman though wild tempest raves
Send beams of Faith—lighthouses of our land!
Keep us from war, dear God, by thy great might,
And lead us through the darkness to the light.

WHY I BECAME A FRIEND.*

As I have been a member of the Society of Friends only for about a year and a half (although I was a Friend in essentials long before I was aware of it myself) my title must be "Why I Became a Friend" and not "Why I Remain a Friend." Necessity for explanation of the latter would argue not open-mindedness but instability of conviction. Therefore I shall try to tell you why I became a Friend.

Our motives are invariably mixtures and it is difficult to dissect them and pick out the real elements that make them up. One of my chief reasons was doubtless my environment since babyhood. While my family are not Quakers, many of my relatives and ancestors belong or belonged to the Society. All but one preliminary year of schooling was done at Germantown Friends' School, and I had then four years of Haverford College. After one year of teaching at a boarding-school, I returned to my old school as a teacher over four years ago. Many of the people I came to admire and love most were Friends and more and more I felt like one of them.

One day, about four years ago, I was taking a walk with Dr. Richard Gummere, of Haverford College, and it happened to come out in our conversation that I was not a Friend. His surprise was so great that it set me thinking and talking on the subject with others. I began to think that I agreed sufficiently with the Quaker viewpoint to make joining worth serious consideration.

One book that I read at the time was Caroline Stephen's "Quaker Strongholds," and much of it impressed me deeply. In regard to the special testimonies of Friends (queries on which have been for many years in England unanswered on paper; they are read aloud and are replied to usually only in the heart of each hearer) she says, "I am thankful that a much greater degree of freedom is now allowed to our members in all matters as to which there is room for a conscientious difference of opinion. Our strength seems to depend largely upon our consistency in appealing to the Gospel rather than to the law—in trusting to the purifying power of an indwelling, informing Spirit, rather than to any external framework of regulations." In another place she says, "I think I cannot be wrong in saying that a greater value has from the first been attached by Friends to practice, as compared with doctrine, than is the case with most other Christian bodies."

Another book that helped to make clear the way (and I was fully two years in trying to work the matter through) was Edward Grubb's "Authority and the Light Within." He interprets very ably Quaker doctrine in modern, scientific language and, while not blind to the failures and blunderings the Society has made, brings out the more effectively by this admission the potential strength of Quakerism—the thing it may be if we have but the courage and the vision. He says toward the end of his book: "The essential truth of Quakerism we found to lie in its recognition that there is something of the Infinite, something of God, in every person; that religion consists in His expanding life in the surrendered soul, and is therefore infinite in its possibilities; that Christianity can never be expressed by any system of dogmatic formulae. Yet we were compelled to recognize that the early Quakers never rose above the imperfect philosophy of their day, in which the natural and the spiritual worlds were separated by an impassable barrier, and which compelled them to choose between the alternatives of making the Light wholly human and natural, or else wholly Divine and supernatural. They chose the latter, and found themselves shut up to a position which virtually made the individual infallible, leaving no real place for authority; and which also gravely injured their work by depreciating as unspiritual the use of the human reason, and minimizing the need for religious teaching. That in spite of these defects they should have achieved what they did, is the best testimony to the essential truth which they discovered."

In the summer of 1914, I was studying French in the town of Tours, and we (a Russian lady, a Serbian postmaster, a French school-teacher and his wife and daughter, and I) were all discussing the play of Chatterton. The heroine, Kitty Bell (or Keetee Bell, as they all called her) was married, as I remember, to a Quaker. The five of them, all Roman Catholics, asked if I knew what a Quaker was, and my efforts to explain in French were arduous. "But what do they pray to? Is there no cross, no crucifix?" On my replying in the negative, their manner implied that Quakerism might be all right in its way, but you couldn't call that sort of thing religion. And I felt with Rufus Jones when he says: "The days of the priest are over. The demand is now for prophets. Men do not want sacred persons to 'do' their religion for them; they want illuminated leaders, who can enlarge their vision, who can interpret, in the language of to-day, the eternal realities of the Spirit."

The war broke out, as everyone knows, that summer, and it had its effect on this decision of mine just as it had on many things of more importance to the world. The thought came to me that the Quakers had made a fight for peace generation after generation at times when it took even more courage than now to insist on the inconsistency of War and Christianity, on the impossibility of being both a killer of men and a follower of Christ. And I knew that it was on that side that I wanted to throw my influence.

I felt, too, the great need of less complexity in life and the simplicity of Friends made a strong appeal. We need so much the stripping-away of the non-essential, the unimportant, and Quakerism has stood for that always. Some say that our absence of form is in itself a form; and what few forms we do have are as firmly solidified as those of any church ritual. Take, for example, rising at prayer. Almost all Friends get up but, at the same time, anyone who finds it more natural to bow his head feels, I think, at full liberty to do so. "There is no royal road to ridding ourselves of superfluities. It is a lifelong process of severe purification, which at every turn demands the sacrifice of the lower to the higher." Each one of us has to decide for himself what are for him superfluities, but the Friends have made great effort on these lines.

Rufus Jones, in his "Quakerism: A Religion of Life," says: "Our Quakerism must, then, be nothing short of a religion of life, a real experiment in the application, the reproduction of Christ's religion. Neither form nor the absence of form; neither creed nor the absence of creed will avail, but a kind of life which is Divinely begotten, inspired and fed from within. It is not 'views' that are wanted, but the evidence that in the hush of our meetings we find a living God, that in our human tasks Divine streams of Grace are raining into our lives, and currents of spiritual energy are coursing through our deeds and purposes. And withal we must go to our day's work with sunlight on our faces."

The final reason why I wished to become a Friend was because not only did I find congenial friends among them, but I found inspiring ones who were working in, on the whole, an awake and progressive meeting. I found that a remarkably successful effort had been made to preserve the simplicity and the sincerity of the old without the narrowness that sometimes went with it. Stirring our social consciences to a healthily tender condition was found by many to be a harder and worthier aim in the luxury surrounding us all than absorption in keeping ourselves spotless, while alive to the value and necessity of personal perfecting, emphasis had been shifted from that to the perfecting of the world around us. And it seems to me no less than their due to say to those that have come nearest to living up to the highest standard of Quakerism:

“You did not hoard
Your spirit's treasure for a world unseen,
Nor chaffer with your God for a reward
Ere you would serve.
You went your way generous and serene
And gave unquestioning all you had to spend,
As friend to friend.”

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

Almost immediately after the Medicine Dance, the whole body of Indians removed a number of miles farther westward, where there were herds of buffalo, on which to subsist, and to furnish robes for their lodges, in which employment they were busily engaged.

On the twenty-third, seven days from my entering camp, word came from the Agent informing that the Government was engaged in the needful negotiations for the release of Satanta and Big Tree, and that the Governor of Texas would in all probability soon comply with the President's requisitions for their release. Than which no better news could reach them except it be that they were already at the Agency.

By the assistance of Kicking Bird, I explained the contents of the Agent's letter to the Indians, and their answer to be returned to the Agent by the bearer of the message to them.

It now appeared that had nothing been received to indicate any intention on the part of the Government to comply with its agreement to release their imprisoned chiefs, they would have separated at that place. Those friendly to the Government and its “Peace Policy,” under the leadership of Kicking Bird, and some others would have gone to the Agency and the hostile Indians would have gone off to the “Staked Plains” and instigated a raid upon the frontier settlements, as heretofore related was their intention. But the timely message from the Agent quieted them, and united all together more firmly than they had been heretofore.

Some two weeks later a verbal message was received in camp, stating that these chiefs were at the Agency and the Agent wanted the Indians to come in for them. This false message probably given to stir up more hostile feeling, when they found it to be untrue, had that effect. A council was immediately called and a grand parade planned for the whole tribe. The warriors were in advance, each band under its respective war chief, ornamented in full regalia, with their shields, arms and war-bonnets, other chiefs followed, then the men of the tribe; the old men, women and children coming last of all. It was so ordered to show their military strength.

The nervous strain of these three weeks with all the accompaniments had been too great. Here I was taken sick and carried in with them, and went directly to the Agent's house, arriving on the thirteenth of Seventh Month, one month from the time of leaving the Agency to go to the encampment.

It had been planned that I should ride with Kicking Bird at the head of the procession, but my illness prevented this, and it also prevented my being kept by them as a hostage when they found their chiefs were not there, and no such message had been sent them.

I felt deeply for them in their disappointment, almost beyond endurance when they found their chiefs were not there and the message was false. The Agent was favored with skillful management, to quiet them for the present, at least, restraining them from acts of violence, though a scheme was attempted, which also failed. This will be related later.

Having returned to the Agency so broken in health as to have little hope of a permanent restoration (which proved too true), in looking back upon the experiences of these few weeks, I feel entirely satisfied with having been resigned to go among them, fully believing that had no influence been brought to bear upon them when the intelligence was first received that the Government had changed its intention of releasing Satanta and Big Tree, most of the warriors would have joined together and perhaps others with them in committing depredations that would have occasioned an Indian war, wherein many lives would have been sacrificed and much expense to the Government would have been incurred.

The scheme they attempted was this: They removed about twelve miles from the Agency and held a council as to what to do. An Apache woman, hearing a remark made by one of the chiefs, informed her husband, near whose camp the council was being held. He immediately sent her and another woman to secrete themselves near the council lodge. As it was night it was easily accomplished, and they distinctly heard their decisions, viz: That five of their most daring and brave men—men to be relied on for cunning and strategy, should be selected to return to the Agency, seize the Agent and myself and rush with us to the plains, beyond the reach of the soldiers, whither they would be joined by the tribe, and where we would be held as hostages until Satanta and Big Tree should be released; of these men White Horse was one, than whom the tribe possessed no more vile or treacherous character. This information the women reported to Apache John, who immediately mounted his pony, came in and notified the Agent of the intention of the Kiowas.

Two nights after this, the five men arrived at the Agency just after dark. The Agent had prudently kept the plot a secret, except from his wife and son and one other young man.

White Horse, on entering the house, and not knowing the information the Agent had received, to avoid suspicion, took off his revolver and gave it to the Agent's wife, and sitting down in an arm chair, one arm so lifted his blanket as to disclose another revolver, of which the Agent spoke to him, much to his confusion and embarrassment. They were treated with the utmost kindness, supper provided and conversation carried on in which the Agent betrayed no indications of knowing the design of their visit; by this they were confused and disconcerted.

Soon after supper the Agent informed them of his practice of reading from the Good Book the Great Spirit had given us. He talked to them before retiring to rest, inviting them to remain during the “medicine making,” which they did. After seeking help and protection from Him, who alone is able to control all events and thwart the most subtle schemes of designing men, he furnished them with blankets for the night and they went into camp near by. Not having accomplished their design, they waited until the next night. Not then being able to execute their plans, they returned to camp the following morning. They reported to the tribe that our “‘medicine’ was too strong and they could not touch us.”

Thus, through the protecting power of Him who never slumbers nor sleeps, way was made for my return and our deliverance from this deep laid plot for our capture and detention.

There was no outward manifestation by which this work was wrought, yet, a secret power, as they acknowledged, was “so strong they could not touch us.” Truly I may say in all humility, I have been among this people with much sorrow and many tears, under discouragements and heavy burdens, in heat and in cold, in hunger, in thirst and in weariness, in sickness and in weakness of the flesh and of the spirit, alone as to the outward, a stranger among a strange people, having home, wife and children as though I had them not, yet hath the Lord supported me in all and through all. May to Him alone, who knoweth the most hidden things, be all the honor and the praise, and His Name be magnified.

Only this much remains to say, Satanta and Big Tree were finally returned, to the joy of their families and friends.

THE UNESCAPABLE LAW.

I find myself quoted as predicting that the law of love will "ultimately govern" human relations. I should like to find room for a disclaimer. It would be just as absurd to predict that causes will "ultimately" produce effects, or that water will "ultimately" run downhill.

What I have been trying to make people believe is simply that the law of love is the law of life, the law of God; just as much the law of God as the law of gravitation; governing souls and communities just as truly as gravitation governs bodies; the organic law of human society, acting no less uniformly and inexorably than any other natural law.

The "near morality" by which the teaching of the Christian church has been largely disfigured and debilitated has assumed that the penalty of the moral law can be averted or evaded; that punishment is deferred; that God's laws which deal with human conduct are not now in force. They will ultimately govern human relationships, but they do not govern now. Consequently it is futile to try to obey them. By and by, in the millennium, it will be possible to live by the law of love, but it is not now possible and any attempt to conform to it would be foolish and fanatical. If the law of love were only effective, it would, of course, be a good thing to obey it, but since it is not effective it is foolish to talk about it; and we must find some rule of life that is practical and stop this nonsense of the visionaries and the idealists.

It is just at this point that straight thinking is needed. There is no deadlier error than the notion that there are laws of God which are for the present in abeyance—which do not now govern men, but which will ultimately govern them. Especially pernicious are all such conceptions when applied to the moral laws. In these, if in anything, we have a right to look for uniformity.

In truth this law of love is enforced upon every individual human being and every social group, larger or smaller, with absolute inflexibility. There has never been in any world a minute in which it was not in full operation; it has never been possible for any man or angel or any association of men or angels to escape it.

The mental muddle into which moral teachers have led the multitude is in the notion that the law is not in force unless it is obeyed. But it is in force if its sanctions are effective, whether of reward or of penalty. If it is true of any law that no man can possibly obey it without getting the benefits which it offers, and that no man can possibly disobey it without incurring the injuries which it threatens, then that law is certainly in force. And this is palpably true of the organic law of human relationships. Obedience to it brings to the individual moral soundness and happiness, and to society peace and welfare. Disobedience to it brings to the individual moral deterioration and misery and to society strife and disintegration. It has never been uniformly obeyed or universally disobeyed, so that we have no complete demonstration of the consequences of obedience or disobedience; but there are evidences enough in human experience of the nature of its rewards and its penalties, and abundant proofs that these rewards and penalties are annexed to all human conduct as closely as any effect is linked to its cause.

The fatal failure of the Christian church has been its blurring of this central principle of morality. Not one in a hundred of its members has any comprehension of the immediateness and inevitableness of the operation of this central law of life. Nearly all of them suppose that if they do wrong they are liable to suffer for it some time in the future; scarcely any of them have been convinced that the consequences of evil doing are as quick and sure as the explosion of a short-circuited current. How many men know that if they lie they will get the reaction of that lie immediately in their characters; that every act or thought of selfishness, of cruelty, of impurity registers itself at once in their lives—blunts their sensibilities, dulls their perceptions, weakens their wills; that the accumulation of these deadly reactions must produce a steady deterioration of the character? How many men understand that if all their neighbors governed themselves by the same principles of distrust and suspicion which they habitually practice there could be no useful social co-operation, because the natural and inevitable resentments and antipathies would rend society into fragments? How many people comprehend that the strifes and disorders and miseries which keep the world in turmoil are simply the natural consequences of disobedience of the law of good will. The tremendous industrial conflicts which are now desolating so many homes in New York and threatening the peace of the city—what are they but the penalty which the law of love inflicts on the community which permits its violation? But how many of the citizens of New York ever think of these strikes as penal consequences of the violation of the law of love? How many of them recognize the fact that these disturbances of the peace are evidences that this law is in full force, visiting its retributions on all the communities that despise its authority?

Most appalling, most terrible of all the evidences that the law of love is in full operation is the terrific war now scourging humanity. This war is the answer of the Eternal Justice to the long defiance of the laws of life. The natural law of human relationships, which is the law of good will, of mutual service, binds all men and all groups of men, nations with the rest. It requires them to live in peace and unity, to share the good of the world, to seek one another's welfare. It promises well-being and abundance to those who obey, and it threatens misery and destruction to those who disobey.

With one accord the nations of the earth have set this law at defiance. They have refused to base international relationships on good will; they have insisted on founding them on suspicion and fear and enmity. They would not obey the law, but they cannot escape its penalty. Hell is the penalty of the disobedience of God's law and war is hell. Can any one conceive a pit more nearly bottomless than the nations of Europe have dugged for themselves, or hotter flames than those into which they are now plunging?

And the people of the United States, after watching this retribution for two years, are now making haste to set it at defiance!

It's a mad world, my masters!—WASHINGTON GLADDEN, in The Independent.

THE MOTHER-LOVE.

O far, fair country, where my dearest dwell,
I beg you send some little message down!—
A smile, a whispered word, a ray, to tell
Where shines the splendor of a saintly crown.

Ah, but I ask what mortal may not crave!
And yet my heart implors some tender sign.
Dear Lord, assured of this, I will be brave—
The mother-love I long for still is mine.

Hush, even as I plead, my soul is caught
Into a larger presence. By no word
Of mortal speech, nor token, am I taught;
And yet I know my longing prayer is heard.

Around me folds a love so great and dear,
Its comfort soothes me, like a sweet caress—
The mother-love that saves me from my fear,
Cradling my soul in arms of tenderness.

THE SERVICE OF SILENCE.

[We are reprinting the following editorial from the Southern Churchman at the suggestion of our friend David F. White. The valuable little book with the title "The Service of Silence" has been previously noticed in THE FRIEND. Evidently the matter contained in this editorial is quite in line with much fruit that has resulted from this publication.—Eds.]

Doubtless the title does not convey a great deal of meaning. But here is the story which will explain it, and which we commend to the thoughtful attention of the reader:

"An Anglo-Catholic priest went to New Zealand to hold a mission in a low church parish. Before going he had learned to his dismay that the Quakers of the community had been invited to hold their meetings in the parish church. The rector and some parishioners and some theosophists had joined with them. They found it a blessed way of increasing the devout life and fellowship with one another. The high church missionary was deeply moved and converted to this way of vitalizing religion in its outward, sacramental form—the power of silence in religion. For his part, he left them with a deeper sense of the value of the Holy Communion; low churchmen, Quakers and theosophists, joining in the desire to have a weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper. Surely there was a fresh alliance of silence and sacrament. It was taken up by the high churchmen of England and is fast spreading in that Church.

"They feel the danger of externality and formalism and conventionality in religion. They feel the need of some new spiritual impulse. While sacramentalists—holding to the daily celebration of the Holy Communion and the value of ceremonialism—they feel that the Anglo-Catholic movement has spent its force and is in danger of conventionalized externality in religion. They feel the need of a revivification of the inner life—an evangelical revival—a sense of the immediacy of God in the soul. This they have found in a corporate fellowship of silence, practically, of a weekly Quaker meeting—waiting together in silence; listening for the still voice; becoming therein more really conscious of God and thus increasing the inner life and making the celebration of the Holy Communion more holy and life-giving. The emphasis is put on the silent communion with God."

J. Macbride Sterrett, rector of All Souls' Memorial Church, Washington, has been both favorably and forcibly impressed with the potential value of such a service as is thus indicated. In a recent sermon, from which we are permitted to take the above extracts, he announced the appointment of an hour for a Silent Prayer Meeting in the church on Seventh-day evening, and challenged the interest and co-operation of his congregation by speaking to them wisely and affectionately of "The Power of Silence in Religion" and the need of its regular, definite exercise. It is a subject of vital importance to every soul seeking more and more to know God, and we cannot do better for our readers than pass on to them some of the preacher's spiritual counsel as well as his reasons for the congregational Service of Silence which he proposed to them.

"The Service of Silence is one way of becoming conscious, first, of our deeper, larger, more real self, and, second, of the omnipresence of God.

"Beneath the largely submerged iceberg, enswathing and sustaining it, lies the fathomless ocean. Beneath, around our larger self, enswathing, sustaining, energizing, is the omnipresent universal—call it God or what you will. Stay in the silence and resolutely lay aside all thought of self—resolutely relate yourself to the omnipresent universal that environs you, and a sense of His presence will come. It will around the sense of the sublime. It will help you to worship God and to enjoy communion with Him. It will humble and exalt you so that you can smile

' . . . to think God's greatness
Flows around our incompleteness,
Round our restlessness, His rest.'

"That is the religion of silence—the conscious immediate personal contact, commerce, communion of the soul with God. In truth, consciousness of the real self is not complete till one has attained the immediate consciousness of the environment God. "Wither shall I go from Thy presence?" (Psalm 139.) We are only complete in Him. We are in God. Underneath are the everlasting arms. In silence we may recognize the immanence of God—become immediately conscious of the Great Companion—the silent, often unrecognized and sometimes practically disowned Partner of our toiling-upward-life.

"God soon fades out of the life of every man who does not have such first hand knowledge of Him as comes behind the closed door—in the silence. We may learn many things about God from tradition and on the authority of others or of the Church. But this second-hand knowledge alone is not vitalizing.

"In silence we may have the testimony of the spirit—the spirit itself immediately (and not merely through tradition or external cult)—bearing witness with our spirit that we are the children of God. In silence our soul may seek the soul of the universal until it grips and is gripped by the Holy Spirit of God. Go into the silence, shut the world of ordinary life out, and listen. Make the adventure, the experiment of the closet. Submit yourself to the discipline of aloneness with the great Alone. Celebrate the sacrament of silence, and you will find a thrill of the Divine more intense than any thrill of intense strenuous external activity. The inner light will stream through the east window of divine surprise and the inner life will be energized in conscious contact with the dynamo of the great Holy Spirit of God.

"This is nothing new. But it is largely a forgotten secret. It has gone out of practice—has been forced out by other interests. Christ urges it upon us. Holy men and saints of all ages have practiced it. But in the busy, restless activities of the world it has too largely been neglected. As a penalty our inner spiritual life is not strong. Make the experiment, and have the experience which Archbishop Trench recites:

'Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in Thy presence will avail to make!
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take;
What parched grounds refresh as with a shower!
We kneel, and all around us seems to lower;
We rise, and all the distant and the near Stand out in sunny outline, brave and clear.
We kneel how weak, we rise how full of power.'

"But there is a larger closet with the same and with additional fruits. I want to speak this morning of that larger closet of the service of corporate silence—other souls joining with us in an hour's retreat from the world and waiting and listening and becoming corporately conscious of God, and thus increasing the spiritual life and the fellowship of the parish.

"Where two or three are gathered together in silence, as well as in vocal worship, there God is in the midst of them.

"A parish and all its worship and work is a means to corporate fellowship with God and with each other. Is not the closet one of the helps to this, for a parish as well as for the individual? Is there not danger of its becoming a secularized church? Is there not danger of conventionality and externalism in religion? Is there not danger of parish worldliness? To make a parish grow bigger and stronger than other parishes; to exploit its temporal progress; to adopt all sorts of semi-secular parish activities in a secular spirit; to secularize Christianity instead of cultivating the spiritual, the evangelical life—are not these dangers to which every parish is exposed?

"The world is too much with us as a parish, as well as with individuals. The parish soul then also needs its closet—its retreat from the world—its hours of silent fellowship with God that brings the fruits of the spirit—intensifying them and adding thereto the parish fellowship of souls, above merely social fellowship. I verily believe that if all who care to freshen and increase the consciousness of God could meet together in silence and wait upon Him, there would be a corporate parish revival of the inner spiritual life."

So Dr. Sterrett leaves little that needs be said on an exceedingly vital and practical subject.

There was a time, doubtless, when Christian people gave themselves not too largely but too exclusively, to the contemplative or devotional life. But that time has passed, and this is a day of Christian activity and of Church work and advancement; again not too largely, but may it not be too exclusively? Service is the dominant note in the calls which the Church is making upon her children and in her exhortations to them. This is the aspect of the Christian life and duty which is being presented to the minds of the people with the greater emphasis; and because of the opportunity and need on every side, and because it is something concrete and demonstrable, and because it is easier to perform, and more in keeping with our disposition and habit of mind, than the exercises of the deeper devotional life, there is the danger which every thoughtful Christian must feel that the latter be neglected and its paramount necessity be overlooked. And surely our preacher is right when he reminds us that this is a danger which besets the parish and congregation even more, if possible, than the individual. The parochial consciousness is a very real thing in any live parish, but every rector knows how the material and visible things, the things that can get themselves talked about and that produce tangible results, have a way of thrusting themselves forward in parochial consideration largely to the exclusion of that which is purely spiritual. So in almost any parish gathering the opening prayers seem of small moment as compared with a new and promising scheme for raising money, and the riches of God's glory fade into insignificance before a deficit in the treasury. The first thing is often very secondary in the programme of parochial life.

Anything therefore which will serve to correct this forgetful or neglectful habit of mind, or must we say this worldly habit of mind, in the individual or in the congregation, is worth thinking about. Its purpose and aim, at least, may be adopted, to be attained by what means we may with the help of the ever-waiting Spirit of God.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE CURIOSITY OF A LITTLE BOY.—"Little things and little people are often responsible for great results, and may be you do not know that the discovery of that important instrument, the telescope, may be traced to the curiosity of a little boy, and this is how it came about:

"The little boy I am telling you about, was the son of an optician, who lived in Holland. He and his sisters loved to play about their father's work bench, and often they amused themselves by looking at the sea through the little smooth concave glass which their father used in his work.

"Now, one day, it happened that the boy, while playing with two of these glasses, chanced to hold them before his eyes, in such a way that the face of the Cathedral clock seemed very near.

"This surprised him greatly, for the clock was so far away that he could scarcely see the hands with his naked eyes.

"For awhile he stared at the clock and then at the glasses, each of which he tried in turn, but the clock was as far away as ever, and so it remained, turn them as he would, until by chance again he held both up together, when, lo! as if by magic, the church stood beside him.

"Oh, I know, I know!" he cried aloud. "It's the two together." Then in great joy he ran to his father and told him of his remarkable discovery.

"His father tried the glasses in his turn and found that the boy had spoken the truth, when he said he could bring the great church clock nearer.

"So this was the way people learned that putting a concave and a convex glass together in just the right position, would make distant objects seem near. Without this knowledge, we should never have had the telescope, and without the telescope we should have known little of the sun, moon or stars."

SELECTED for Our Younger Friends by J. C. M., who says: "The quaint lines from the German I copied in my 'piece book' a half century ago":

SIX LITTLE WORDS (From the German).

"Six little words do claim me every day,
SHALL, MUST and CAN, with WILL and OUGHT and MAY.
SHALL is the law within, inscribed by Heaven,
The goal to which I myself am driven;
MUST is the bound not to be overpast,
Where, by the world and nature I'm held fast.
CAN is the measure of my personal dower,
Of deed and art, science and practised power.
WILL is my noblest crown, my brightest, best,
Freedom's my own seal, upon my soul impress.
OUGHT, the inscription on the seal set fair,
On Freedom's open door a bolt 'tis there.
And lastly, MAY, 'mong many courses mixed
The vaguely possible by the moment fixed.
SHALL, MUST and CAN, with WILL and OUGHT and MAY
These are the six that claim me every day.
Only when God doth teach do I know what each day
I SHALL, I MUST, I CAN, I WILL, I OUGHT, I MAY."

BETTER THAN THE DOLLS.—A good American preacher, Dr. A. J. Gordon, was once spending a holiday not far from Boston, and before he left home he promised his two little girls that he would bring them back a doll each. Of course, they were very glad, and arranged with the children of the neighborhood to have a dolls' party as soon as their father should return.

"As I looked through the car window on my return," said Dr. Gordon, "I saw the two children sitting in the carriage waiting for me. Then, for the first time, I thought of the dolls, and felt that I should be thankful to pay the expenses of a trip back, if only I might buy them. But I had to get into the carriage; so I took the reins in my hands, drove along quickly, and began to talk about the weather, until one of them looked up in my face and said, 'Father, where are the dolls?' I said, 'Oh, I am so forgetful. You must forgive me. I am sorry. Go down to the village and buy the best dolls you can find and I will pay for them.' They were disappointed, and could not forget it philosophically; but one of them, with the tears running down her cheeks, put her arms round my neck and said, 'I would rather have you than all the dolls in Boston. I really would.' I felt then that I should like to give her all the dolls in Boston. Anybody who wanted me could have all the dolls!"

We were told this story to teach us what a loving Heavenly Father we have, who delights to make His children happy, and to answer their prayers. And that He wants us to love Him, not only because of what He gives us, but just because He is our Father and is watching for our love. He loved us so much that He sent the Lord Jesus Christ, His only Son, to die for us that we might become His children.—From Friends' Witness.

RISE from your dreams of the future
Of gaining some hard-fought field,
Of storming some airy fortress,
Or bidding some giant yield;
Your future has deeds of glory,
Of honor (God grant it may!)
But your arm will never be stronger,
Or the need so great as to-day.

TRIUMPHANT TRUTH.

Truth never dies. The ages come and go;
The mountains wear away; the seas retire;
Destruction lays earth's mighty cities low;
And empires, states and dynasties expire;
But, caught and handed onward by the wise,
Truth never dies.

Though unrecieved and scoffed at through the years;
Though made the butt of ridicule and jest;
Though held aloft for mockery and jeers;
Denied by those of transient power possessed;
Insulted by the insolence of lies,
Truth never dies.

It answers not; it does not take offense,
But with a mighty silence hides its time;
As some great cliff that braves the elements,
And lifts through all the storms its head sublime,
And never dies.

As rests the Sphinx amid Egyptian sands;
As loom on high the snowy peak and crest;
As firm and patient as Gibraltar stands,
So truth, unwearied, waits the era blest,
When men shall turn to it with great surprise.
Truth never dies. —Unknown.

NEWS ITEMS.

The following is the Public Ledger report of a meeting in Atlantic City on the 11th. It gives a good idea of the message that our Friend is delivering with much faithfulness:

"Doctor Isaac Sharpless, President of Haverford College, speaking at a Y. M. C. A. meeting in Atlantic City said the time had come for the United States to set an example for the whole Christian world by practicing the precepts of peace and forbearance it has heard preached for years upon years.

"He deplored the growth of the military spirit in the United States, and especially the Federal support of a militarist policy through the introduction in Congress of a bill providing for universal military service. Whether this country will stand for a law which proposes to deprive its male citizens of their right to think for themselves and would force them to commit in the name of war all manner of crimes forbidden in the law, he said, remained to be seen.

"Doctor Sharpless expressed the belief that the sending to Europe by the Federal Government of a great sum of money to be expended without regard to nationality, for the relief of the millions who have suffered and are suffering through war, would do the United States vastly more good than fleets of dreadnoughts or compulsory military measures."

A LETTER from Friends in London expresses thanks for the contributions which have been sent by Philadelphia Friends for the relief of aliens in England. Conditions do not improve and continued help will have to be received. The money for European sufferers has been forwarded to Isaac Sharp of London, who distributes it to the various relief agencies which are being conducted by English Friends in England, France, Belgium and other places. Money sent for the Armenians is forwarded through the Armenian Relief Committee in this country.

A SMALL but valuable collection of manuscripts relating to early Friends, the property of the late Silvanus P. Thompson, has been presented to the central library at Devonshire House by Jane S. Thompson. The papers include a list of Friends, arranged according to their meetings, present at a meeting at Weston, Bucks, 13 iii, 1668, in the handwriting of Thomas Ellwood; a letter from Edward Burrough to Friends in London, sent from Underbarrow in 1661; a letter from Margaret Fox to William Penn in 1677, dated and endorsed by the hand of her daughter, Sarah Fell, giving some particulars of the meetings of the Separatists; a letter from John Fothergill and others, dated York, 13 iii, 1734, respecting a parliamentary election, addressed to William Birbeck in Settle; a copy of a letter from William Penn to Nicholas Gates in Alton, dated 19 v, 1708, regarding financial arrangements with his steward, Philip Ford; a copy in the handwriting of Thomas Ellwood, of a letter from Marmaduke Stevenson and William Robinson—"The 23 day of ye 8th month, was this given forth, and he suffered ye 27th day of ye same month at Boston in New England 1659;" and a copy of an autograph letter of George Fox to his wife, from London, 9 iv, 1674.

In the Herald (edited by George Lansbury) the following Note occurred: "The war has taught us all to value and respect most highly the Society of Friends. These men and women, who believe in peace, and whose long history is a fine record of splendid work for humanity, are doing magnificent selfless work during the war in palliating the misery of those who are innocently suffering because of the insanity which has overtaken the rulers of the world. In France and Belgium the work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit is well known. In Northern France a committee is working to rebuild the villages and restore people to their homes. In our own country this same Society has very largely assisted in the work of providing for the British-born wives of Germans who are interned or who have been sent back to Germany. The plight of some of the poorer of these women has been terrible in the extreme, living as they often do among other poor people whose minds have been maddened by the outrages raised against the Germans by the press. Life has been at times very hard and bitter, although their only crime has been that they followed the example of people in high places and married Germans. Now, thanks to the work of the Society of Friends, things are better, and a better spirit is growing up; we are all discovering it is not the race or sect or creed which so much determines our value, but, instead, the true test for a man or woman is what they individually are. The Northcliffe Press, ever eager to try to down an opponent, has discovered that Lord Haldane sent £50 to the Committee for helping these helpless ones, and proceeds to write a full column of stupid nonsense all designed to prove that the activities of this Committee are for an end, a premature peace, and calls it a pro-German move because some Germans have subscribed to the funds. We do not believe any reasonable person will be taken in; rather will all of us who know the facts do what we can to assist the Society of Friends in their noble work of alleviating the misery caused by the war."

The New York Times is quite of the opinion that the new battle cruisers for the United States Navy are an investment to secure international peace. These floating forts are to be 850 feet long, and with a speed of from thirty-two to thirty-five knots. Their displacements will be 35,000 tons, as against the English warships of the Queen Elizabeth type, with only 27,500 tons. Each of these new swift-going war machines will carry ten fourteen-inch guns. The $20,000,000 machines will, in short, represent the superlative in dimensions and speed. This New York paper grants that "economically the loss of one of these powerful cruisers will be very serious; but ships are not built to be lost. The one thing certain is that with plenty of cruisers of this type ready for action and the newer 32,000-ton dreadnoughts in commission, the chance of the United States Navy being dragged into war will be remote. We are building for defense, not for offense. . . . That is the only way to do it." Of course Germany has presented this kind of an argument for forty years; so has Great Britain, France, and Japan. The pathetic side of the matter is that the Times probably sincerely believes what it says to be true. It picks out what is demonstrably the most hopeless way possible of keeping the peace, and gravely asserts it to be "the only way to do it." If the Times has its way, this type of reasoning in a circle will go on and on until the next war follows, as the night follows the day, and when it comes we'll be in it.

SWARTHMOOR HALL, England, the home of Margaret Fell and ruined Furness Abbey are not far apart. Many an American tourist has visited them on the same day and has written home his impressions, but few, we think, have better expressed what each really represents to-day than J. W. Russell in the "Shrine of Swarthmoor":

"In the presence of Furness there is no escape from thoughts of the mighty system which produced it and its like—call it the piety of mediæval times if you will; at Swarthmoor the mind just as easily centres upon a person. At Furness it is architecture; at Swarthmoor it is a man, at Furness a gorgeous temple of tangible material deftly and wondrously knit together by the unsurpassed skill of generations of men; at Swarthmoor a 'temple not made with hands,' a living spirit that 'struggled and wrestled to be free' and wrought only to deliver others from the prison-house of their earthly bondage. That is why I prefer the simple peacefulness of Swarthmoor to the desolate grandeur of Furness."

DOUBTLESS those who have been aware of conditions at Tunesassa since the first of the year, have had their sympathies largely enlisted in behalf of the entire family, and especially so for our new Superintendent and Matron and the band of loyal helpers, who with them, have so nobly faced the trying situation, and have so faithfully and efficiently done more than double duty during the past six weeks. Almost immediately after the return of the children from their winter vacation, measles developed with three of the Tuscaroras, and notwithstanding prompt isolation, spread until 23 cases were on hand. Seven of these later developed bronchial pneumonia, two mastoiditis, and two or three some other complications. Twenty-six were in bed at one time, several of whom were most seriously ill, one child being constantly attended by two of the family in relays, for ninety-two consecutive hours. Two of the faculty were also patients. All studies were suspended, and with the exception of two who attended to cooking and dietary needs, all of the women in the family became nurses, and dividing into relays, faithfully and efficiently waited on our little wards.

Our friends, Henry B. and Eliza F. Leeds, promptly closed their home at Steamburg, four miles distant, and entered the quarantine, rendering much valuable help. When the worst had seemed to be over, Joseph Elkinton Watt, one of the students whose parents live in our tenant house, suddenly developed angina pectoris, and in a few hours had breathed his last, before a doctor could be summoned. Although of strong "pagan" ancestry, he sweetly asked his mother just before the close, to sing the hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

During much of this dispensation, the weather had been most trying, with high winds and the mercury far below zero—28 being the minimum. On the morning of First-day, the 6th, as the larger part of the convalescents were at breakfast, smoke was seen issuing from the ceiling of the dining-room. Prompt action with extinguishers and buckets, resulted in saving the building after two hours of strenuous work, but for a while the outcome seemed doubtful. Overheating of some joists not far from the smoke pipe were thought to have started the trouble, and it is now proposed (and approved by the insurance company) to replace the same with an iron girder. Our hearts cannot be other than grateful that we were spared a calamity. During the progress of the fire, the sick children were dressed, and some of the larger boys were delegated to carry them into the creamery, the only available place where the temperature was suitable for invalids, should the fire proceed beyond control. By advice of one of the physicians, over one hundred dollars worth of disinfectants were sent up, and the entire building was thoroughly fumigated. As soon as safe, one of the Committee went to Tunesassa and found the family warm, but cheerful and grateful for the Overshadowing care that had been rendered.

The one cloud of anxiety now resting on the Institution (Second Month 19th) is the serious illness of our beloved Friend, Henry B. Leeds, who was stricken early last week with pleurisy and pneumonia. While a professional nurse is attending him, her care, will if necessary, be supplemented by the willing hands and grateful hearts of the entire family to whom his ministry of service has meant so much, and we doubt not that intercessions to the throne of Grace are arising for him.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Postal routes of 3500 years ago, when the parcel post and the circulating library already had been in existence at least 800 years, are shown on the world's oldest map, discovered in the University Museum's Nippur tablets by Dr. Stephen Langdon, the Orientalist from Oxford University. Announcement to this effect was made by the Museum, and it was said that Doctor Langdon considered the map not only the oldest, but the best preserved that has come down from antiquity.

Seven hundred churchmen joined last week in a message of Peace addressed "to our Christian brethren of all lands." They "take open stand with those who labor for the establishment of lasting peace upon the foundations of righteousness." Included in the list are Bishops David H. Greer of New York, Ethelbert Talbot of South Bethlehem and Cortland Whitehead of Pittsburgh.

The actual profits of the Western farmer from the operation of his land and equipment have been studied by the economics department of the State Agricultural College, Kansas. It was ascertained that the total capital used by the average farmer was $12,307; operative capital $1,477. On over 200 farms the farmer's return, after paying 5 per cent. on the investment, was $399 annually when the average investment was $8,589; with an average investment of $18,359 it was $629; with an average investment of $32,231, it was $1,028.

The N. Y. Independent is authority for the following: "The next time the coal miners of the United States go on a strike, the people of the city of Austin, Texas, won't care so very much. For Austin has found a way to turn its garbage into fuel—a fuel which burns as long and gives off as much heat as the best bituminous lump coal—and, what is equally important, Austin has at the same time solved the problem of a sanitary system of garbage collection and disposal."

By the discovery of the kind of corn used by the Indians in the color belt it is said that we have doubled the corn belt, and will add billions upon billions of dollars to the national wealth. The New York Evening Post cites this as one of the practical outcomes of the work of the American Museum of Natural History.

Governor James P. Goodrich, at Indianapolis, Ind., has signed the State-wide prohibition bill, making Indiana dry on and after Fourth Month 2, 1918. The law prohibits the sale, manufacture, giving away or advertisement of all alcoholic liquors, except pure grain alcohol for chemical and medicinal purposes and wine for sacramental uses. Supporters of the bill say it is one of the most stringent prohibition measures enacted in any State. Motion pictures were taken of the Governor as he signed the bill.

Health insurance is under discussion in Massachusetts. It is estimated the cost to employers, employees and the State would be about $23,000,000 a year.

More than 145 words a minute have been sent in high speed wireless tests in England.

The Oriental clauses of the new immigration law were framed with scrupulous care in order to avoid any clash with Japan, so that the statement that the Tokio Government finds in it no ground for complaint causes no surprise.

Japan in 1916 rolled up a trade balance against the United States of $73,000,000, according to a statement issued by the foreign trade department of the National City Bank. This was done in a period when trade between the two countries virtually doubled. Exports to Japan in the year increased 136 per cent., while the imports here gained seventy-three per cent. The total value of the trade both ways in 1916 was $291,000,000 against $154,000,000 in 1913; the former high-record year.

NOTICES.

THE Annual Meeting of The Tract Association of Friends will be held at Friends' Meeting-house, Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, on Fourth-day, Second Month 28, 1917, at 3.30 P. M. Interested friends are cordially invited to attend. WM. BIDDLE, Clerk.

A MEETING of the "Council of Westtown Mothers" will be held at Friends' Institute, Phila., on Third-day, Third Month 6th, at 3 P. M. Mothers of children expecting to enter the School next year are cordially invited to attend. Any mother who has a subject she desires to bring before the "Council" will kindly communicate with the Executive Committee before the meeting. MARY R. WOOD, Riverton, N. J.

ANNOUNCEMENT.—Beginning Second Month 21, 1917, continuing for one year, a meeting for worship will be held in Friends' Meeting-house, Moorestown, N. J., the Fourth-day evening preceding the last Second-day of each month, at 7.45 P. M. After this meeting the business of the Preparative Meeting will be transacted. There will be no meeting the following Fifth-day morning.

MEETINGS from Second Month 25th to Third Month 3rd:—
Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, at Burlington, Third-day, Second Month 27, at 10.30 A. M.
Gwynedd, at Norristown, First-day, Second Month 25, at 10.30 A. M.

"The springs of prayer are deeper than the springs of thought."
—Caroline E. Stephen.

PRAYER.

The article with this title reprinted from Friends' Fellowship Papers in this number of our paper carries its own message. Its author, at one time a minister of another denomination, has had the advantage of a point of view quite different from that of the average Friend. His emphasis therefore of the spiritual character of prayer is more significant. To all of us the "identification of prayer with the spiritual life" presents inexhaustible surprises of strength for daily living. It is well to recognize that the word prayer has a variety of meanings even in the Bible. This variety, however, is likely due to various points of view of the one subject, and these points of view are gathered into one as we rise to the spiritual life. When sixteen million church members are called to prayer on a given day, as recently, and they combine to present specified subjects to the Throne of Grace, there is a religious reaction that must affect both the invisible and the visible world quite beyond human calculation. It might not appeal to us as at all on the same plane as the exercise of communion in which our souls get first a sense of Divine need, and then some capacity to cry unto the Lord for help, but we are aware that many do actually reach by this somewhat highly organized process an experience of vital prayer. We maintain as Friends, and willingly promulgate our specific views of prayer, only because we believe they are best calculated to produce the condition described in the little adjective vital. The real exercise of prayer has always been presented in our circles as so full of reverence and awe that we have cultivated cautious forms of expression often misunderstood by onlookers. Thus the oft-repeated phrase "basis of silence" might even yet be revised advantageously to be "basis of prayer." What the average Church member does when he bows his head or kneels for a moment upon taking his place in a service, the exercised Friend is supposed to do during the whole of the silence of a meeting. There is, of course, one distinct difference, although it by no means completely differentiates our mode. The protracted silent prayer directly becomes social; we are actually "poured from vessel to vessel" until there is felt in what we call a favored meeting a very comforting "unity of exercise."

To those who do not see our practice in public or private worship in this light there is ample opportunity, as observed above, for misunderstanding. An instance of this, somewhat extreme we hope and yet in a sense characteristic, may have a lesson for us all. One who had a birthright membership with Friends, whose parents were always actively interested in the religious efforts of our meetings, in early adult life joined another denomination. He felt himself called after his mother's death to make a public declaration, in the course of which he said that he had never known his mother to pray. This occurred in a country neighborhood and the religious sense of the community was not a little outraged, and made no little protest at what was generally felt to have been a great injustice to a good woman. A radiant countenance in worship and a waiting manner in dealing with the perplexing details of her ordinary routine had made her very life a "prayer" to many onlookers. If the son had not realized this they could only feel that his perceptions were too dull to grasp the fundamental thought in prayer.

It is noted of two valuable elders in our Society of a past generation that their only public appearance in a meeting for worship was confined to a single instance in each case. The meetings were in adjoining States and the occasions somewhat widely separated in time. In both the Friend knelt in prayer, but in one case no word was uttered, and in the other only an unintelligible ejaculation was heard. A very marked baptizing effect was, however, produced. That which is beyond words covered the assemblies. So it is quite evident that what is now familiarly called the "prayer life" is by no means dependent upon words.

We are not, however, without sympathy with the view, sometimes expressed amongst us, that souls can hardly be exercised in prayer without at times feeling the compulsion of utterance. Nevertheless the restraint which comes from maintaining a high spiritual conception of prayer is not only safe, it is wholesome. Nothing so much cheapens religious services in the popular mind as prayer without unction. William Penn's observations of the weight of George Fox in prayer should counsel us to seek a "like frame." If we have a special service as Friends it is to make a contribution of depth to this absolutely vital subject. J. H. B.

PRAYER.

BY W. BLAIR NEATBY.

The pre-eminence of prayer in the spiritual life was brought home to me forcibly some years since by the odd pronouncement of a great prelate upon the merits of the sacramental controversy that ceaselessly agitates his own church. In the interests of a mediating theology, to which he was notoriously attached, and with a desire to administer a check to the extreme tendencies of the sacerdotal school, he laid it down that the grace of the sacrament does not differ in kind from the grace of prayer.

I naturally asked myself: How, then, according to this high authority, does it differ? Obviously, in his view, it excels in degree; it brings the same grace as prayer brings, but brings it more potently, more abundantly. But this in turn set me thinking of many thousands of Christians who have nurtured the religious life to its noblest maturity without resort to sacraments, and who would affirm, with one accord, that without prayer they could not barely have kept the life in being for a single month. The further I followed this line of reflection, the more I felt that a prelate who thinks to save the supremacy of the sacrament by assigning to it, in comparison with prayer, a higher efficacy in the ministry of one and the same grace, is imagining a very vain thing indeed.

In old Israel, profoundly wise in this respect, men were remembered for their power in prayer as men are remembered with us for their power in preaching: Moses and Samuel were men who called on the Lord, and He answered them. Among Christians, prayer has been the secret strength of the true heroes of all phases of the Christian life, the purer and the less pure alike. We know it to have been the hidden source of the active life of the Christian mystics who recovered for us the treasure of the calmness and sweetness of the original Gospel—of Fox, Penington, Grellet and Elizabeth Fry. But it has been not less the secret of saints of rougher temper and stormier action; the adversaries of Luther and of Knox quailed, we are told, in a sort of superstitious terror, before the rumors of prayer that were believed never to fail of their aim. Closer to the river-head, Paul, though more abundant in labors than all the rest, found time, we gather, to be more abundant in prayer also; and at the back of all we are arrested by the sight of Him who vouchsafed to become in all things like unto His brethren, devoting whole nights to prayer.

The influence of this great cloud of witnesses has kept alive among Christians—and even among those whose own prayer-life may have been disappointing—a profound sense of a mysterious potency in prayer. Apart from all the experience of suffering or alarm that so constantly drives even careless Christians back upon cries for Divine help, there is always at work a powerful if vague expectation of great things to be brought by a concert of prayer.

On the other hand, it is one of the standing disappointments of the spiritual life that appeals for prayer, however extensively and urgently pressed, are so often barren of most of the anticipated results. How few are the triumphs of Christian effort, how rare an abiding energy of the Christian spirit, remaining to attest the unquestionable sincerity and enthusiasm with which our calls to prayer have been urged!

And yet the power, the irresistibility of prayer, in other hands, remain to justify our prayers, though perhaps to condemn us.

It is well to make sure that we have true thoughts of prayer. That men pray almost everywhere, constrained by a need as inexorable as the need to breathe, is no doubt correct; but the prayer itself may deviate indefinitely from spiritual reality. Men even materialize their praying in the revolutions of a Buddhist praying-wheel. And there are countless elaborate forms of Christian devotion that are essentially no less contradictory of the most rudimentary notion of spirituality. To repeat the creed with intention to benefit a friend is not to pray, but to use spells. And are we stout-hearted Protestants always free from mechanical conceptions when we pray?

A mechanical conception of prayer is betrayed sometimes by our quantitative standards. It is betrayed very crudely when our neighbors count their prayers on the beads of a rosary; somewhat less crudely when we reckon the value of our prayers by the minutes that are spent over them daily. It is true, indeed, that a Christian who loves prayer will not be negligent of his times of "religious retirement;" but he should know that power in prayer resists all mechanical calculations and cannot be brought into any system of religious statistics.

In like manner, a call to prayer cannot fail to miss its aim if it assumes that prayer is a function of the soul that can be exercised at will in a certain relative isolation from the general state of spiritual vitality. And this is the deep truth covered by the old Quaker dictum, which has been to some a stumbling-block, that "prayer cannot be offered in the will of man."

Stumbling block or not, the truth it endeavors to express is the root of all right thinking about prayer. For prayer is no mere function of spiritual life, but the very spiritual life itself, regarded in a certain aspect; and therefore a call to prayer is a call to spiritual life. And is for that reason a far greater thing than we often realize when we issue it.

Or to put it more briefly: Prayer is Consecration. Our first real prayer begins with our first real consecration; and when our consecration is complete we pray without ceasing. Our prayer for ourselves is real in the exact measure in which we consecrate ourselves to God in our every request; and our prayer for our friends is real exactly as we consecrate them in our request for them; and our prayers for public causes are real exactly as we ask that God may be glorified in public affairs. This is the first lesson of the Lord's Prayer: "Our Father, Thy Name be revered; Thy reign come; Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

Prayer and consecration are attitudes of the soul, or rather they are one and the same attitude. Expressed ideally, it is the attitude of a soul absolutely responsive to God, absolutely devoted to God, and therefore absolutely receptive from God. If we use words of petition (and we ought to use them freely), it is to help our receptivity at the point of our need by making our need precise to ourselves: it is a "talking over" our wants with God; for "our Heavenly Father knoweth what things we have need of before we ask Him," and He is "more willing to give than we to ask." Our very petitions thus become so many acts of dedication, and prayer is revealed as worship in a sense that, to some of us, may be a deeper thing than the past has known.

It seems therefore that a call to prayer must, if it is to be effective, be definitely realized as an effort to awaken a deeper and purer spiritual life. If it is less than this, it is nothing. If it is this, its conscious aim is the creation in every Christian, of a religious life of absolute devotion, into which the Divine fulness may find entrance without stint. For power with God in prayer is the removal of barriers on our side to the inflowing of His grace; and the barriers once cast down the river flows in flood over all the thirsty land.—From Fellowship Papers.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION.

NO. 125 E. TWENTY-SEVENTH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

TO MEN AND WOMEN OF GOOD-WILL THROUGHOUT THE UNITED STATES:—

In this moment of national crisis it is in the heart of every true citizen to give his full measure of service to his country. The great Republic which we love is in its hour of trial. Its responsibility and need are calling for the highest loyalty of all. Yet there have been few moments in history when we could so little afford to render our country ill-considered service. What the United States now does may determine not simply its own course for a few years, but the future of nations, of whole peoples, or of humanity for centuries. The primary duty of each of us is a dispassionate endeavor to penetrate through the mass of political complications to those fundamental principles of Christianity upon which only can national conduct of permanent value be based.

The immediate legal issue is the right of American citizens to pursue their legitimate business on the high seas freely in accordance with international law. This is, without doubt, important enough; yet beside the deeper moral issues it sinks into relative insignificance. The crucial fact in to-day's world situation is not infraction of international rules, but contempt for humanity and ruthless disregard of moral and spiritual principles. These are the deeper wrongs which every man and woman who revered human nature instinctively condemn. The task of the United States in this decisive hour is not chiefly to vindicate a legal right but to uphold the principles by which men live.

II.

Germany's new submarine policy has staggered the world. To condone so great a wrong against mankind would be disloyal to every principle of humanity. The impulse comes to leap to arms. If by this means right could be vindicated no offer of life could be too prodigal, no expenditure of wealth too great.

Yet it is not by war with Germany that the United States can champion the moral order of Christendom. This moral order is a system of moral and spiritual relationships between human beings, and these relationships, whether between a few persons or between nations, rest ultimately upon the characters of individuals. Wrong can be successfully opposed only by making men righteous. Not a nation defeated but the nations won to righteousness is what the world needs.

It is not simply that war with Germany would be a colossal expenditure of life and wealth—a diversion of national resources which would arrest social progress for untold years. But the tragedy of such a war undertaken for the sake of human welfare would be that after all the price paid, after all the loss of life, the blood-sweat and the anguish, it would be found to have defeated its own ends. That all the sanguinary conflicts of history have done no more to make the principles of righteousness effective is due to no strange miscarriage of fate. It is the natural consequence of the contradiction between the method of war and the principles of moral order. The method of war, instead of defending, inevitably shatters moral principles. In making the defeat of the enemy its supreme object it subordinates the moral law to military necessity. In its wholesale destruction of men by men, in engendering widespread hatred and distrust, it violates that reverence for personality which lies at the heart of the Christian religion. In demanding absolute obedience to military authority and the surrender of the right to act according to conscience, it cuts at the very life-root of moral being. However just a cause may be the method of war is intrinsically and incurably evil and therefore self-defeating.

III.

Now is the time for this nation to have courage to go forward in a better way. This is the hour for us to dare to make trial of the will to love as the effective power for the maintenance of the moral and spiritual order. Hitherto mankind has made feeble use of the inexhaustible resources of love and good-will. We have regarded them as available in our families and among our friends, but notwithstanding Christ and the lesson of the Cross, we have little trusted them in social, industrial and international relations. The moral progress of the world waits for us to make them effective in these spheres. The highest task that confronts us as a people, in the present situation, is to generate and set in operation between nations on a scale never before known the irresistible energies of love. The immeasurable needs of humanity plead with us to dare all risks in trying Christ's method of serving the cause of mankind.

The method of love does not mean that we are to condone the unrighteous acts of any nation, or that we are to live as if in a world of suspended moral values. It does not mean that we are to forget how to pass stern moral judgment on every kind of wrong. But it means that we are to seek to combat wrong not by the punishment or annihilation of the wrongdoer, but by a sustained appeal to conscience. It requires that a new passion for righteousness must first of all lift us out of our own selfishness and self-complacency, and that in prayer and self-denying efforts we identify ourselves with the present sufferings of humanity. It calls for the exercise of daring and inventive faith for a vast increase of constructive service. It is the supreme task of overcoming evil with good.

IV.

All that can be said about the principle of overcoming evil with good will avail little unless we are able to make that principle effective in action. If international good-will is to be more than an ideal for the future, adequate means for its expression in service must be discovered and employed. Work now in progress for aiding the prisoners of war in many lands and for mitigating the distress of destitute populations in Belgium, Poland and Armenia offers existing opportunities. Plans are under consideration for the extension and greater unification of undertakings to meet immediate needs and to prepare for the great work of reconstruction which awaits us at the close of the war. At this time of widespread suffering—immeasurably the most terrible that we have ever known—shall not the men and women of the United States augment many-fold their gifts and efforts to meet the world's need on a scale commensurate with national ability?

The Fellowship of Reconciliation unites men and women who share the conviction that the principles of love and good-will as revealed by Christ should be unwaveringly applied as a transforming power in personal, social, industrial, national and international life. While the Fellowship is not itself an administrative organization, its Committee desires, particularly during these critical days, to do all in its power to extend the constructive application of these principles. It will gladly furnish information as to opportunities for practical work and agencies through which gifts and services may be made effective. It invites the co-operation of all and will welcome communications. Its statement of principles and information concerning its literature, methods of work or other particulars may be had on request. Inquiries should be addressed to the Secretary, Edward W. Evans, No. 511 Otis Building, Sixteenth and Sansom Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

NOTES FROM THE SOUTH.

"Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead. Fill their lives with sweetness now. Speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them, and while their hearts can be thrilled by them."—HENRY WARD BEECHER.

"There are no hurts that beauty cannot ease,
No ills that love cannot at last repair,
In the courageous progress of the soul."

—BLISS CARMAN.

In these momentous days when the world-wide appeal in behalf of humanity has gone to the belligerents from our President and the whole human family stands at attention—wondering what the effect will be—while our own fate as a nation hangs in the balance, these lines have come with inspiring comfort. We have also witnessed a blighting frost during the past week, destroying, as ruthlessly as even the Germans, the beauty of the landscape; but our hearts are still joyous. The writer of "Some Meditations of the Heart," in the Atlantic Monthly (Twelfth Month, 1916), gives us the keynote: "God is love." I wish that those three words could be stamped all over the heart of every human being in the world and out of the world," and then, picking up the flower of a primrose plant, says, "It was a little whimsical face looking up at me and it was smiling—the most exquisite, tender, mirthful smile. Flowers seem to me constantly to embody this quaint, fantastic, yet always tender poetic mirth. There is hardly a blossom that hasn't this whimsical, laughing expression. They are beautiful, of course, but we do not so often see their trick of laughter as well. I think, perhaps, they are manifestations of God's mirth. His littlest smiles, perhaps. It is all so tender and poetic. A mirth that could not be so mirthful if it were not so tender; a tenderness that could not be half so tender were it not so mirthful. I am sure that laughter is almost as meek at the heart of the universe as beauty and love."

Yes! it is the soul that can see these "smiles" in the midst of all that surrounds and overwhelms us that prompts me to write. With a world gone mad and our national action in the balance, yet I cannot accept the ancient dictum, "all is vanity and vexation of spirit." For the spirit of God is the eternal antidote to the cynical mind, and "without mysticism there can be no genuine religious enthusiasm; because it takes more to see God than the ability to distinguish between profit and loss."

One must walk in the cool of the evening and see the afterglow of one's best experience—as Isaac of old sought to commune with his own heart in his garden—in order to get the true perspective of life and feel the eternal realities which cannot be destroyed nor robbed of their heavenly good.

It requires no small courage and insight to stem the stress of these days, so as not to be stampeded by the international conflict and our personal trials, when our spirits would fain sink into a passive state of endurance, if not of hopelessness.

But this is a moral universe and the God who made it is always in it and ever ready to sustain it. Clouds may obscure and human convulsions distract the vision, but the perennial forces remain intact. There is wonderful comfort in some of the old prophetic utterances, which have stood the test of the centuries, and none of them has a truer ring than the prayer of Habakkuk: "For though the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."

But the natural and insistent enquiry, "How long, O Lord?" must have an answer, and it will, in the heart of every sincere lover of his kind. To myself it comes not by any measure of time, but by a quickened sense of companionship, an indefinable nearness and enveloping glory; like that of the sunset, which carries the soul beyond its limitations. Surely if it were not for the ability to lift up our eyes to the heavens, or to the hills, "whence cometh our strength," and to see the marvellous beauty about and within us, we should indeed be the victims of a sad fate.

But we can say with the Psalmist in the face of the most portentous events in human history, "Oh, Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth! who has set Thy glory above the heavens"—and in the hearts of the children of men!

A recent contributor to THE FRIEND has privately asked, "Is there no sense of humor or proportion among our ministers (of the Christian church) that the greatest tragedy of all times through which we are living, does not give them new spiritual interpretations of our God of Love? The popular mind has little sympathy or understanding of the necessity for good-will between nations. O, it is hard, with our poor human understanding, to be patient and in our eager striving for righteousness to wait God's time for clearing away some of the mysteries of this time." Elizabeth Barrett Browning in "Aurora Leigh," expresses a somewhat similar thought:

"Dear, my soul is grey,
With pouring o'er the long sun of ill,
So much for rice, so much for discontent,
So much for the necessities of power,
So much for the connivances of fear,
To see it down in figures on a page,
Plain, silent, clear, as God sees through the earth,
The sense of all the graves—that's terrible
For one who is not God, and cannot right
The wrong he looks on. May I choose, indeed,
But vow away my years, my means, my aims,
Among the helpers? The common blood
That swings along my veins is strong Enough to draw me to this duty.

Beloved we must be here to work,
And men who work can only work for men
And not to work in vain must comprehend
Humanity and so work humanly,
And raise men's bodies still by raising souls,
As God did first . . . and work all silently
And simply . . . as God does all;
The man most man, with tenderest human hands,
Works best for men—as God in Nazareth.
The Christ Himself had been no lawgiver
Unless He had given the life too with the law."

"It is the hour for souls,
That bodies, hvened by the will and love,
Be lightened to redemption."

One asks are those ministers who signed a protest against the President's appeal for peace—and all who believe in the sword as the final arbiter—really shutting their New Testaments? Are they sowing the seeds of just contempt among the laboring classes, for after-generations to reap the bitter harvest of the masses who scorn the church? It is a solemn fact that should war come for any cause in this country the churches would probably not remember the Sermon on the Mount! But would that alter the standard forever required of the disciples of Him who said: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them who despitefully use you and persecute you—that you may be the children of your Father who is in heaven?"

THE SEEKER AFTER GOD.

There was a dreamer, once, whose spirit trod
Unnumbered ways in thwarted search for God;
He stirred the dust on ancient books; he sought
For certain light in what the teachers taught;
He took his staff and went unto the Wise,
And deeper darkness fell about his eyes;
He lived a hermit and forebore his food,
And God left visitless his solitude;
He wrapped himself in prayer night after night,
And mocking demons danced across his sight:

Resigned at last to Him he could not find,
He turned again to live among mankind—
And when from man he no more stood apart
God, on that instant, visited his heart!

—HARRY KEMP, in The Independent.

LIVES of self-devotion have always the same kind of power that belongs to the sacrifice of Jesus. They are the lesser hill-tops grouped around the great mountain. Such lives may we all live in any little world where God has set us.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

THE ANSWER.

Suggested by C. C. W.

"Allah, Allah!" cried the sick man, racked with pain the long night through,

Till with prayer his heart grew tender, till his lips like honey grew.
But at morning came the Tempter, said, "Call harder, child of Pain, See if Allah ever hear, or answer 'Here am I' again."
Like a stab the cruel evil thro' his brain and pulses went,
To his heart an icy coldness, to his brain a darkness sent.
Then before him stands Elias; says, "My child, why thus dismayed?
Dost repent thy former fervor? Is thy soul of prayer afraid?"
"Ah!" he cried, "I've called so often, never heard the 'Here am I,'
And I thought God will not answer, will not turn on Me His eye."
Then the grave Elias answered, "God said, 'Rise, Elias, go
Speak to him the sorely tempted, lift him from his grief of woe.
Tell him that his very longing is itself an answering cry,
And his prayer, Come gracious Allah! is My answer, Here am I!
Every inmost aspiration is God's angel, undefiled,
And in every 'O my Father!' slumbers deep a 'Here, My child!'"

THE EMERGENCY PEACE FEDERATION.

On the eve of the severing of diplomatic relations with Germany, when the newspapers were doing their best to throw the United States into a hysteria of belligerency, there came together in New York City a group of people who believed that the crisis demanded a striking protest on the part of pacifists. With no desire for duplicating organizations for peace they felt the need of a more or less temporary organization which could act suddenly at the strategic moment. Thus came into existence, on Second Month 3rd, the Emergency Peace Federation, whose object is "to keep the United States out of war and its attendant circumstances" (i. e. compulsory military training, conscription, preparedness, etc.).

The program which they are urging upon the Administration is:—

1. Deferring settlement of controversies until after the war in Europe.
2. Keeping Americans out of the "war zone."
3. Deferring any "irrevocable step toward war," in case of an overt act, until the sober will of the American people has been sounded through an advisory referendum.

The Emergency Committee felt that every effort should be made to offset the influence of the public press in its apparent war propaganda and to make articulate "the sober judgment and purposes of the mass of the public."

They planned a Peace demonstration to be held in Washington on Second-day, the 12th. Among the delegates, of whom there were two to three hundred, were members of the Women's Peace Party, of both branches of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Socialists, a representative of the Western Federation of Miners, Grangers, farmers, social workers, business men, college professors and college students. They appeared to be for the most part "extreme" pacifists—"peace at any price" people.

From our headquarters in Washington we divided into State delegations and spent the morning of Lincoln's birthday interviewing our respective Senators and Congressmen. A conference also was obtained with Senator Stone, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

In the afternoon we adopted resolutions which were taken to the White House by the delegation, pledging our support to the President in every endeavor to "secure a settlement of international disputes by peaceful means," and expressing our desire "to do everything in our power to maintain the leadership of our country in the work of bringing about world peace and abolishing forever the abominable war system."

In the evening a mass meeting was held, which was vibrant with hope and courage and intense earnestness. Very little was said or thought about the hypothetical enemy of the newspaper's creation against whom we must "prepare" feverishly, but very much was said and thought about the enemy already within our gates—the madness and moneyed strategem which are making this demand for increase in armaments, for conscription and military training in schools. In forty-one different States at the present time there are bills for compulsory military training and we need to bring all possible pressure to bear upon our legislatures in protest against this threatened danger. The conviction was expressed that young people to-day are so imbued with the principle of liberty that they would resist this mediæval and un-Christian compulsion, if need be, to the death. There was the stuff there out of which Conscientious Objectors are made, and if the awful necessity should arise, this country too, could produce martyrs "of whom the world is not worthy."

But that necessity we may yet be able to avert if we, the potential objectors, could only manage to live for the principle of human brotherhood just as heartily and aggressively as we should expect to die for it. In these troublous times of "wars and rumors of wars," of suffering and feverish activity and tremendous challenges, it was heartening to feel the strength of a group who had fearlessly thought through the issue to a finish and were ready to stake their lives on the conclusion

EDITH STRATTON.

WHY I REMAIN A FRIEND.*

My first thought in answer to this question is that I remain a Friend because I was brought up one by my parents and have had no inclination to join any other denomination. Upon further reflection some other reasons seem to be latent in my mind, and perhaps it is a good thing to stir them up and appreciate my blessings and possibilities.

Several times lately I have been asked, "What is the difference between Friends and other Protestants?" and my answer is, "there is no difference in the essential belief. The difference is only in the forms and emphasis upon certain attributes."

Personally, I do not like the idea of different denominations, doctrines and creeds. Our first purpose in life should be to become the best kind of a Christian and Jesus Christ is our perfect example. It seems to me that in following His example we should do everything in the simplest way possible, and Friends have always emphasized simplicity both in everyday life and in worship. Hence, the Society of Friends seems farthest removed from a sect based on dogma in belief and forms in worship.

Christ's whole teaching shows clearly our immediate contact or relation with God, and that we should look for guidance in our daily life from the Spirit within us no matter where we are.

The Society of Friends was founded on the principle of the "Inner Light," that is His spirit within us that will guide us. I think we cannot put too much emphasis upon the idea of the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and that after all it is the spirit in which we do things in our everyday life that really counts.

I am glad that we have no creed to profess, for mere words seem unimportant and often people differ as to what they believe when they try to express it in words, although they really mean the same thing, and their spirit is the same. There are many things in the Bible that we do not understand and therefore we cannot form clearly worded opinions about them. I think very often people feel that they cannot say definitely that they believe certain details given in the gospels and therefore suppose they will be thought hopeless and might as well consider themselves heathen.

After all, if we follow Christ's teachings and do as He shows us by His life, will we not come closer to God and all these things will be revealed unto us?

For this reason, because the Christian life is apt to be a gradual process or growth, I believe in birthright membership. I do not believe the majority of people are benefited by being made to think that they must make a confession of faith before men, in order to be recognized as a member of a religious denomination.

The Friends' mode of worship appeals to me as giving opportunity for the highest and best to be given and received. Its simplicity seems broad and dignified. Whittier expresses this beautifully in "The Meeting":—

"God should be most where man is least;
So, where is neither church nor priest,
And never rag of form or creed
To clothe the nakedness of need—
Where farmer-folk in silence meet—
I turn my bell-unsummoned feet.
I lay the critic's glass aside,
I tread upon my lettered pride,
And, lowest-seated, testify
To the oneness of humanity;
Confess the universal want,
And share whatever Heaven may grant.
He findeth not who seeks his own,
The soul is lost that's saved alone.
Not on one favored forehead fell
Of old the fire-tongued miracle,
But flamed o'er all the thronging host
The baptism of the Holy Ghost;
Heart answers heart: in one desire
The blending lines of prayer aspire;
'Where, in My Name, meet two or three,'
Our Lord hath said, 'I there will be!'"

Friends bear a strong testimony against war and emphasize peace in all their relations. Just at this time, when there is so much talk and writing on the subject of War and Peace, we, as young people, have begun to realize how much we owe our ideas on Peace to our training as Friends. Perhaps, also, we are only beginning to realize how fundamental they are before we can really follow Christ.

SUSAN ASHBRIDGE ROBERTS.

PEACE CONFERENCE OF ALL FRIENDS.

L. Hollingsworth Wood has put into our hands the announcement of the proposed Peace Conference of All Friends, to be held in London after the war. It is a very interesting paper and gives one some idea of the complex character of the civilization with which Peace workers must deal. The preliminary study involved to get a rational program out of this complexity will mean great effort and sacrifice. The following are the six heads under which these investigations are to proceed, viz.:

1. Into the fundamental grounds of the testimony (for Peace) and into the precise character of the testimony. There are six sub-divisions under these two heads.
 2. Into the implication of the testimony in national life, and international relations. This has three heads and numerous subdivisions.
 3. Into the implications in individual and social life. Two subdivisions and three topics under each.
 4. Into problems of education in relation to the testimony. Four subdivisions.
 5. Into the life of the Society itself in view of the present demand. Six subdivisions.
 6. Into methods of propaganda. Five subdivisions.
- Even with the subdivisions omitted this will seem quite formidable. The idea as we understand it is that Friends who are willing to make some contribution to this "drive for peace," will select a topic and give themselves to an investigation and study of it under the leadership of the head of the seven designated commissions already established. Details may be had from L. Hollingsworth Wood, 20 Nassau Street, New York City. Soon a general secretary will be appointed and all the work will focus in the office thus established.

The Commissions are as follows:

Rufus M. Jones has consented to head the Commission on No. 1. Isaac Sharpless is to head the Commission on No. 2, with William I. Hull on Sub-division "C." Jesse H. Holmes has consented to serve as head of the Commission on No. 3, Professor Bird T. Baldwin on No. 4, Henry J. Cadbury on No. 5, and Elbert Russell on No. 6.

The printed statement concludes as follows:—

Quarterly Meetings should arrange discussions of a preliminary character, study groups should meet in Particular Meetings, and individual Friends should be encouraged to read and study, by the preparation of short bibliographies and outlines of study. Articles should appear in publications of the Society, and thought should be concentrated upon these questions in every possible way. The results of such study should be sent to members of the commissions, where valuable points emerge or where definite agreement is reached on vexed questions. In this way the whole Society can actively co-operate in preparing for the Conference. Still more important is the preparation by prayer and the spirit of expectant faith, which may be quickened by preliminary discussions, and find expression in specially arranged devotional gatherings, as Friends may be led in different localities.

The Conference will meet to consider the reports of the commissions, and to reach conclusions in reference to practical suggestions that may be brought before it. Such conclusions will not, of course, be binding upon any constituent Yearly Meeting, but where necessary will come up for consideration at Yearly Meetings following the Conference. It will in any case be well to look to a continuation committee, that would seek to carry forward such plans as do not need the ratification of Yearly Meetings, and to act as a connecting link in cases where joint action by various Yearly Meetings is decided upon.

IN THE CAROLINA MOUNTAINS.

The Appalachian mountain system reaches its climax in magnitude, at least, in the Carolina Mountains. This statement does not refer merely to the fact that Mt. Mitchell is the highest peak of the system; Mt. Mitchell is but one of a dozen peaks over 6000 feet in altitude, and a catalogue of those over 5000 feet would certainly exceed fifty. As is customary in mountain ranges of such altitude these high peaks are buttressed on each side by ranges of considerable moment, averaging at least 3000 feet, and these in turn have piedmont approaches well described by one writer by saying that the earth's surface presents the effect "of a very choppy sea." The hills are multitudinous and the glens and gullies circle in bewildering complexity.

As to mountain attractions apart from magnitude and mass, one need not perhaps engage in controversy over the relative merits of the several Appalachian centres. Those who love the White Mountains, or the New York groups, or the Pennsylvania Poconos are not easily to be moved from their preference. The Blue Ridge is most blue where they know it; even majesty and mystery most enshroud the slopes and peaks of their well-determined attachment. This at least without argument can be conceded for the Southern mountains. The rigor of winter amongst them is greatly tempered by their latitude, spring comes earlier, and the summers give a touch of tropical richness and splendor. This climatic difference, registered in milder temperature, finds expression also in a richer flora and probably in a greater variety of animal life. Quite plainly North and South meet in the Carolina Mountains and some of the merit of the "golden mean" can be found there.

The cursory notes which follow do not aim to set forth the scenic, climatic or even human attractions of the region in much detail. This has been done most admirably in two books which not only make interesting reading, but have a very positive claim upon all who would be well informed upon our own country and its people. The first is entitled "The North Carolina Mountains." The author, Margaret Warner Morley, has a bungalow residence at Tryon, N. C. Twelve years of close contact with the several groups of mountains by journeys on foot or on horseback, by residence in out-of-the-way places, and by camping adventures make the background of a literary treatment of the subject in which the poetic sense is happily blended with extraordinary common-sense. Her book is one that appeals to head and heart and before it is read through most would say "this I will add to my private library." The second volume has the title "Our Southern Highlanders." It is by Horace Kephart and from the Outing Publishing Company in 1913. The author lived for three years in the recesses of the mountains, gained the confidences of the mountaineers and has disclosed the very heart of their character and picturesque manner of life. They are a passing type, but their impress upon American history has been considerable. Were they in Scotland or in the mountains of Central Europe they would be sought out by many tourists. The onrush of development in the South is absorbing them so rapidly that in another decade they will live merely as a memory in such books as this. This volume, like the previous one, has undoubted claims for a place upon a library shelf devoted to "America." Such points as are mentioned in these notes are amplified and given their well-deserved charm by these two gifted authors.

Those who love scenery either in mass or in detail find inexhaustible resources in these southern mountains. More liberally than in some other localities the attractions are on view. The mountains seem to have ranged themselves before great amphitheatres from which they present a moving picture show in the glories of sunrise and sunset and in the light and shadow of passing clouds. Never are they for any lengthened period without change. Now they seem just at hand—again they are far away. Now they are blue with a depth of color like a glistening stone—again they are deep, dreamy purple till one questions their reality. Perhaps no point of advantage for general observation can rival Asheville, but those who really feast on scenery will chose some less frequented spot. Few such excel in merit the Sunset Rock on Tryon Mountain. This point has a sheer elevation of nearly 2000 feet, the valley of the Green River makes a wonderful foreground for the high range behind, with Mt. Pisgah well to the south and Mt. Mitchell well to the north—a panorama that must embrace nearly a hundred miles in extent! Few mountain scenes so well meet one's expectation of what mountains should be. This viewpoint and another near it known as the Narrows were part of the resources of scenery that gave fame for thirty years or more to the Log Cabin Inn, which was burned to the ground in the early morning of Twelfth Month 18th. The Inn made a resting place for a stream of visitors from Tryon. Tryon itself is favorably located against the high range of the Blue Ridge which towers about 2000 feet above it. The elevation of Tryon above sea level is put down at 1200 feet. A six weeks' sojourn in this most attractive place gave opportunity for these notes. In guide books and railroad folders one reads of the "Thermal Belt" at Tryon. It is said the Department of Meteorology at Washington is puzzled by the phenomena of this Belt. There is no doubt the natives of the place and the average visitor are sorely puzzled. The two high mountain ranges behind Tryon—between it and the quarter from which the wintry winds mostly blow—doubtless give the place definite climatic advantages, but frost and snow and ice are not unknown. On the mountain barrier behind the town there are evident pockets in which the air gets warm and stays comparatively warm, even when winter is temporarily in evidence elsewhere. A very intelligent observer who lives on White Oak Mountain told us that "Thermal Belt" in his observation was plainly a question of air drainage. Let the scientists settle the question as they may, the little resort town rejoices in much sunshine and has a good measure of what passes in the salutations of the street for "real Tryon weather!" The community of visitors in the town has a distinct literary flavor. During our sojourn rather more than twenty characters of some fame in the world of letters were in evidence. Southern hospitality seems immediately to affect them; in banking terms they become liquid and circulate freely. This effect we concluded was due to the patrician atmosphere which real Southerners seem able to create. Perhaps it is only snobs after all who fear the contamination of the crowd! In any event, Tryon's resources of climate and scenery are greatly enhanced by the natural friendliness of the community. Mountaineers are not specially prominent; some of them are to be seen daily delivering produce or wood, but at the end of the week there is a picturesque crowd assembled on Trade Street. Some of these, even women and children, have walked often as far as nine and sometimes as far as eighteen miles; mostly they have come on mule-back or in the "mountain schooner." This is a regular sheet-covered wagon, but in order to "navigate" where projecting branches are in the way it is built on a very cramped pattern. Usually in addition to sundry produce for exchange it contains a good supply of corn fodder for the mule. One needs some tact in showing interest in these people and in their motley loads, but it is an unceasing item of interest at Tryon. Men and women both know life by first-hand contact, their lithe bodies and somewhat hardened faces bespeak exposure, but their independence of manner is unmistakable. They are not candidates for curiosity or sympathy. One must learn other approaches than these to their fastnesses, else there will be "no admission." Kephart represents the type as an arrested development. These men and women are probably very like our great-great-grand parents. Once in rapport with them, we can open doors not a few into early eighteenth century life in the colonies. That is not the most interesting part of it. Immediately one gains admission to their circle he discovers, if from Pennsylvania, that the names are those that he has known from childhood. Pursuing lines of evidence like this Kephart shows that these Highlanders actually emigrated from the Keystone State.

(To be concluded.)

THE CHAMBERLIN BILL.

Stanley R. Yarnall, on behalf of the Peace Committee, has written very clearly and forcibly to Senator Chamberlain in regard to Senate Bill No. 1675.

Pointing out that the exemption in Section 25 does not meet many conscientious objections, he says:

"The whole history of the Society of Friends, so far as it has to do with war, proves that there are always found in it a large number of individuals who cannot conscientiously take any part, even in the non-combatant branches of the military and naval service.

"At the present time there are many instances of this in England and hundreds of Friends and other conscientious objectors are now undergoing longer or shorter terms of imprisonment for this very reason. We feel, therefore, that unless the exemption is made complete, there will be a great many embarrassing and distressing cases because persons refuse to violate their conscience in this regard."

The letter continues:

"I imagine the United States Senate does not wish to propose, while our country is still at peace and without such provocation as Great Britain has, a more drastic law than the Act of Parliament, and that there is no desire on the part of those who are behind the proposed act to make it oppressive. May I not, therefore, ask you to take into careful consideration, if the Act is to come up in this Congress, amendments that will cover the points I have raised?

"The word 'creed' in Section 34, and also in Section 4, is one that may prove troublesome if taken literally, because many branches of the Society of Friends do not have any formulated creed.

"May I also ask whether Section 11 as it stands will not exempt from a number of positions of trust or profit those who are members of the Society of Friends? There are serving and have served on important Governmental Commissions a number of able and broad-minded Quakers who can be illy spared from public service, and it would be most unfortunate if, in the future, they and other men of similar beliefs and of broad public spirit are debared from such activities as those covered in Section 11."

The following is a postscript to the letter:

"P. S.—I feel I should say on the part of the Society of Friends, whom I am representing in this letter, that we are opposed to the whole bill and trust that it may not be pressed, since we believe that it is unnecessary and that its influence will be to develop in our country a military caste and a military system that are hostile to Republican institutions, and subversive of the true spirit of democracy. I mention these arguments of a general nature apart from the reasons which have convinced us throughout the history of our Society that all war, and consequently all preparation for war, are directly opposed to the teaching of Jesus."

TO THE MEMBERS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING

This great Republic is so seriously threatened by the forces of militarism that we feel it our duty to spread broadcast among the members of our Yearly Meeting the facts concerning two proposed measures of Federal legislation.

The first has to do with compulsory military training for the young men of the country, the second with the censorship of the press as proposed by the War College.

The Compulsory Training Bill (S. 1695) or the Chamberlain Bill, as it is commonly known, has been reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. Some of its provisions are as follows:

"That every male person (a) who is a citizen of the United States or (b) who has made a declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States shall, except as provided herein, undergo military or naval training as prescribed by the President for a period of six months during the calendar year in which he reaches the age of nineteen years, or, if not then within the description of either (a) or (b) of this section, in the calendar year in which he first comes within such description or in the year immediately following."

"That there shall be exempted from training (a) members of the permanent military or naval forces of the United States; and (b) persons physically unfit for any military or naval service whatever; and (c) persons on whose earnings a father, mother, brother, sister, wife, or child is wholly dependent for support."

"That members of any religious sect or organization now organized and existing whose creed forbids its members to bear arms in war shall not be required to undergo training in the bearing or use of arms, but shall be trained in the non-combatant branches of the military or naval service."

"That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall hire, engage, employ, or continue to employ, any person up to the age of twenty-eight years who is or has been liable to be trained under this Act, unless he has a certificate of training or an unexpired certificate of temporary exemption or a certificate of permanent exemption from training."

According to press dispatches, the army general staff is not satisfied with this Bill and proposes that the minimum training shall be for a year and not for six months only.

The Chamberlain Bill will probably not come to a vote before Congress adjourns, unless a war crisis should develop. It is our belief, however, that each of us would do well to hold himself in readiness to exert influence against this autocratic, militaristic measure should occasion arise. If the measure does not come up for consideration during this Congress, it will surely do so during the next. The Society of Friends faces a crisis that may test to the utmost its loyalty to its age-long Peace-testimony and to Christian principles.

The Press Censorship Bill has been drafted by the War College Division of the Army General Staff. It has not yet been introduced into Congress. They appear to be awaiting a favorable time, such as the heat of a crisis, in which to rush it through. The Bill provides:

"That whenever in his judgment the defense of the country requires such action, the President may issue a proclamation prohibiting the publication of all news referring to the armed forces of the Government or the means and measures that may be contemplated for defense of the country, except when such publication shall have been duly authorized, and he may issue such regulations as may be necessary to render such prohibition effective.

"That after the President shall have issued such proclamation as is authorized by Section 1 of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to publish or cause or procure to be published, or to assist in the publication of any information, facts, rumors, or news prohibited by the terms of the proclamation or regulations issued under this Act, except when such publication shall have been duly authorized under such regulations, and any person who so offends may be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by a term of imprisonment of not more than three years, or both."

The central fact that emerges from a consideration of this Bill is that during the period of war, all discussion of the war or of War in general will be prohibited without the consent of the military censor.

The two proposed measures strike at the very heart of our democracy. It is well-nigh inconceivable that it is America in which we are living. It is a time of testing, of decision. We are thankful for the glorious example of faithfulness on the part of English Friends. May we, when the test comes, know ourselves to be grounded upon the true rock of Christianity, to the end that we may bear witness to the truth at whatever cost.

AT EVENING.

[The late Dr. Silas Weir Mitchell wrote these lines in the guest-book of the University of Chicago, and they are printed in the University Record—

I know the night is near at hand,
The mist lies low on hill and bay,
The autumn leaves are drifting by,
But I have had the day.

Yes, I have had, dear Lord, the day;
When at Thy call I have the night,
Brief be the twilight as I pass
From light to dark—from dark to light.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

A LESSON IN MANNERS.—In a quaint volume written by Lady Tsao about A. D., 125, are found the following instructions to Chinese women and girls of her time:

All girls, everywhere,
Should learn woman's work.
When women guests are expected,
You should the chairs arrange in order.
Let your own dress be neat and suitable.
Slowly and lightly walk;
Move not your hands about;
And let your voice be gentle and low.
With such deportment
Invite your guests to enter:
Present your salutations,
Inquiring after their welfare since last you met.
In conversation with them
Talk not at random.
When they questions ask or answer,
Give most polite attention.
In asking of their welfare,
Or talking of yourself, in a low voice speak;
The tea and refreshments carefully prepare.
Politely receive guests,
And exhaust courtesy when they depart.

THE LAW OF SELF-HELP.—One of the best law students in a certain university is a young man twenty-two years of age who is totally blind. He lost his sight when a young boy, but that he did not lose his courage is proved by his subsequent life. His working creed, if we may so call it, is worth passing on:

"I try not to be too dependent, for what I find out for myself, I am going to know for all time. I want to stand on my own merits. It is no reason why less should be required of me because I am blind; I want to merit all credit I get. I want to behave as nearly like a sighted person as possible."

He has set his own high law of ignoring his handicap, and prefers that his companions shall ignore it also. He is resolved that it shall not dominate his life. In the light of such a brave, strong spirit, how cowardly and contemptible seem many of the complaints and excuses so frequently offered!—Forward.

IN THE BEGINNING.—Scientists are realizing that under their whirling dynamos, their searching microscopes, their elaborate laboratories, is something that makes it all go—something that they take on faith, and something which they are beginning to see they cannot understand. All paths lead to God, and in accounting for the universe, it does not matter whether we call Him "God" or the "Great First Cause."

"In the beginning," says the Bible; and back of those three words neither science nor religion ever has been able to go. When Christ came, He gave the world a new vision of life and of eternity, a new hope. He gave to the world a Father, all-powerful but all-tender, the Creator of untold millions of worlds, but the watchful Guardian of the little child and the helpless bird. Christ did not explain the mystery of creation. What would it have availed? Who could have understood? But he brought us the future instead of the past. Scientist or Christian, we come to the place where there is nothing left but faith.—Forward.

NEWS ITEMS.

THERE has been deposited in the Advancement headquarters on the third floor of the Philadelphia Young Friends' Association Building, 140 N. Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia, several copies of English papers and pamphlets dealing with conscientious objectors and with peace sentiment in England, which it is very difficult to secure in this country on account of the war.

These include a complete set of the Tribunal from Third Month to Tenth Month, 1916, several numbers of the Cambridge Magazine, publications of the Union of Democratic Control, the Community of Nations, Reports of Friends' Relief Work, and other material of great interest.

These have been placed in the Advancement headquarters in order to be available for all Friends who are interested to examine them, and callers for this purpose will be welcomed.

THE Journal of Education for the 8th prints liberal selections from the leaflet issued by our Peace Committee on Military Training for School Boys and shows itself in an editorial actively opposed in saying, "It did seem as though the school world had troubles enough on hand without the terrors of military training discussion."

THE following is reported from Concord Quarterly Meeting:—
TO THE PRESIDENT, MEDIA, PENNA., Second Month 13, 1917.
Washington, D. C.:

Concord Quarterly Meeting of Friends, in session at Media, Pa., gratefully appreciate thy efforts to maintain peace, and respectfully urge thee to continue to use every means in thy power, seeking Divine guidance, to avoid war.

As a body of Christian men, who believe that all war is contrary to the spirit and teaching of our Master, we shun no share of the burden, reproach and suffering that may come to us individually or as a nation, by the refusal to be drawn into war, because we believe that even now Christian methods of reason, patience and good-will, will secure the ends of justice and honor, more effectively than war.

Signed for the Meeting, JOHN D. CARTER, Clerk.

FOR many years the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia has sent annually one or more boxes of useful articles to the workers in Japan. Those interested are urgently requested to make donations for the boxes to be forwarded early in Ninth Month.

The needed articles are white cotton and woolen dress patterns, Turkish and tea towels, outing flannel, sewing cotton, pins of various kinds, and sewing needles, curios for the museum, illustrated books for children, dressed dolls and work bags. The contributions should be distinctly marked with the name of the donor and the value of each article indicated, and should be sent to the Box Committee at Friends' Institute, No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, or to the Chairman of the Box Committee in the local Branch. Postals will not be sent this year as formerly. The box closes Eighth Month 31, 1917.

Gifts of money will be especially acceptable and may be sent to Emily B. Stokes, Superintendent, No. 1504 Locust Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE buildings of the New York Yearly Meeting School, known as The Oakwood Seminary, having been partially destroyed by fire prior to Second Month 14th, at that date the Permanent Board of the Yearly Meeting spent three hours discussing the outlook. It was decided to continue the School, and nineteen Friends, of whom Charles W. Lawrence is Clerk, were appointed to formulate plans for "the enlargement of the School in plant and equipment and to raise in the Yearly Meeting a sum of money sufficient to carry such plans into effect."

THE following is reprinted from the Ledger without any editing. The writer is not a member with Friends. His brave words will have a place for good we feel sure.—[Eds.]

THE BISHOP'S RESOLUTION.

To the Editor of Public Ledger:

SIR—It was with deep disappointment that I read in the Public Ledger the resolution proposed by the Bishop of Pennsylvania urging universal military training. While we can agree with the Bishop that every citizen should support the President in his effort to avert war, it does seem incomprehensible, at least to one layman, how a bishop who in his high office is supposed to interpret the mind of the founder of Christianity can advocate the adoption of a system which in 5000 years of the world's history has proved an utter failure and is in direct contradiction to the gospel of good-will which Christ so distinctly taught.

Is it not true that the fundamental teaching of Christ is that God is a God of love—not violence or force—that we can only serve Him as we serve—not harm—our neighbor, and that only when men everywhere learn the spirit of love and self-sacrifice will the world become the home of law, justice, brotherhood and peace?

HENRY H. COLLINS, JR.

BRVN MAWR, February 19, 1917.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Perhaps a few signed testimonies as to our individual peace views may be useful to the younger readers of THE FRIEND. If thou sees a service in such, I believe the following represents my convictions at present, which are of course always open to change by persuasion.

I believe that love is the most useful force in the world. I am influenced more by others who assist, persuade and sympathize with me than by those who oppose, compel or antagonize me. I believe other people are most influenced likewise and therefore I believe good-will is more influential than compulsion. I believe that God has a father's love toward man, and that all human beings are equally His children. I cannot take the life of any child of God, even though my own physical life be surrendered in the endeavor to do good to others. My brethren who take part in war willingly sacrifice not only their own lives, but, often with more agony, the lives and happiness of their wives and children. I hope I am as courageous; I am sure my dear ones are as willing to endure suffering if necessary for the sake of others.

But I do not claim devotion to good-will altogether unselfishly, although I hope I might be able to do so. It seems to me plain that an attitude of consistent good-will, will yield the greatest protection. It does not insure harmlessness. Love's martyrs are its greatest heroes. But neither do antagonism and hate, or force of arms insure against harm. With the story of unharmed gentle Quakers and missionaries among savages written in history the world over; with the cordial response to kindness in every man and woman I meet and to whom I suceed in showing kindness, I prefer to take my chances and to entrust my dear ones to the protection of good-will, at home, in the community, in the world, than to rely upon physical force exercised on behalf of selfishness which has produced distress for some of my contemporaries, quite as severe as the sufferings of any gentle victims of whom I have heard.

I believe that in the conduct of eternal affairs God has as a chief minister Jesus Christ, also an eternal person, whose attitude toward men is one of infinite affection and with whom I may be intimate. I believe that His counsel to me is to serve my brethren, to love not to hate them. As long as the family, the State and the nation to which I belong desire my service for such purposes I want gladly to assist. Otherwise loyalty to my Divine Master must take precedence over any other loyalty. I believe the family, the State and the nation which recognizes the merit of this choice will prove to be the most useful and the longest-lived.

J. PASSMORE ELKINTON.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—Advocates of the abolition of capital punishment may participate in a State-wide movement to present their arguments indirectly to the State Legislature through the hearings which will be held on the bill introduced by Representative Edward W. Wells, of this city, to abolish the death penalty. The public discussion will take place in Room 453, City Hall, at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the 2nd. This hearing is the first of similar meetings, the others to be held at Harrisburg and Pittsburgh.

Herbert C. Hoover, Chairman of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, was honored by the University of Pennsylvania at the University Day exercises on the 22nd with the degree of Doctor of Laws. H. C. Hoover is a graduate of Leland Stanford University, California.

With choice Pennsylvania and New York potatoes retailing at $4 a bushel at the stalls in the Reading Terminal Market and leading stores, housekeepers were paying the highest prices quoted in a century in Philadelphia, it was said. Food riots developed in New York and Philadelphia and the subject has been taken up by the Federal authorities.

James H. Dix, Superintendent of the Vacant Lots Association, says that $500,000 could be saved by our citizens by raising vegetables on the vacant land within the city limits. On the 100 acres which the Vacant Lots Association has at its disposal, crops to the value of $30,000 were produced last summer.

New York's new horsemeat market has had many customers. Tenderloins are sold at 15 cents a pound, porterhouse steaks at 12 cents a pound, sirloin cuts and rounds are also 12 cents a pound, chuck is 8 cents a pound, and other cuts in proportion.

Helen C. Alexander, who is the daughter of Richard Cadbury, of Birmingham, England, told in Philadelphia how she inaugurated the Pocket Testament League, among her girl friends in the high school. In 1908, when Torrey and Alexander conducted their evangelistic campaign in this city, the movement became world-wide. Since that time 2,000,000 copies have been distributed.

In the New York Times and in other papers an advertisement has been inserted by the Friends' National Peace Committee, whose headquarters are at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. The advertisement asserts that "the people of every land are longing for the time when love shall conquer hate," and that as war destroys the "spirit of brotherhood which is humanity's greatest possession, it is humanity's greatest foe."

GENERAL.—A big freeze reported from Florida started on the night of Second Month 2nd. It has probably caused a total money loss exceeding that of 1895, but individual losses are not so large except in a few cases. The cold wave came on the crest of a howling northwest gale. The temperature ranged from 34 degrees at 6 p. m. to 22 degrees at 6 o'clock the next morning. Finally the temperature dropped from 32 degrees to 17 degrees, as reported from the Orlando neighborhood.

Beginning in the autumn of 1917, Leland Stanford University will be open the year round.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons on the 20th, addresses were made by Arthur Ponsonby, Charles P. Trevelyan, Philip Snowden and other pacifists, the tenor of their speeches being that the Entente Allies were pursuing a war of conquest and reproaching the Government for its failure to respond to the German peace overture.

The Decal Association, backed by the influence of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, Great Britain's consuls in foreign countries and her colonies, at this critical juncture in the empire is seeking to have the Government adopt the decimal monetary system now in use in virtually all the other civilized countries of the world.

When the Empress of Russia learned that the American Sunday-school scholars, were with their nickels sending tens of thousands of Testaments and Gospels to Russian soldiers through the World's Sunday-school Association, she was so moved and delighted that she asked that her thirteen-year-old son, the future Czar of Russia, should be united with these American Sunday-school children in the gift. And so, upon the first page of all these Testaments, is an inscription which says to the soldier that the Testament is presented to him in the name of the American Sunday-school scholar and his imperial highness, the Czarévitch. The Empress sent twenty thousand of these testaments in her own special train to the soldiers at the front.

BE YE STEADFAST.

"With malice toward none, with charity toward all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us . . . do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

So spake our Lincoln in his proving hour.
Brothers, our time has come, do we speak so?
True to the highest, though not there, we know,
May lie the road to present wealth and power;
True to the highest, though the fierce clouds lower
And over us their blighting shadows throw
Of hatred and unutterable woe;
True to the highest, to our high soul's dower?

Oh, let us not, in passion or in fear,
Join the wild orgy of this blood-mad day!
Behold, God's spirit, infinitely near,
Years that we seek the true and higher way;
Yea, as He leads us, bring to earth again,
Justice and love and brotherhood of men.

—ESTHER MORTON SMITH.

ENDURANCE.

For "THE FRIEND."

It is written of Elizabeth Fry that in her earlier years, under the consecrated enthusiasm of youth, she learned how to do the will of God and that in her old age she learned the far harder lesson of enduring His will. All of which is a message for us at this present time.

When all organized effort for peace and against war and the Spirit of War has had its place, when our Committees have fulfilled their calling to let our light shine across the tumult of our national life,—when we have been heard in public places and in Washington itself,—then it is fitting that we should remember the great grace of enduring fortitude. Without bitterness or clamor or evil speaking or malice, it may be our part in the Providence of God to stand simply with faith and courage with the "earnest purity of the girded loins and the burning lamp." Out of this Spirit is born the hope that maketh not ashamed, and love that wearies not but rests upon Christ and so resting partakes of the Bread and Water of life.

We were reminded during the dark days of the Civil War that the terrible saying of Anne of Austria to Cardinal Richelieu "holds good of mercy as well as of judgment"—"my Lord Cardinal,—God does not pay at the end of every week but at the last He pays."

Let us ask of Him the grace to abide His time and to endure as well as to do His blessed will.

GEORGE M. WARNER.

"DO NOT LEAVE OFF TRYING."

We are living in an age which idolizes physical force. The military and naval experts have succeeded in persuading the majority of men that physical force is the foundation of government, that national power can be best expressed in terms of naval tonnage, that national treasures can be most surely secured by explosives and guns. It was fifty-four years ago that Bismarck uttered his memorable words—that the great questions of state must be settled by a policy of blood and iron. And for a half century the nations have been collecting the iron and now they are furnishing the blood. The Christian who stands up to utter his Christian faith finds himself in Pilate's hall. Above him tower the august and haughty hierarchy of the military and naval experts, and when the Christian speaks, Pilate sneers. But what is the Christian to do? He can do what Jesus did, he can say what Jesus said: "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world that I might bear witness unto the truth" that God is love, that all men are His children, that all men are potentially brothers, and that the everlasting kingdom is a kingdom of good-will.

We believe that love works in the home and in the school and in the Church and in society. We must believe that it will work in the realm of international life when once we enthrone it there. To enthrone it is a herculean task. It cannot be done except by earnest effort and long continued toil and loving sacrifice. But blessed are the peace makers, not the peace wishers or the peace dreamers or the peace theorists, but the peace makers. To-day they are laughed at and derided, to-morrow they will be acclaimed as the sons of the Most High. The obstacles are many, and the heart sometimes faints, but they who persevere to the end shall be counted victors. The great French Socialist Jaurès, in a conversation with President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University, discussed the prospects of peace. For years Jaurès had been working for peace, and now at last the great war came. But Jaurès was not disconcerted. His last words to President Butler were: "Do not leave off trying. No matter what the difficulties are, never leave off trying." In a few days Jaurès was dead, but although dead he yet speaks, and often through the days and nights I can hear him pleading—"Never leave off trying!"—CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, in "What the War is Teaching."

TILL THEN.

Giver of every perfect gift and good,
Who ne'er hath failed Thy children asking food
In lowly faith and humble trust of Thee,
Hear now, O Lord, while we present our plea.

O give us of Thy wisdom and Thy strength,
That we may win to victory at length,
That we, being armored by Thy mighty power,
May conquerors prove through all life's little hour.

Yet keep us humble lest we fail to see
The thing that shall exalt be by Thee;
When heart and mind would judge, be with us then,
And grant us love unto our fellow-men.

Draw nigh to us, and draw us nigh, O God.
That others seeing by which path we trod
May rise, take heart and following may find
The Christ they seek, the Saviour of mankind.

O give us patience, hold our vision high,
For it may be Thy coming draweth nigh;
Till then, our soul's deep need, Thy spirit's sword,
Thy wisdom, patience, and Thy strength, O Lord!

FRIENDS AND WAR.

ISAAC SHARPLESS.

A noted Protestant divine said just before the beginning of the great war, "We are all Quakers on the peace question now." The inference was that the development of Christian thought had brought all bodies into substantial agreement as to the discordance of war and New Testament morality. He would probably not state the matter so strongly now, for the teaching from Christian pulpits has greatly changed in emphasis and partly in direct statement from that of three years ago.

If he meant that peace was a normal Christian virtue and that war was a great but sometimes necessary evil there would be no great disagreement, but if he meant as the Quakers have always officially maintained that war, even for a just cause, was wrong according to the New Testament standards, and that no one with these standards could consistently engage in it or support it or that which ministered to it, it would seem that he would now be endorsed by only a minority, perhaps a small minority, of Christendom.

Friends have not been unaware of the difficulties of their position in this respect. On the occasion of every war, into which the country of their residence has entered, they have come into conflict with popular opinion and generally with legislation. They have been fined, imprisoned, and been targets of public abuse. They have been practically driven out of the Continent of Europe. While respected in England in times of peace and elected to Parliament and many mayoralities, much out of proportion to their numbers, when war has opened, their houses have been stoned by the populace and themselves jailed, and their properties distrained by officials. In Australia and New Zealand Quaker youth have been in prison because they would not submit to military drill. In America, in the Revolutionary War, their sufferings were severe in the province which they founded, and in the Civil War on both sides there were men who gave up their liberties and property and in some cases, at least in the South, their lives, rather than obey military commands. Should the New York legislation, or compulsory military drill and service of any sort become permanent and general, these conditions will probably be repeated in our country.

It has, however, been more often from local officials and popular prejudice than from governmental heads who understood the situation that their troubles have come. It was with the sincere respect as well as the regret of Gladstone and his Cabinet that the resignation of John Bright, because he wished to protest against the bombardment of Alexandria, was received by his associates. The protest against the Boer War of later date by Quakers led to no permanent loss of influence, but rather the reverse. At the present time the laws of the realm do probably all they can for "conscientious objectors," but the local administrators of them have often made it difficult for the intended easements to be received.

Prominent Philadelphia Friends were banished to Virginia during the War of the Revolution. Fines, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, were collected and not a few Friends were rather savagely imprisoned. Washington, however, understood the situation and did what he could, and when the war was over and the same Friends sent him their congratulations on his accession to the presidency in 1789 and their best personal wishes for himself and his "respectable consort," he replied in terms of confidence:

"Your principles and conduct are well known to me and it is doing the people called Quakers no more than justice, that (except their declining to share with others the burdens of common defence) there is no denomination among us who are more exemplary and useful citizens. . . . I assure you that, in my opinion, the conscientious scruples of all men should be treated with all delicacy and tenderness."

Lincoln, who knew Friends well and appreciated their scruples and who carried in his pocket to the day of his death a letter from a much esteemed Friend, and Stanton who was brought up among them, did what they could for them during the Civil War, for they were well aware, both in the North and South, of their uncompromising loyalty to freedom and the Union as well as their uncompromising devotion to peace.

But the usual criticism, often kindly meant, is that their views are beautiful and idealistic, suited to the millennial future, but that they "won't work." Of course, they stand for a venture, and no one who has not faith in a principle of which he cannot possibly foresee the practical developments, will care to follow them. Things that are right generally do "work" better than a doubting world expects. There is some inherent vitality in truth which carries it through. What these critics mean is that so far as they can see the disciples of idealism or their friends will have to suffer. This may be true, but sometimes suffering is the best advocacy of a cause and most readily brings it to practical triumph and a general belief in its availability. The blood of the martyrs is the seed not only of the church but of many a moral and social movement. To do the right thing as one can see it at his clearest moments and accept the consequences, is probably about as near the best as we can know.

An English Quaker was recently brought before a local official as a "conscientious objector" to ascertain his claim to exemption from military service. "What would you do if the Germans attacked your wife or mother," he was asked. His answer was something like this: "Let me first ask you another question. If you were in the army and the bearer of important despatches, which a superior officer had bidden you to deliver without delay for any cause, and a German attacked your wife or mother, what would YOU do?" "I should have to obey my superiors." "I, too, have my higher orders," the Friend replied.

This brings out a Quaker objection to the whole military system. The system demands the quenching of personality, the destruction of the individual conscience. "Their's not to reason why." As the Kaiser is reported to have said to a body of young recruits after they were mustered in: "You are now my soldiers, you have given yourselves to me body and soul. There is but one enemy for you and that is my enemy. It may happen that I shall order you to fire on your brothers and fathers. But in such a case you are bound to obey me without a murmur."

The military men of our country might not put it quite so baldly as this, but unquestioning obedience is the root of army discipline. If you are commanded to run your bayonet through an opponent, to ravage a country and leave its women and children to starve, to sink a liner with its non-combatants, to blow up a whole regiment with all the unimaginable cruelties of warfare, you obey as part of a system, and if there is any personal protest in your heart it must be quenched with the thought that the commands of a superior are imperative. When you put on a military uniform, all the acts which are punished as crimes in civil life—murder, theft, pillage, the maiming and desolation of humanity—become not only excusable acts, but virtues. The end justifies the means. If good comes the same acts cease to be evil.

But the Quaker's conscience has not so worked, and he has declined to yield it to the behest of any man, when his own sense of duty seems clear, whatever dress his officer may wear, or with whatever human authority he may be clothed. He would accord the same liberty to others. If he sees a man with a strong sense of patriotic or Christian duty make the supreme offering of home and business, yielding his life to the risks of battle and the tremendous sacrifice of trench life in Flanders or France, he has nothing but honor and respect for his motives however much he may object to his philosophy of life.

He cannot forget that one of the motives which brought the Puritan and Baptist to New England, the Quaker to the Middle Colonies, the Catholic to Maryland, and the Huguenots to the South, was to secure the liberty of the individual conscience in matters of worship and conduct. He cannot understand the argument which calls universal military training democratic, or a historical descendant of the original American idea, for it seems to him that when a man commits his will and conscience into the keeping of a human system to achieve even worthy results by immoral means, he violates one of the essential principles which the colonists sought to uphold, and which is engrained most imperishably into the great papers of Revolutionary and post-Revolutionary days. Every sane and reasonable conscience has a right to exist and be received with respect. The state or any other institution may also feel it necessary in some ways to circumscribe the personal conscience, but it should be done as it has been done in America with great caution. Our unwillingness to trouble consciences by enforcing any sort of religious instruction in schools supported by public taxes, is but one of many instances where the separation of church and state, the personal liberty not to be disturbed by secular arrangements in matters of religion, has created a sense of freedom which grates against the bondage of militarism.

There may be for such a "conscientious objector" a conflict of loyalties, to his sense of duty on the one hand and to the state on the other. Some will choose the former and decline to yield to military requisition, basing their action on obedience to "the higher law."

Our American ideas of liberty have, in the main, "worked." They have passed out of the stage of idealism to that of practical utility. The "rights of man" of early days have become the beneficent methods of living and are received without question. Peace ideals have had no such triumphant career. They have quietly modified policies and in spite of the present outlook, or perhaps working through present conditions the most of us expect them to become operative and practical in the future.

But more than this. Some nation (and why not the United States?) should open up the policy of generous and aggressive good-will to other nations. More than a rigid enforcement of treaties and the absence of territorial or commercial aggression are needed. One cannot tell just what could be done, but a certain sort of thing might be feasible under present conditions in this country. An army of sanitary engineers, educational and farming experts, medical advisers and other helpful agencies sent into Mexico would cost far less than the most successful invasion by armed forces with hostile intent, and be a far more permanent insurance of peace. If done intelligently by the willing co-operation of the two governments and at their joint expense, the feeling of Mexicans toward us, which has been festering since 1848, would be removed to our mutual advantage.

There seems to be an opinion in certain quarters that we will continue our nagging policy towards the Japanese till ill-feeling develops into war, and that we should make tremendous preparations for this emergency. Would it not be a better safeguard to stop so much of this treatment as lies in our power and develop friendship rather than enmity? For it is evident that co-operation on the Pacific rather than competition of a destructive kind would be of mutual advantage.

When the present war is over there will still be great want and suffering in Europe. Would two dreadnoughts, costing, say, forty millions of dollars, or the same money appropriated by our government to enable the countries, without regard to nationality, to recover from the ravages of war, be a more efficient security against a future attack from the English or German navy?

We are justly satisfied with the return of the Boxer indemnity to China, and the return of her independence to Cuba. If our country could consistently adopt such a generous policy as a permanent contribution to world diplomacy and international relations at the cost of a tithe of the money and energy now expended upon physical armed preparedness, what would follow? Who can doubt the contagion of the example, even though through some misconception and criticism? Would it not be a tremendous contribution to the honor of our nation and the peace and prosperity of the world which would result? As in individual affairs, honor and trust and fairness beget the same in return, so would a world public opinion demand them as it now demands the fulfillment of arbitral awards.

These are questions of government but there is plenty also for private efforts to accomplish. Those who object to military service are under obligation not to allow their scruples to become an excuse for non-action and freedom from sacrifice. At the beginning of the war a number of young Englishmen, feeling the spirit of loyalty which was driving so many of their associates into the ranks, and holding views something like those expressed in this paper, a majority of whom were Quakers, entered voluntarily into the work of relief, accepting the expense and personal risk involved. In the autumn of 1914, after some months of preliminary training at Jordans, the burial place of William Penn, a party of forty-three left for Dunkirk, which has since been the headquarters of the Friends' Ambulance Unit. Reinforced by many others from England and a few from America, they had in Third Month, 1916, about seven hundred volunteer workers, with over one hundred motor ambulances, which they drive into the firing line to render medical relief, surgical assistance, and first aid to the wounded, not without risk and some fatalities for themselves. Their hospitals in France and England, one hospital ship and a floating barge on the French canals contain some eight hundred beds. Of the whole company six doctors and six others only are paid, the rest have left their business and receive only food and lodging. The whole expense is borne by voluntary subscriptions from their brethren at home and in America.

The aid does not all go to soldiers. The civil population of Flanders, behind the allied lines, has been fed and clothed by the same agencies, the orphans cared for, the industries set on foot to provide self-support, milk depots established, typhoid fever stamped out, houses cleansed and the water purified.

Another organization of men and women followed up the retreating Germans along the Marne and helped the residents to recover from the devastations of the battles and marches of the two armies. Small wooden houses were set up in place of those burned or battered to pieces, seed was provided for the farms and gardens, and heart put into many dismayed lives. Many a French village will long remember with gratitude the labors of "Les Amis."

Nor is their help confined to the allies. When the war broke out thousands of German residents of England were interned in camps, lest there should be among them German spies.

Without occupation, forcibly withdrawn from their homes and business, crowded into narrow quarters with the simplest provisions, they were detained under conditions which were pitiable. The Friends found work for them, sold their manufactured goods, brought families together, and wherever possible ameliorated their camp surroundings.

Others, with the assent of the German authorities, saw that homeless girls were transported into Germany and English girls returned. Thousands of Belgian refugees were found homes in well-to-do English families, personal and financial aid was sent to the Italian and Servian fronts, and Syria and Armenia, so far as Turkish arrangements permitted, were assisted.

The rate of expenditure at last accounts amounted to about $40,000 per month and was increasing with the exigencies of warfare.

It is by such methods that the English Quakers are satisfying the demands of their consciences for patriotic service to their country and their brethren abroad on both sides of the fighting lines. If their country demands other service which seems to them to make them recreant to their principles, they will refuse to render it and quietly take the consequences.

FROM AN ENGLISH LETTER.

[Although not written at all for publication we take it there will be no breach of confidence in printing the following extracts from a personal letter, written from the Lake District. The realities of war times in a quiet Quaker home are brought out in a way to bring us all into deep feeling.—Eds.]

Third of Eleventh Month.

We hardly dared to write our friends in this country a Happy New Year, for indeed the outlook is very dark. We greatly admire your President's address to Congress, but I fear it has made little impression in the country generally. There will have to be a change in the attitude of mind of the people here, before they will consider peace. Admiral Beatty, one of the admirals of the fleet, is reported to have said, "Until religious revival takes place at home, just so long will the war continue. . . . When England can look out on the future with humbler eyes, and a prayer on her lips, then we can begin to count the days toward the end."

We don't know what the blockade by submarines will effect, but already we have lost so many merchant ships, that supplies are greatly curtailed. We have been using "war flour" since the New Year came in, now we are told we must limit the use of flour to four pounds, sugar to three-quarter pound and meat to two pounds per week. If we do not do it voluntarily, we shall be compelled to do so. The very severe weather we are having makes us more hungry and the very poor must suffer greatly. Our Friends in London in the "Emergency Committee" (with whom Anna C. and Henrietta Thomas are working) are indefatigable in giving relief and must have saved many lives by the distribution of milk, malt and cod-liver oil. . . . A very great many trains have been taken off, to the great inconvenience of people generally [this is mentioned as an explanation of a sister's six-mile walk through the snow to give a lecture on Fear in the Friends' meeting-house]. Two reasons have been given; one is that the engines are being sent to France; the other that the engines are in a bad state of repair, and there are no skilled men left to repair them. We have had an unusually long spell of frost and snow lately and a fresh fall of snow last night. The mountains are most beautiful, but walking is difficult for some of us, even with goshes on—and yet the only satisfactory way to keep warm is by exercise. [After some allusion to quite inexplicable work of the Censor the letter concludes:]

Shall we ever again enjoy the civil and religious liberty we considered our right before the war? We have indeed fallen upon evil times.

THE mere habit of trying our best in all things will help us, by God's grace, to serve Him with our best.—J. KEBLE.

REVELATION.

How many homes the village held
I knew not till from miles
Across the vale at dusk I saw
The homelights cheery smiles.

And only at life's twilight fall
Do we with truth divine
How with a friendly beckoning
The many lovelights shine.

"HAVE WE OUTGROWN WAR?"

With the title, "Have We Outgrown War?" Francis King Carey has made a notable communication to the New York Evening Post. We quote herewith the concluding paragraphs:

"Two considerations are bound to have a profound influence upon the final judgment of the American people if the declaration of war is delayed long enough. The first is that it may be gravely questioned whether our people have not outgrown war. There has spread over this country an extraordinary spirit of social democracy, accompanied with the growth of a sense of personal responsibility. It is no easy matter suddenly to turn a nation which has displayed a zeal to lessen suffering, to promote the passage of child-labor laws, to work for minimum wages and shorter hours for adult males and females to the task of killing and maiming their fellow-men.

"The second consideration is that two years of warfare, resulting in unheard of cruelty and human torture, have left our people with no misunderstanding of what war means. Will not even the patrons and patronesses of war concede that there is doubt about the need of this country for that spirit of idealism and unselfishness of which they claim war and war-hatred are the benign parents? Is it not more likely that our people at war would be a people arrested for years in the greatest progress towards generous and humane social conduct that the world's history has yet recorded?"

Everywhere in the South the Negro population is in evidence, and one does not need to probe beneath the surface to perceive that there are many unsolved problems. In one locality the industrial situation may be acute, in another the social; always racial difference and feeling can be observed. The average white Southerner has two ineffaceable convictions in regard to the whole subject. The first is that the South has understood the Negro (their real understanding is disclosed in the way they spell Negro). The second conviction is, that the North has failed entirely to understand or to deal properly with the problems arising from the association of the two races. In the last decade both of these convictions have grown mightily in the North. As a corrective of them we could wish nothing better than that the thoughtful Northerner could reside occasionally in the South. He would then not unlikely conclude that both he and his Southern brother have need to revise their views on this important subject. Years ago (perhaps forty) Mary Ann Marriage Allen of London Yearly Meeting was a visitor under religious concern to our country. She applied her practical thinking to the race problem, and she is still remembered in Friendly circles of Philadelphia for her condemnation of the general apathy toward most crying race needs. In Asheville, N. C., her feelings found expression in the establishment of a Training Home School for Colored Children. It is still a flourishing institution bearing her name, but now under the management of a Methodist association. Her fundamental idea was one toward which there is still both North and South unlimited apathy. Stated in baldest terms, the situation that wrenched the feelings of our English Friend so sorely is this: Something more than a million colored people of the South are living to-day in cabins that an average up-to-date farmer would regard as inadequate shelters for his stock. It is easy to say the race is shiftless, that these untoward conditions do not produce unhappiness, and that "as animals" (still a phrase much heard in the South) they seem to thrive in these cabins. The unquestioned point is that conditions no worse than these, far removed from our doors, are most appealing causes for missionary work. If we could only feel as strongly as Mary Ann Marriage Allen did our record as Friends in this subject would be greatly modified. As fundamental as this question of right living is it only serves to emphasize the Tuskegee contention that the Negro problem is one of education. Booker Washington is rightly called "Builder of Civilization" in the recent book about him. He never lost his grip on the fact that this building must be from the foundations up. And this is why the whole problem in the South seems so hopeless. As pointed out recently by President James, of the University of Illinois, there is as yet no adequate provision at all for the elementary training of a million Negro children.

Both the living conditions and the educational situation as seen in Tryon were appealing in the extreme. A noble philanthropist from the North maintains the Tryon school. His two teachers were willing, but sadly untrained. He appealed pathetically to know whether we could not send him efficient teachers from our Cheyney Normal School.

It is often said of the Swiss mountains that they excel in attraction because of the human interest so much in evidence at every hand. The mountaineers and the Negroes give the North Carolina mountains this human interest. They both painfully emphasize problems, but they both furnish so much that is picturesque and resourceful that they add greatly to the general sum of interest. Two winter months in these mountains make it clear that the time of greatest charm must be the early Spring. Noble forests with numberless dogwood and Judas trees, with laurel and rhododendron and flaming azalea in bewildering abundance, must rival boggy meadows with orchids and anemones—a rapturous combination of reds and whites and yellows all in a procession of glory to the accompaniment of singing birds and laughing, happy children! We could a little understand the oft-repeated exclamation, "How can you go with the glories of the Spring at hand!"

BUSINESS AND PROHIBITION.

Our Friend, Morris E. Leeds, has put into our hands the following very interesting letter addressed to his firm with the enclosure submitted with it. We print the letter and a portion of the extracts. They carry their own message.—

[Eds.]

DETROIT, February 12, 1917.

THE LEEDS & NORTHRUP CO.,
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

GENTLEMEN:—As a business man, actively engaged in conducting one hundred and sixty-five stores throughout the Union, and as a member of the Detroit and National Chambers of Commerce, I write you because you likewise are concerned in industrial welfare.

Recently I became interested in the suppression of the drink traffic. The "wet" and "dry" issue was to be voted on in Michigan last November. In my own experience my business has been very much improved in localities where saloons were closed. Wishing to know the general effects of the law, I wrote to people of high standing in several dry States. The facts they sent led me to support strongly the dry side. I enclose extracts from those letters.

Now that Michigan has voted dry, I am, for business reasons, also using my influence, as are many of my business friends, to get National prohibition, in the way provided by the Constitution. Does it not seem to you deplorable that our nation's policy should be opposed to sobriety, when it has been proven that industrial efficiency and safety and national preparedness for war or peace demand the abolition of saloons? This is quite apart from the important moral issues involved.

I write you to respectfully suggest, if you are of the same mind, and if you have not recently done so, that you write your Congressman and two United States Senators at once, urging them by influence and vote to help pass the Sheppard-Webb Resolution for National Prohibition and to allow the States to act upon it. Also that you ask other business friends to do the same.

You will, I'm sure, understand my business interest and my request for co-operation. Whatever your opinion, I should be thankful to know it and to learn, by your confidential reply, what you have done or will do to promote, nationally, the end in view.

Yours sincerely,

SEBASTIAN S. KRESGE.

WET AND DRY FACTS.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME OF THE LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS RECEIVED IN 1916 (WITH CONSENT TO PUBLISH) BY SEBASTIAN S. KRESGE, DETROIT. GOVERNORS, MAYORS, POLICE HEADS BOOST STATE AND NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

GOVERNORS OF DRY STATES.

GOVERNOR RYE, Tennessee—We have lost the liquor traffic and we are glad. Crime reduced, streets free from drunkards, bank deposits enormously increased, property more valuable, life safer, people more prosperous and happier, public morals on a higher plane.

GOVERNOR KERR, North Carolina—Twenty-one per cent. more children attending school; bank deposits increased 100 per cent.; building and loan association stock increased 250 per cent.; benefits great and continually increasing.

GOVERNOR CARLSON, Colorado—Two thousand new savings accounts opened in one month; collections in department stores broke all records; credit men report many overdue accounts deemed uncollectable paid up; crime reduced greatly.

GOVERNOR CAPPER, Kansas—Wealth per capita greater than any other State; death rate lowest per capita; bank deposits largest of any State; fewest tenants; most home owners of any State; no open bar-rooms and auto to every fifth family; two million people who never saw a saloon.

GOVERNOR ALEXANDER, Idaho—Never such beneficial results from any measure in so short a time; Boise Chief of Police and four policemen dismissed because no longer needed; police courts deserted; city and county jails empty; savings banks deposits increased; accidents decreased.

GOVERNOR CLARK, Iowa—Arrests reduced 40 to 45 per cent.; commitments to State hospitals greatly decreased; demands on poor fund much reduced; practically all merchants say collections much improved; importations of intoxicants reduced nine-tenths.

POLICE CHIEFS AND OTHERS.

CHIEF OF POLICE MAYO, Atlanta—Drunkenness and other crimes reduced 50 to 75 per cent.

PRESIDENT A. L. MAYER, OF TAYLOR & CO. (Dry Goods, Wheeling)—Steady cash business improvement; also other conditions higher; better merchandise and more freely bought; 12 to 15 general retail merchants make same report.

BANK PRESIDENT CHREITZBERG, First National, Spartanburg, S. C.—Present generation of young men never saw a bar-room; laboring classes building homes; savings banks all prospering; from lowest to highest classes, spirit of thrift abroad in our State.

CHIEF OF POLICE DALE, Little Rock—Crimes reduced 50 to 75 per cent.

ATTORNEY FOR POLICE COMMISSIONER, Wheeling—Retail clothing, wall paper, hat stores, &c., have taken rooms of saloons; Reymann brewery changed into packing plant.

SAFETY COMMISSIONER JOHNSON, Colorado Springs—Prohibition has had good effect both moral and financial.

MAYORS OF DRY CITIES.

MAYOR MOORE, Wilmington, N. C.—Blind tigers, gambling, redlight districts practically gone; we would not return to wet condition.

MAYOR TRAWCETT, Tacoma—Prohibition no harm, but great improvement to business; new store business in vacated saloons; temptations removed from the boys, thousands who voted wet now convinced of success of dry policy.

MAYOR BREECE, Charleston, W. Va.—We have saved enough by reduction in police department and poor fund to offset loss of $51,000 revenue. Besides big savings in the courts and prisons.

MAYOR JOHNSON, Raleigh, N. C.—It has worked wonders for our city.

CITY SECRETARY CRARY, Rome, Georgia—Cleaner politics, greater efficiency of workmen; many hopeless drunkards reclaimed; no increase of tax rates; ladies now safe on street at night; pray you may be successful in Michigan.

MAYOR ALBEE, Portland, Oregon—Portland has undergone revolution; new buildings replacing shacks where saloons were; men buying necessities for home with drink money.

MAYOR BENTLY, Wichita—Liquor consumption reduced 90 per cent., National prohibition will finish the job.

MAYOR GILL, Seattle—Business increased; collections better; bank deposits increased million dollars a month; building 50 per cent. more; 1500 more in schools; prisoners reduced nearly 100 per cent.; voted wet but was much mistaken.

MAYOR ROTH, Cedar Rapids, Iowa—Last year with saloons first two months drunks 93; this year no saloons, 7; last year, disturbing peace 21; this year 5; pawnbrokers' business falling 50 per cent.

The above facts tell why the Dry Cause is winning!

THE END OF THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

The last wisps of smoke are curling from the opium pipes of China. On the thirty-first of next month the last ounce of the poppy will be sold, and China will be free of opium. In ten years it will have thrown off the most terrible bondage that has ever enslaved a nation and at the same time will have consummated one of the finest achievements in the history of any people.

The last effort to prolong the life of the drug has been frustrated under circumstances that provide a fitting climax to the sweeping surge of idealism that has characterized the fight of a decade. For the last three years all China has been closed to the traffic in opium except the three provinces in which, ironically enough, the foreign interests have dominated: Kiangsu, in which is Shanghai; Kuantung, in which is Canton, and Kiangsi, in which is Kiukiang. While the Chinese themselves have sacrificed whatever property interests they had in the traffic, the British importers who make up the Shanghai opium combine, forced an agreement three years ago allowing them to sell the drug in those three provinces until they disposed of their accumulated stocks. The expiration of that agreement was fixed at the thirty-first of next month, the date originally set by the Chinese Government for the end of the evil throughout the country.

A few months ago the combine, finding it could not dispose of its stock by that time, asked the Government for an extension of that agreement until the first day of 1918, offering $16,000,000 for the privilege. That offer the Government has refused. In financial straits as it is, its treasury depleted by revolution, forced even for a time to suspend specie payments, and negotiating—almost begging—for $5,000,000 loans in America, it has refused. Strong political pressure has been brought to bear; the combine has even threatened to withhold $5,000,000 of the duty on its last months of operation. Still it has stood firm, a magnificent stand for a principle. Backward, material China! How many of the "civilized" powers, similarly situated, would have done the same? How many governments, hanging by so tenuous a thread, would have balked at so small a compromise for so large a stake? For remember, chiefly on its ability to raise money will the new republican government of Li Yuan-hung stand or fall.

It has been with just that splendid disregard for the pressure of the pocket nerve that the whole war on the drug has been carried on. To realize what this has meant, financially at least, to China, you must compare it with the effect on the United States if the Government were suddenly to forbid the cultivation of wheat and corn. Then imagine the people of those states not only submitting, but burning with elaborate ceremonies all agricultural implements.

Opium has been for nearly a century the largest vested interest in China, an interest in which thousands had their entire wealth and from which millions drew their living. There were provinces in which there was virtually no other crop, for opium has always commanded a much higher price than any other product. In addition, the customs revenue on the poppy imported from India and the internal tax on the native product have represented a large proportion of the entire revenue of the country, more than $30,000,000. And on the personal side at least half the 400,000,000 people of the country have been addicted to the drug.

Is it any wonder then that when, in 1906, the Empress Dowager promulgated her decree ordering the suppression of the drug within ten years, the world looked for the tongue in her cheek? Or that when the Chinese asked Great Britain to stop the opium imports from India and urged the opium merchants in China to curtail their sales, a British official publicly said: "It is impossible not to be skeptical of the intentions of the Chinese Government, with regard to this matter."

It was not possible to be skeptical long. Two months after the Empress' decree the Government council had framed a definite program for its execution—the immediate closing of the dens for smoking and the reduction of the area under poppy cultivation by one-tenth each year. With savage, relentless strokes, without any regard for financial loss, that program was carried out. In six months the closing of the dens had begun. After three years American consuls reported that the production of the poppy had been reduced fifty per cent. and that two million dens had been shut. In 1912 five of the eighteen provinces had been closed to the traffic and in 1913 five more. By 1914 fifteen were free from the drug.

The amazing feature of the whole fight has been its overwhelming popular support. Seldom have there been such spectacles as the public burning of huge quantities of opium worth thousands of dollars, rich furnishings of dens, pipes and all the paraphernalia of smoking. These have been held from time to time in various parts of the country with official and religious ceremonies.

The one ugly fact has been the part played by foreigners, as it has been through the whole history of opium in China. Forcing it originally on the Chinese at the point of guns, they have resisted to the last its passing. Officially, China has been given co-operation, though not ungrudgingly, in its effort to free itself from the curse.

But the attitude of the foreigners living in China who have had an interest in the traffic has been an ugly commentary on western morals. So far from making any sacrifice, they have made capital out of the suppression of the drug. In cities like Shanghai, Tientsin, Hankow, where the foreigners have concessions or the privilege of extra-territoriality, opium dens have been open years after they were closed in the adjoining districts under native jurisdiction.

The only places in the country where a Chinese can get the drug that has been the curse of his people are those ruled by the civilized white man. And even to the last the opium

*N. merchants have made their abortive effort, by bribe and threat, to prolong the life of those shops. But it has been abortive, and before the snow falls again China will have won its liberty from the sinister tyranny that bound it to decay.—

CHRISTIANITY AND CHARACTER.

AGNES L. TIERNY.

That words wear out with overuse is a common observation. Through attrition their serviceableness is lost. Words and phrases instinct with life and meaning for certain individuals lose their significance for others. Especially is this true in the realm of religion and theology. A word which bites like an anchor in the deepest experience of one generation drags unimpeded through the spiritual depths of another.

In order, therefore, to stimulate interest and rehabilitate ideals each generation must invest old words with new meaning or substitute new phrasings to express old truths.

The word service is a case in point. Service still has its right and noble usage, but contemporary overuse has given it a savor of unction in the practice of the altruistic virtues. A new generation speaks in terms of co-operation, community spirit, internationalism and universal brotherhood. What word will connote to the next generation all that these terms imply? Perhaps it will be Christianity—who knows?

There are words, however, which never wear out or lose their deepest significance. A certain ruggedness and austerity behind which no subtleties can hide lifts them among lesser words like mountain peaks above their foothills. Such is the word character. Greek scholars tell us that far from deteriorating with use, character has far richer content of meaning now than it has in its native setting. To its early metaphysical meaning has been added an ethical and religious content to which the Greeks were strangers.

Personality has been much used of late as a synonym of character. Both words are defined as "individuality; the sum of qualities by which a person is distinguished from others." But personality in its stricter sense is a natural endowment, while character includes "moral quality, the principles and motives that control the life." Hence we may say that personality lacks that inherent strength which is imparted to character by the implication of the will.

There are several reasons why character has not figured to any great extent in the religious terminology of the past.

First—because the creeds of Christendom everywhere lay stress on intellectual belief and nowhere emphasize character. "Not one of the creeds of the church," says Professor Peabody, "pledges a disciple to a consistent Christian life."

Because the word character nowhere appears in the Authorized Version of the Bible may be another reason for its not being incorporated in the language of piety.

Still another reason may be because character is capable of universal application. It is as readily recognized in pagan as in Christian history, in savage as in civilized environment. Character stamps Aristotle, Socrates and Marcus Aurelius as surely as Augustine, Luther and Knox. Deborah does not lose by comparison with Joan of Arc. The story of the woman in the African jungle who on hearing the Gospel message of love for the first time exclaimed to a companion: "I always told you there ought to be a god like that" thrills us with a swift surmise of character behind that single utterance.

And lastly the very implication of the will in character may cause suspicion of its orthodoxy. It bears in its body the mark of something self-made and self-attainable.

"Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control,
These three alone lead life to sovereign power," is an epitome of character which does not minimize the agency of self or even suggest dependence on a higher power.

But these possible reasons for the religious distrust of character no longer obtain. Character is generally recognized today as at once the object and the highest expression of religion, even though in many cases the religion which inspires it may be no more than a hidden loyalty to impulses and powers but dimly apprehended.

There is danger, however, that an age which ceaselessly urges to social activity and judges efficiency by ponderable results may overlook the value of character apart from the outward achievement of its possessor. For it is surely possible that the winning of character as well as the highest service which it renders to others, may be not so much by its actual work amid external conditions as in the reactions to those conditions and its inner and spiritual conquest over them. The very process of self-discipline, self-mastery and world-overcoming creates energy in the form of ideals without which in spite of a people's outward efficiency it shall perish spiritually. "The noblest workers of our world," wrote a great scholar and preacher of the last century, "bequeath us nothing so great as the image of themselves. Their task, be it ever so glorious, is historical and transient; the majesty of their spirit is essential and eternal. (So) it was with Christ Himself. His Divine work was not in the task which He did but in the image which He left. He thought, indeed, as the faithful must ever think, that there was a work given Him to do, unaware that by His very name of devotion to it was already done. So eager was He worthily to finish it that of all His sorrows, to be cut short in it was the bitterest cup that might not pass from Him except He drank it; unconscious that the spirit and the conquest of that agony did actually bring it to the sublimest close."

And this brings us to the character of Jesus. Recognition and appreciation of the character of Jesus have been a late development in Christian history and are naturally coincident with the emphasis now laid upon character as the fruit of religion. The early theories of the incarnation left no place in Jesus' nature for the use of those means by which character is achieved. The doctrine of the congenital and absolute perfection of His nature left out entirely those human elements through the conquest of which character emerges.

Yet surely an unprejudiced reading of the Gospel narrative conveys no impression that Jesus was powerless to betray His mission. He grew in favor with God and man; He was tempted of Satan; He refused to be called good; He was straitened until His baptism should be accomplished; He wrestled in prayer that He might not turn away from the last bitter cup; He refused all means by which He might be delivered from His final fate. And it was further written of Him that "although a Son yet He learned obedience by the things which He suffered and having been made perfect became the Author of eternal salvation."

Furthermore, there is abundant evidence that Jesus exercised in overcoming the world the force of an unconquered will. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me" implies both decision and dedication of purpose. "He that willet to do his will shall know of the teachings" must have issued from the depths of a spiritual history, the inner progression of which the world hangers to have disclosed. When He "set His face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem" with a clear prescience of what He must suffer there, no discouragement could turn Him from His purpose. And when in Gethsemane He accepted as His fate an unresisting sacrifice we may believe that the "power to will" had reached its highest earthly perfection—the point at which the human will wholly recognized and wholly conformed to the will of the Father and accepted as the answer to a prayer for deliverance the power of Divine endurance.

The will to know the Father's will and to do it; the will to love to the uttermost and to endure the consequences of that love—these were elements in His character which led Jesus to those spiritual heights whence the radiance of His lifelightsens the hard upward path of every soul.

Through the acceptance and appropriation of that character and life shall the world find its way to redemption.

FRIENDS' CONFERENCE AT PASADENA, CALIFORNIA.

HELD FIFTH, SIXTH AND SEVENTH OF FIRST MONTH, 1917, AT THE ORANGE GROVE FRIENDS' MEETING-HOUSE.

Dr. Ira S. Frame presided at the opening session on Sixth-day afternoon, which began with a very solemn period of silent meditation after which Septimus Marten introduced Elizabeth Stover, of Canada, who spoke of the necessity of the Society of Friends realizing their responsibility to the world; she gave a very interesting and spiritual address.

This was followed by an address by Wm. C. Allen, of San José, on the dangers of militarism and preparedness. He spoke of the demoralizing effect of these influences on the churches of England, where he said they were destroying democratic liberty.

Louise Ferris, of Sierra Madre, read a poem by M. P. Boynton, entitled "Victory," which voiced the sentiment of the meeting in regard to Peace and War.

Others who took part were T. M. Stewart, of Los Angeles; Wm. Chappell, a missionary to Japan; Walter Vail, of Palo Alto, and Edwin McGrew, of Whittier.

G. S. Yarnall presided at the evening meeting and after a solemn stillness and a few introductory remarks from the Chairman, Mabel Douglas, of Whittier, gave a very instructive address entitled "Open Sesame," speaking of the treasures of literature gained by the true reader. She gave some very telling selections from Whittier and other poets.

On Seventh-day afternoon, at the session presided over by J. W. Dorland, a thoughtful and critical paper written by Professor A. T. Murray, of Stanford University, was read by Septimus Marten. The topic was "The Society of Friends and the Present Crisis."* This was followed by an address by Dr. D. F. Fox, of Pasadena, urging efficiency in religious matters as well as in business, and declaring that the expert who should be called in to aid is the Holy Spirit.

Dr. Emily Hunt presided over the Seventh-day evening session when Wm. C. Allen gave interesting particulars of his visits to military camps and prisons abroad, which called for many questions from the audience. Thos. J. Ashby, of Pasadena, gave a very thoughtful paper on "John Bright's Character and Influence."

On First-day afternoon the concluding session of the Conference was presided over by Lydia Vail. Elizabeth Stover gave an inspiring address on "The Road," illustrating by the parable of the Good Samaritan, the opportunities and needs of the century. Leila Marten spoke of the need for moral and spiritual courage to stand up against injustice and one's own cowardice. Martha King, of Pasadena, gave an interesting story of the missionary work in Hawaii and how it started from the desire of one Hawaiian boy that his people should become Christians.

Benjamin Coppock, A. F. N. Hambleton, Dr. Ira Frame and H. S. Harvey also took part. Louise Ferris gave the closing remarks.

A special meeting for worship after the manner of Friends was held at the Orange Grove Meeting-house in the evening of First-day, when much thankfulness was expressed for the profitable sessions of the Conference.

There has been a good deal of expression of a wish that a similar Conference may be held annually.

SEPTIMUS MARTEN.

A SINGLE step, and again a step,

Until by safe degrees,

The milestones passed, we win at last

Home, when the King shall please.

And the strangest thing is often this,

That the briery, tangled spots

Which cumber our feet should be thick and sweet

With our Lord's forget-me-nots.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"I WILL RETURN."—(The Story of a Pledged Word.)—In 1877 a tribe of Red Indians attacked a little frontier settlement on White Bird Creek, in western Idaho. A settler named James Manuel was warned in time to catch his horses, put his wife and baby on one, while he and his little girl, Maggie (a child of eight), mounted the other.

They were overtaken after going a few miles and fired upon. The parents and baby were killed, and Maggie was wounded and fell from the horse. The little girl rolled down the hillside and hid herself in the tall grass.

She lay for three days among the willows, beside a stream to which she had crept. She had been shot through the arm with an arrow and the shaft was still in the wound.

On the third day Patrick Brice, an Irish miner, passed by and, hearing the sound of moaning, soon found the child, who in her terror mistook him for an Indian, and attempted to escape. Weak from her wounds, and exhausted from starvation, she reeled a few steps and fell.

The miner lifted her tenderly, and carried her back to her home, now only a heap of smouldering ashes. A few chickens remained, which had escaped the sight of the Indians.

Brice killed one of these and roasted it over the fire. He fed the child and himself, and then set about devising means to take her fifty miles over the rough mountain trail to Mount Idaho, the nearest settlement. An old chair back made a comfortable seat for his burden, which he fastened on with some straps from the harness.

As the moon rose he slung the child on his back and set out up the winding trail. All night he trudged along, stopping only at a spring to bathe her wounds and allay her feverish thirst.

At sunrise he hid in a dense clump of bushes. Several times bands of Indians passed near without discovering them.

As Pat at length caught sight of the little town in the distance, he was congratulating himself that he should reach it in safety, when his heart sank at the sight of fifty mounted Indians charging down upon him.

Brice spread his arms in the peace sign. When they were close, the chief, Mox Mox, rode ahead and spoke to him.

Brice could speak a little of the Indian tongue. "What do you want?" he asked.

"We want you," the chief replied.

"Well, here I am. Come and get me."

"Throw down that revolver," was the command.

To hesitate was to court death. Brice threw the weapon in front of him. An Indian dismounted and greedily secured it.

"Now," said Mox Mox, "we are going to kill you."

"You can kill me, if you wish, but, for God's sake, spare this child."

"No, we will not only kill you, but the girl as well."

"Then," replied Brice, "if you must kill me, shoot me right here."

As he said this he tore open his rough shirt and displayed a blood red cross tattooed upon his breast.

The Indians fell back in amazement. They were not Christian Indians, but they had reverence for the emblem of Christianity, and dared not shoot. A gleam of hope came to Brice.

"If you will allow me to take this child into Mount Idaho, where she can be cared for, I will return to your camp, wherever it is, and give myself up. You can then do with me as you will. By this cross I swear it."

The Indians consulted together, then Mox Mox said:

"All right. You go, but if you do not come back in two sleeps we will ride into Mount Idaho, and when we ride out again there will be no white person alive."

Brice went on his journey. He delivered his charge into kind hands, rested for a day, and then deliberately walked back into the Indian camp. "Here I am," he said. "What are you going to do with me?"

"Do with you?" the chief replied. "Why, nothing. We do not want you. We are not making war on people who do not make war on us. It is the long knives we are fighting. Eat, sleep, then go your way."

Brice went back to his mine, without dreaming that his act was anything out of the common. He lived to an old age, and died a few years ago.

Little Maggie grew to womanhood and married. She lived on the Camas Prairie, in Northern Idaho, happy, save for the dark shadow cast upon her life that spring day.—Century Magazine.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Westtown Committee, at a special meeting held Second Month 27th, appointed George L. Jones to succeed Thomas K. Brown next year as principal of the School. The new principal has been teacher and assistant principal at Westtown for several years. Prior to that he was very successfully at the head of the boarding-school at Vassalboro, Maine. His varied duties in that position gave him unusual experience and training for executive work.

George L. Jones is an acknowledged minister of Concord Quarterly Meeting. He is gifted with the qualities calculated to advance the high ideals of Westtown, and we bespeak for him the sympathy and loyal support of Friends. Perhaps the School needs nothing so much as an era of appreciation rather than criticism.—[Eus.]

TO AMERICAN FRIENDS.—We desire to send a message of warm sympathy and greeting to our friends in America. We know something of the struggles and anxieties through which they are passing, and we wish them to know with what affection and tenderness we think of them. Any expression of view or opinion as events unfold is both impracticable and inappropriate. Long before these words are received in America great historical issues may be raised and determined. We cannot therefore converse with each other or communicate our thoughts. We are, however, one in sympathy and aspiration. We acknowledge with gratitude and appreciation President Wilson's continued efforts in behalf of peace, and we desire, with our friends, to speak and think and act so as to advance that supreme object and to make permanent the reign of peace.—From The Friend [London], Second Month 16th.

OUR friend, Charles Richardson, makes a very sane suggestion in the following letter to the Public Ledger.—[Eus.]

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:—

There is no more important subject for the American people to consider at this time than the efforts now being made to compel our State and National Governments to adopt a universal policy of compulsory military training and military service. The conditions which may result from the final adoption or rejection of that policy are so momentous and far-reaching that any decision not based upon the most thorough and careful discussion and consideration would be extremely dangerous.

The patriotic citizens who are besieging our lawmakers on this subject seem to be hopelessly divided in their opinions. Those who are following the lead and adopting the arguments of the world-wide militarist propaganda of recent years and those who hold the contrary views are equally certain that the course advocated by the other would necessarily result in international conflicts and irreparable loss and suffering.

Without attempting here to discuss these differences, I should like to urge that, as the fundamental basis of our nation is the rule of the majority, there should be a general referendum of the whole question to all the voters.

In the absence of such a referendum it would be an inexcusable outrage to enact laws that would fasten upon the American people a self-perpetuating system which involves an enormous and constantly increasing sacrifice of time, money and energy, and subjects every able-bodied citizen to many terms of what is virtually penal servitude with hard labor. It would be difficult for the advocates of unlimited preparedness to find a plausible objection to such a reference, and their opponents would certainly favor it when they think of the relative proportions of those who do and those who do not want to be soldiers, as indicated by the reports of recruiting officers.

CHARLES RICHARDSON.

PHILADELPHIA, Second Month 26, 1917.

We have the second number of "Our Meeting," published by Wilmington Monthly Meeting, and at the same time advance sheets of the first number of the "Message," from a committee of Western District. In form and substance these little papers are much like one circulated now for some time by Haverford Monthly Meeting. The design of such publications is to bring the meeting to members when they are unable to attend, or when they allow other interests to intervene. We can thus see an important service for them in developing what is called "group consciousness." So long as they do not supersede the personal expression of fellowship upon the Scripture ideal of being "members one of another," they can hardly be other than serviceable.—[Eus.]

As noticed in last week's FRIEND there was a public hearing on the Wells-Hess bill to abolish capital punishment at City Hall on the afternoon of the second. The Ledger reports it as follows:

"Perhaps never in Pennsylvania has an existing institution of government been so vigorously condemned by representatives of all classes and kinds of people, including even those whose duty is the administration of the law, as capital punishment was condemned before the Sub-committee on Judiciary General of the State House of Representatives at the public hearing on the Wells-Hess bill."

After liberal quotations from the various speeches we note the following:

George M. Warner, representing the Society of Friends, urged the committee to favorable action, and asked the members to exert their influence with other members of the House to vote for the measure.

Some weeks ago we printed a review of Theodora Wilson's remarkable Peace allegory, "The Last Weapon." It has passed through numerous editions in England and now an American edition is on sale by Friends' Book and Tract Committee as appears by an advertisement in this number.

STOUGHTON HOLBORN ON SOCRATES AT THE FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—A cordial invitation is extended to all Friends and others interested to attend the next Friends' Select School Lyceum Lecture to be given at the School on Sixth-day evening, the 16th, at 7.45, by Ian B. Stoughton Holborn on "Socrates—the Greatest of Men." Stoughton Holborn is best known as a very successful University Extension Lecturer, endorsed by Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and he is a man of remarkably interesting personality and varied gifts and experience.

Though not a member of the Society of Friends, he is a regular attendant of the Friends' meeting when at his home in Edinburgh, and is more nearly a Friend than anything else. Socrates is his favorite character in history, and he says he regards him as "the first Friend."

Stoughton Holborn has published several books of poetry and prose, and has earned some distinction as an explorer in Iceland and a social worker in connection with Ruskin College, Oxford. He was a passenger on the last voyage of the Lusitania, and has a summer home on the northernmost of the Shetland Isles, the "Ultima Thule" of the Romans, now called Foula, where he is known as the "Laird."

He has lectured at the School twice with such effect that we want all our friends to hear him.

During Second Month $4,066.03 received for relief of the war sufferers was forwarded to London for use of the several Committees engaged in the work.

The Committee of the Representative Meeting charged with the care of transmitting relief to the war sufferers wishes to encourage Friends of our various Quarterly and Monthly Meetings to continue their work of collecting money and clothing without any regard to the present difficulty of forwarding them. If necessary to do so the money contributions may be cabled and in forwarding clothing and other supplies the Committee will be guided by the best advice it can obtain. The need for relief is so great that our work must go forward even though an occasional package be lost in the shipping.

On behalf of the Committee,

JOHN WAT.

THE DRUG HABIT.—The Philadelphia Narcotic Drug Committee has issued a report stating that there are nearly 187,000 drug users in the United States.

"The beginning of the habit was revealed in connection with a group of eighty-six addicted to some form of the drug. Of these, fifty-eight formed the habit through association either in dissolute company or with fellow-workmen or other associates. Some began through curiosity. Two contracted the habit in connection with sickness following operations. Six claimed the habit was formed through physicians' prescriptions. One began the use, hoping to ward off tuberculosis. The users of this group attributed a large variety of ailments to the continued use of drugs. Decayed teeth, loss of appetite, indigestion, constipation often of several days' duration, loss of weight, impaired sight and hearing, weak heart, extreme nervousness, night sweats, tendency to tuberculosis, general health impaired, loss of will power, loss of self-respect—a tolerance of living conditions which otherwise would be intolerable. And if they are deprived of the drug for a brief period, they are obsessed with one idea alone—how to get more of it.

"As a rule, the drug is obtained from peddlers who are found on the street corners in the tenderloin district, in pool rooms and other places where men and boys congregate in various parts of the city. The peddler does not usually carry a very large quantity on his person, but returns to his room from time to time to replenish his stock. The peddler will tell users that if they have any friends to let them know he has some "good stuff." About half the persons interviewed claim that they secured their supply from "friends," the others on prescriptions.

"Under the Harrison Act, the drug has become very expensive, often costing as high as $7.50 per dram. It is often bought in large quantities by parties, who meet and divide the substance and the expense. The parties have initials—C. P., cocaine party; H. P., heroin party; and M. P., morphine party. Many examples of strong young men are cited by the committee who acquired the habit and became useless."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The Central Free Library at Nineteenth and Vine Streets is to be the first of the projected public buildings to be erected on the Parkway. Mayor Smith has authorized Director Datesman, of the Department of Public Works, to advertise early next week for proposals for the erection of the building. There is $3,255,000 available for construction and equipment of the library.

One anomaly of the present food situation is to be found in the fact that oranges are now cheaper in Maine than potatoes. In Bangor, for example, a peck of potatoes is worth about eighty cents, while a peck of good oranges can be bought for fifty cents and a first-class article at sixty-five cents.

Reviewing the food situation in the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, David F. Houston, declared that there was no reason for hysterical action or thought. In his statement the Secretary said that the investigation proposed by the President would lead to good results. He appealed for economies all along the line and asserted there was an annual food waste of $700,000,000 in the United States.

The Transcript is authority for the following: "A thousand or so electric ranges are now in service in Greater Boston. Assuming the average family to include six persons, 5700 Bostonians are living on electrically cooked food. With an average daily meat consumption of 0.5 pound per person, this group would use 2850 pounds per day. The shrinkage of meat with electrical cooking is 25 per cent. less than that which occurs on the old-fashioned range. This nets a total saving of 665 pounds per day for the group, which, at 35 cents per pound, amounts to $84,943.75 a year."

Thirteen persons are known in Atlanta, Ga., to have lost their lives and more than 100 have been reported injured in a series of tornadoes that swept portions of Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi on the 23rd ult.

The appointment of John Francis, Jr., Chief of the Division of Education in the office of Indian Affairs at Washington, to be Superintendent of the Carlisle Indian School was announced at Carlisle, Pa., by Cato Sells, Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The appointment is effective Fourth Month 15th. Commissioner Sells, who was there to arrange to take the Indian students to the inauguration of President Wilson, also announced that O. H. Lips, Superintendent of the Carlisle School for the last three years, has been made Chief Supervisor of Indian Schools.

The American production of potash in 1916 was ten times as valuable as that of 1915, according to the geological survey, and the 1917 figures are likely to be much greater still.

ing at a Washington's birthday celebration on the East Side, said that there are 500,000 persons in the city who cannot speak English and that only 84,000 of these have sought the night schools. "A common language," he said, "is what we need to form a common bond. The mastery of the English language is the first step in Americanization."

Frank B. Sanborn, of Concord, Mass., philosopher, journalist, and last of the old Abolitionists, died on the 24th ult., at the home of his son, Francis, at Westfield, N. J.

New England was represented at Columbia University by 801 students in the last academic year, according to the report of Frank A. Dickey, University Registrar, just made public. Including the 1915 summer session, extension teaching and ultra-mural centres, a grand total of 19,094 different individuals received instruction from the university during the year.

FOREIGN.—Three physicians from the United States, Drs. Obitsky, Denzer and Husk, have put Mexico in the way of more adequate dealing with typhus fever, which has always been more or less epidemic there. It is learned that the typhus organism is perpetuated through the medium of the louse. This is the secret that has long been sought, and explains why Mexicans crossing our border have been put in baths for disinfection.

The present British Premier, David Lloyd-George, who has been a member for twenty-six years of the Castle Street Welsh Baptist Church, London, now has in his hands the appointment of the archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops of the Established Church, the patronage of the English deaneries and twenty-five canonries, besides two hundred livings in the absolute gift of the Crown, and 176 benefices in the alternate gift of the Crown and other patrons.

What the present sugar ration in England means can be understood best by comparison with the consumption of sugar in this country. In 1915 our population consumed $6.04 pounds per capita, or somewhat more than 1½ pounds a week for every individual in the country. An Englishman and his wife to-day are living together on three-quarters of one pound a week for both cooking and table uses.

NOTICES.

THE Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for Third Month will be held on the 22nd inst. On account of Yearly Meeting, the meeting is held one week earlier than the usual time.

ALBERT H. VOTAW, Clerk.

An Oral English Recital, composed of recitations and extemporaneous speeches, will be held at Westtown School at 7.15 p. m., on Third Month 17, 1917.

A subscriber who has bound volumes of THE FRIEND, vols. 10, 11 and 12 bound singly, and vols. 13, 14, 15 and 16 bound together would be glad to give them to some one who would value them. Kindly communicate to S. M. T., 843 N. Forty-first Street, Philadelphia.

WOMEN FRIENDS of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are invited to a United Fellowship Conference for deeper consideration of our responsibility to the Yearly Meeting.

This Conference will be held at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on Third-day, Third Month 20, 1917, at 2.30 P. M.

"Not that I love country less, but Humanity more, do I now and here plead the cause of a higher and truer patriotism. I cannot forget that we are men by a more sacred bond than we are citizens—that we are children of a common Father more than we are Americans."
—Charles Sumner.

FORM AND FORMALITY.

"Oh! the deadness and dryness of the works and obedience, the duties and devotions of the great bulk of Christian professors in the several societies! Each can see formality in the members of others, but too few suspect it in themselves.

"Oh! it is the Life, the Life, that is the thing!" —JOB SCOTT.

"Form is good, but not formality," wrote William Penn; and he adds to this the remark—"In the use of the best of forms there is too much of that, I fear." Unfortunately there is still "too much of that," even when it does not extend so far as to become formalism; and many people, no doubt, continue to look upon certain forms as having inherent virtue, as being efficacious in themselves, rather than as means or helpful opportunities.

On the other hand, some who are restive under any custom or observance that they may consider antiquated or feel to be irksome, are likely to break away from it rather easily on the ground that it is "only a form." The question as to the value or the nature of what may be substituted for it, when something is requisite for "a comely order," probably receives little consideration. From form to form may be the process, and that with no gain.

We shall hardly wish to dispute William Penn's observation as to there being often too much formality in the use of the best of forms, and it will be allowed that an undue attachment to any form for its own sake is of the essence of formalism. The danger of this, and of a slavish conformity, was foreseen more than two centuries ago by some among the least formal of Christian people, so that they declared that they wished their course to be like that of a ship at sea which leaves no path permanently marked. We are not to forget, however, that under competent guidance one ship may traverse practically the same route as another, although the two ships may not be in sight of each other.

The matter for us to reflect upon is, whether any practice to which we have been trained or accustomed has the endorsement of our best sense of truth. Is there scriptural ground for it? Is there practical service or helpfulness in it? What, honestly, would be our motive in abandoning it? What will be the probable result upon ourselves or others of such a course? Can we—to use Barclay's phrase—"convert the disuse" to moral (or religious) improvement?

A little candid investigation will discover that most of the practices or customs that have differentiated "the people called Quakers" from others had their origin in principle—were in fact a fruit of principle, even when they were not specific testimonies—and were never devised for the sake of peculiarity itself. There were many of these, but it is not needful to enumerate them here. No doubt there were some persons in the course of time who came to be formalists in these matters, and their formalism, especially if joined to deficiencies in conduct, would tend to cause the principle to be discountenanced. "For you to fall flat and formal," again writes William Penn, "and continue the profession without that salt and savour by which it is come to obtain a good report among men, is not to answer God's love. . . . nor the mind of Truth in yourselves or in others." But what was the remedy? Not to throw away the testimony of Truth, but to seek to "become true children of God" and "receive the truth" in their hearts.

Again, there is a vast difference between a rigid, punctilious conformity to rules and external standards, and such a conformity or observance as ministers to the best life. We are told that Christ is the Author of order and not of confusion, and it is obvious that an entire absence of form and system means confusion. No government, civil or religious, is thinkable in such case.

The first schism, the earliest considerable defection, in the ranks of the Society of Friends was due to the unwillingness of certain of its adherents to have any government at all except such as each man felt in himself. Perhaps this was a symptom rather than a cause; but it led George Fox to expostulate with them on the ground that some form was necessary for good order and the general welfare, although a distinction was to be made between right forms and wrong forms; and none knew better than he the difference between form and power. He would have united with Isaac Penington in the sentiment that "form without life kills the life;" and it was to the "measure of life" that he commended people everywhere—a power and a principle, however, which would certainly bring into helpful order and into positive testimonies.

"A liberty there is in the Lord," said Robert Barclay, "which breaks not the peace of the true church; but both the nature of the things, the spirit they come from . . . and their consequence and tendency is to be carefully observed."

William Penn tells us that in those days "a grand inquest" came upon their whole lives. Everything was "brought to the Light, the root examined, and its tendency considered." Perhaps, whether we are conformists or nonconformists, we need to suffer an inquest now, in patience and sincerity, upon our lives, our motives, and our affections.

"LARGENESS OF HEART."

Give to Thy people as to one of old,
Largeness of heart and wisdom to discern;
Wherever truth is questioned make us bold
The right to vindicate, the wrong to spurn.
Destroy the barriers whereby our souls
Are kept enslaved to customs or to creed;
Let not our thoughts and ways be run in molds
Of sentiment. Upon no broken reed
Of popular opinion let us lean;
Make us to stand upright as sons of God;
Broaden our vision, keep our senses keen,
Rule us, if needs be, with the iron rod;
But leave us not to our shortsightedness.
Rebuke our greed, our bland hypocrisy,
And give us courage meekly to confess,
Our weaknesses—our foolish bigotry.
Largeness of heart—O how we crave this gift
Whereby we triumph through the power of love,
Becoming lever with the grave to lift
Our brothers from the slough to heights above,
Where they may see the land of corn and wine,
And learn to choose the things that make for peace,
The priceless treasures of the life divine;
The riches that forevermore increase.

PROPOSED PENAL LEGISLATION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

A. H. VOZAW, SECRETARY OF THE PENNSYLVANIA PRISON SOCIETY.

There are five measures now pending before the Legislature at Harrisburg, to which the attention of those who are interested in plans for the betterment and reformation of our prisoners should be called. Friends who favor one or more of these bills may find an acceptable service in writing to their Senators or Representatives asking that such and such a measure should receive their cordial and active support.

1. Bill to abolish capital punishment and substituting therefore life imprisonment. The friends of this bill have been gratified to learn of the very general public sentiment to the effect that the time has fully come to abolish this relic of the barbarism of a past age. The Governor of the State, many judges, the wardens of both penitentiaries of the Commonwealth, distinguished publicists, nearly all ministers of the State, unite in advocating that the statutes of this State shall not sanction a judicial murder.

2. Bill to amend the law for the indeterminate sentence so as to make the same more effective. Since 1909, the judges of the State in pronouncing sentence must assign a maximum and also a minimum time of incarceration. By the law of 1909, the minimum could not be more than one-fourth of the maximum. Many of the judges considered the provisions of this law as infringing upon their prerogatives, and influenced the legislature of 1911 to amend the law so that the Court could have absolute jurisdiction in fixing the time of the minimum sentence. The result is, a great disparity in sentences. One man finds that he is sent to the penitentiary from nine to ten years, while another man from an adjacent county for the same offense has a sentence of from two to ten years. Of the eighty-six convicts in the Eastern Penitentiary whose sentences are subject to a maximum of twenty years, thirty-four have a minimum of eighteen years or more. The cardinal principle of the indeterminate sentence is that the prisoner may be released when his conduct and general behavior seen to warrant the belief that he is ready to resume the duties of citizenship. If the minimum time approximates the maximum time, there is not so much inducement for the prisoner to amend his life. Despair takes the place of hope, and often he concludes that when he leaves prison he will in some way wreak vengeance upon the community. A former law, passed in 1861, allowed to a prisoner who had conducted himself properly a commutation from his sentence. Under the operation of this law, a prisoner sentenced for twenty years could regain his freedom in twelve years and three months. It will be noted that under the law of 1911 many prisoners were detained much longer than under the old commutation conditions, to which we never heard strenuous objection. The proposed amendment is to make the minimum not more than one-third the maximum. If this fraction is thought to be inequitable, it is suggested that one-third be changed to one-half. The law will then correspond to the laws of New York and New Jersey.

3. Providing employment for the inmates of the penitentiaries and all penal institutions of the State. The forces of organized labor are sternly opposed to the sale of prison-made goods in the open market. But the leaders of the labor unions have sympathized to some extent with the condition of those who are to be confined with no employment whatever, and they have agreed that prisoners may be employed in producing materials or articles which may be used either in their own institutions or in other public institutions. Such legislation was enacted in 1915. But there was nothing in the law which made it mandatory for the managers of our public institutions to purchase supplies from the prison factories. The bill this year makes it obligatory for the managers of public institutions to purchase materials and articles from the prisons provided such goods are satisfactory and can be thus obtained. Owing to the previous restrictions with regard to the products of prison labor, demoralizing idleness prevailed in Pennsylvania more than in any other State of the Union.

4. Bill providing for the practical abolition of all the county jails of the State. Six industrial farms with certain industries are to be established to which all sentenced to a term of thirty days or more are to be sent. In time it is thought these farms will become self-sustaining. Thus the schools of crime which by our system we have been conducting in our county jails all these years will be superseded by industrial training establishments where agriculture, quarrying, concrete work, brick-making and other industrial employments will be practically taught. Men of intemperate habits whom we have been "sending up" for thirty or sixty days may remain in profitable employment until they have formed habits of industry and self-reliance. The State of Indiana has tried this experiment and the results amply justify our present proposition.

5. Bill permitting payment of fines, in instalments, at discretion of the Court. Usually, our practice in this State is absurd. Two men are fined for some offense fifty dollars each. The one pays his fine and goes his way; the other cannot get the money and may languish fifty days in prison. The county loses the money and in addition pays for the maintenance of the man for a fixed time. In Indianapolis a certain judge decided that imprisonment for non-payment of fines was a species of imprisonment for debt, and he began releasing those, who were fined and had no money, on condition of their paying such charges by instalments. In three years the city had received $27,410 from this source, whereas under the old plan very little had been paid and the city in addition had been maintaining those who could not pay the fine. Wherever this method has been tried, the results have been satisfactory. If this bill becomes law, it is probable that the Keystone State will be the first to abolish from its entire area this relic of medievalism. Should any county have satisfactory remunerative employment for its prisoners, it will of course be conceded that fines and costs may reasonably be worked out under immediate care of county officials. Such conditions do not obtain in more than two or three counties in Pennsylvania.

SELECTIONS FROM GEORGE FOX.

It seems to me that there is a need amongst the people of the world of a revival of the spirit of truth in the power and life of God and His beloved Son, to bring them to see who is their rightful Teacher and to know who it is that will lead them into all truth and bring them out of darkness into light, which will lead to everlasting life with our Father in Heaven.

With this thought in mind, I have selected the following extracts from different parts of George Fox's Journal, which I feel would be profitable for all of us in this day to read and consider, they being just as true now as when they were first written.—WM. CLARKSON MOFFITT.

"To Friends scattered abroad in every land, to whom my love goes out in the Lord's truth, by which all God's people are made free men and women, thereby being set free from him who is out of the truth; that walking in the truth they may answer the witness of God in all people, which truth all must come to if they be made free. Friends, be faithful unto that which the Lord manifests unto you. Listen to Jesus Christ your Shepherd that He may feed you, and follow Him who hath laid down His life for you. Follow not the shepherds and hirelings that are made by men, although they be angry because you will not follow them, to their dry and barren mountains. Let all dwell in the power of God, in his Light and Spirit, which did first convince you; that in it you may keep in the gentle unity, in humility, in the fear of the Lord and His gentle and peaceable wisdom, which is easy to be entreated, that in the same power, light and spirit of God you may be serviceable unto your fellow-man.

For every one should look to Jesus and every just man and woman may live by their faith, which Christ is the author and finisher of. Be faithful, for you see what the Worthies and Valiants of the Lord did attain unto by Faith. Enoch by faith was translated; Noah by faith was preserved over the water in his ark; Abraham by faith forsook his father's house and religion and all the religions of the world. Isaac and Jacob by faith followed his steps. Samuel and others of the Lord's prophets, with David, by faith were preserved to God over his enemies. Daniel and the three children, by faith escaped the lions and the fire, and preserved their worship clean; and by it were kept from worship of the world. The apostles by faith traveled up and down the world and were preserved from all the religions of the world and held forth the pure religion to the dark world, which they had received from God and likewise their fellowship was received from above, which is in the Gospel that is everlasting. In this, neither powers, principalities nor thrones, dominions, nor angels, things present nor things to come, heights, nor depths, nor death, nor mocking, nor spoiling of goods, prisons, nor fetters were able to separate them from the love of God which they had in Christ Jesus." (So Friends, let us be faithful in this our day as those men of old were in their time.) "We must not have Christ Jesus the Lord of life put any more in a stable amongst the horses and cattle. He must now have the best chamber, the hearts of men and women, and the rude debauched spirit must be turned out. Therefore let Him reign whose right it is, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, by which Holy Ghost you call Him Lord, in which Holy Ghost you pray, and have comfort and fellowship with the Father and with the Son. In the measure of the life of God, wait for wisdom from God from whom it comes, and all you who are children of God, wait for the living food from the living God, to be nourished up to eternal life. From the one foundation life comes, that in order, you may all be guided to walk therein. So farewell and God Almighty bless, guide and keep you in His wisdom."

ACKWORTH, IOWA, Second Month 2, 1917.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF PHILADELPHIA.

The thirteenth annual meeting of Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia was held in Arch Street Meeting-house on the evening of Second Month 27, 1917.

About 125 members and their friends assembled at 6.30 o'clock in the tea-room and partook of a well-prepared supper, served at tastefully arranged tables.

Following the supper the annual reports of committees were presented.

Amelia M. Gummere, editor of the new edition of John Woolman's Journal, reported some new material had been found in York, England, where John Woolman died. Also the Boston Public Library has some manuscripts relating to the Indians, containing reference to John Woolman's visit to the Indians.

It is thought possible that we shall be able to have a publishing firm to undertake the printing of this work for the Society, and it is hoped that it may be issued in about a year.

Report was made that the bronze tablet containing the words of the Prayer of William Penn for Philadelphia had been erected on the east side of the north archway of the City Hall. The design and position are satisfactory to the Committee, who have been untiring in their efforts to have the tablet placed on a public building.

Albanus L. Smith, on behalf of the heirs of Morgan L. Smith, presented a watch-box, formerly used as a protection for the city watchmen from exposure during cold and stormy weather. The gift was accepted by the Society and it is hoped to have it erected on the grounds at Fourth and Arch Streets.

The general topic for the papers of the evening was "The Graveyard at Fourth and Arch Streets, and Brief Notices of Some Prominent People Buried There."

Papers were presented by Professor Allen C. Thomas, Lucy B. Roberts, Hannah T. Shipley, J. Henry Scattergood, William S. Yarnall, Lucy C. Shelmire and Amelia M. Gummere.

Albert Cook Myers, who has recently returned from England, spoke briefly about his work in collecting the complete writings of William Penn. He believes that as more information is found it will prove William Penn to have been not only a prominent Friend, but a public-spirited man and a world figure.

Catharine M. Shipley alluded briefly to a few prominent Friends, formerly members of the meeting at Fourth and Arch Streets, after which the meeting was adjourned.

MARY S. ALLEN,
Secretary.

We are able, by the kind permission of the writers, to print some of the papers herewith:

REMARKS ABOUT THOMAS SCATTERGOOD, 1748-1814.

Thomas Scattergood was a very prominent minister of Friends in his day and probably traveled in the service of the Gospel for more years than any other American Friend. He belonged to the fourth generation of the line of our family in America, of which my own generation is the eighth. He was born in 1748 in Burlington, N. J., where his great-grandfather had settled in 1676. His father was at first a sea captain, apprenticed by Thomas Chalkley, but later studied law and practiced at Burlington. He died when this son Thomas was only six years old. When fourteen the latter was brought to Philadelphia by his mother (known for many years thereafter as "the widow Scattergood"), and was apprenticed in mercantile business. He later learned the trade of hatter until nineteen, and then became a tanner, which was his business the rest of his life. His tannery was located in the Northern Liberties, where he also lived and had his membership in North Meeting.

His call to serious things came early in life. He had been in the practice of sailing on the Delaware River on First-days, but on one occasion he was overcome with a sense of wrong in so doing, and insisted that his companions put him on shore. His conscience became very acute and he took occasion to compensate an old neighbor in Burlington, whose apples as a boy he had occasionally stolen. His first services for his meeting appear to have been at the age of twenty-four, when he was on a committee of his Monthly Meeting to discourage the keeping of slaves. He also served on a committee in care of a school for Negroes, an interest which in his later years bore fruit in the founding of the Association of Friends for the Free Instruction of Poor Children; also on committees in reference to war and peace and the imprisonment of Friends at the time of the Revolution; on "Vain Amusements and Stage Plays," and on the distress of Friends. When thirty years old he made his first journey, accompanying Samuel Hopkins on a visit to the meetings of Maryland, and the next year was Samuel Emlen's companion to the meetings of Virginia. He was soon made an Overseer and at thirty-five his gift in the ministry was recognized. He then began a long series of Gospel pilgrimages to New England, New York, Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia, being away some part of each of the next ten years and visiting the remote "settlements" of these various "governments," including practically all the meetings in America. In 1793 his concern was directed to Great Britain, where he labored up and down in England, Scotland and Ireland for seven continuous years, visiting practically all the meetings and innumerable families and even interviewing the king. After his return in 1800, he continued to give most of his time to the work of Friends, his son Joseph having made this possible all these years through his able management of the tanning business. He again visited in the ministry the meetings of New York, New England and New Jersey, and toward the close of his life visited nearly all the families of Friends in his own and the other two Monthly Meetings in Philadelphia. He died during Yearly Meeting week in 1814.

During his long absence in England he had occasion to visit the Friends' Boarding School at Ackworth, and also the York Retreat. In the latter humane treatment of the insane had just been inaugurated in England. Being much impressed with both of these institutions and being concerned that similar duties rested upon Friends in Philadelphia, he inspired the formation of Westtown School, which was started even before his return, and also of the Friends' Asylum for the Insane at Frankford, which was built after he had personally laid his concern before Philadelphia Friends. He brought to Westtown the old severe code of rules he had found at Ackworth, and many of these survived in one part or another for years afterwards. He was particularly interested in Westtown and several of his summers were spent at the School.

J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD.

THE subject chosen for our consideration this evening has impressed me as very far from dead. It seems to me very much alive. I have been impressed with the keen interest of the Friends in many causes, and with the very modern note.

This is a list of causes:

The Cause of the Immigrant, Publicity in the Management of Public Institutions, Inspection of Prisons, Welfare of the Insane, Public Health, The Indians, and The Abolition of Slavery, which we may call the burning question of that day.

The names assigned to me are: Thomas Harrison, Dr. Samuel Griffiths, Dr. Cadwallader Evans, Dr. Caspar Wistar, Thomas Shipley; three physicians of eminence and two prominent Abolitionists.

THOMAS HARRISON was born in England in 1741. He died in 1815. In the certificate given him to Philadelphia in 1763 it is stated that they believed he "left them free from debt, or any engagement respecting marriage."

He was an honored member of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, and also of the Pennsylvania Society for the Promotion of the Abolition of Slavery.

"When the scourge of yellow fever visited Philadelphia in 1793, Thomas Harrison offered his services and with Stephen Girard was a member of the Committee appointed by the citizens of Philadelphia to attend and alleviate the sufferings of the afflicted with the Malignant Fever Prevalent in the city and its vicinity."

He was on a "Committee to visit the house of employment and enquire of the steward . . . whether any of the managers attend there."

DR. SAMUEL POWELL GRIFFITHS, born in Philadelphia 1759, died 1826. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1780, and spent three years studying abroad, at Montpellier, France, in London and in Edinburgh. We have a glimpse of his private life in learning that every morning he read the New Testament in Greek or Latin.

While Samuel Griffiths was still a student he, as did Caspar Wistar, volunteered his professional assistance for the wounded at the battle of Germantown.

In the pestilence of 1793 and the epidemics of 1797 and 1802, he remained at his post regardless of personal danger. He was active in relieving the sufferings of unfortunate emigrants who arrived from St. Domingo, in the year 1793. Deprived of their princely fortunes, and snatched or smuggled with difficulty from concealment from amid their murdered relatives they experienced the evils of poverty in a foreign land.

Dr. Griffiths was a member of The Society for Alleviating the Miseries of Public Prisons, The Pennsylvania Abolition Society, The Humane Society, The American Philosophical Society, The College of Physicians and The Philadelphia Dispensary, which he founded.

DR. CADWALLADER EVANS died in 1820, at the age of seventy-one. His interest was particularly directed to scientific investigations, as shown by his study of the climate, to which Dr. Mitchell recently referred. In the Eulogium on Dr. William Shippen, delivered by Dr. Caspar Wistar, before the College of Physicians of Philadelphia in 1809, he speaks of Dr. Evans.

Among those physicians who were in Philadelphia when Dr. Shippen began his practice here was Dr. Cadwallader Evans. This gentleman had first studied in Philadelphia, "but completed his medical education in England. He was a descendant of a much venerated early settler, and with the rest of his family, retained the virtue and character of their ancestors, having a great share of public spirit as well as professional work."

DR. CASPAR WISTAR was a grandson of Caspar Wistar, who came to this country from Germany in 1717. Dr. Wistar was born in Philadelphia in 1761, and died in 1818. He was educated at Friends' School, received his Bachelor of Medicine in 1782, at the University of Pennsylvania, his Doctorate in Edinburgh in 1786, and was, for three successive years, President of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh.

He returned to Philadelphia in 1787, where he entered upon the practice of medicine. He was a professor at the College of Philadelphia, and in 1808, on the death of Dr. William Shippen, Jr., succeeded him at the University of Pennsylvania. His fame attracted students to his lectures, and he was largely the means of establishing the reputation of the School. He was also chosen physician to the Pennsylvania Hospital. In 1786 he wrote a medical dissertation in Latin. He was a member of the American Philosophical Society, of which he became President, on the resignation of Thomas Jefferson, 1815.

It was his habit to throw open his house once every week in the winter and at these gatherings, students, scientists, citizens, travelers and scholars of all grades met and discussed subjects of interest. These assemblies, celebrated in the annals of Philadelphia, under the title of the Wistar parties, were continued long after his death by other residents of the city.

The well-known climbing shrub, Wistaria, which grows wild in the southern and western States, was named in his honor.

A tribute to him, published in 1818, was delivered at the Hall of the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

For generations the ancestors of THOMAS SHIPLEY had lived in the neighborhood of Uttoxeter, England. His father, William Shipley, came to America in 1740, and settled in Philadelphia.

Of Thomas Shipley's children, well known to us, are Samuel R. Shipley, Hannah Shipley Bean and Catherine Morris

Shipley. At the time of Thomas Shipley's death he was President of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society. The Memoir published on his death by this Society, prepared by Isaac Parrish, bears the following testimony:

"Possessed of every requisite for usefulness he became decidedly the most efficient friend of the slave whose name at this time stood upon the rolls of the Society."

In his devotion to the cause of Abolition he spared neither his business interests, his time nor his health, and really sacrificed his life. He died Ninth Month 17, 1836, at the age of fifty-two. We find his obituary in the pages of that quaint old paper, Poulson's American Daily Advertiser.

We find his name associated with that of Jay, Garrison and others who had been singled out by slaveholders and their abettors as fit subjects for the merciless attacks of excited and infuriated mobs.

His life is full of thrilling experiences, of which the accounts must be omitted for lack of time. His funeral is described by Isaac Parrish. . . . "When the period arrived for committing his remains to the tomb, the evidence of the deep and pervading sorrow amongst the colored people was most striking. Thousands collected in the vicinity of his dwelling. . . . As the funeral procession moved slowly and solemnly along through the silent crowd did you not note the tear that came to the eye of the aged mother, and to the young wife with her infant in her arms—their dear ones saved to them by this, their protector."

"This, my friend, is not a fanciful sketch. You who were present at the scene must have witnessed the deep sorrow which reigned over the assembled throng; felt the influence no tongue or pen can portray; an influence which was eloquent in proclaiming that the memory of the deceased was enshrined in the hearts of the thousands there assembled."

John G. Whittier writes to "The Memory of Thomas Shipley."

"Gone to thy Heavenly Father's rest!

The flowers of Eden round thee blowing, and in thine ear the murmurs blest
Of Siloa's waters softly flowing.

"Oh, loved of thousands! to thy grave

Sorrowing of heart, thy brethren bore thee;
The poor man and the rescued slave
Wept as the broken earth closed o'er thee;
And grateful tears like summer rain,
Quenched its dying grass again!
And there as to some pilgrim shrine
Shall come the outcast and the lowly,
Of gentle deeds and words of thine
Recalling memories sweet and holy."

HANNAH T. SHIPLEY.

The names assigned me were four in number: Hannah Cathrall, Edward Cathrall, Samuel Smith, Elizabeth Ashbridge.

Hannah Cathrall was a friend of Rebecca Jones, who speaks of her with great affection as her partner and companion. Rebecca Jones' mother conducted a school at No. 8 Drinker's Alley, and the daughter assisted her though with some reluctance. On the death of her mother in 1761, realizing that she must have some means of making a living, she concluded to continue the school because, as she says, "I am used to it," and feeling that she wanted a partner in the business she secured Hannah Cathrall, "a religious, prudent young woman."

The school seems to have prospered, for she says it became large and they were "blest with sufficiency to live comfortably."

In 1788 Hannah Cathrall decided that failing health made it necessary for her to sever her connection with the school and she found a home with a married brother who lived in

Frankford, "five miles off." Rebecca Jones speaks of her coming into the city to visit her friends, "though lame she seems in best life; 'she spoke a few words in meeting last Third-day and will, I verily believe, land in peace at last. What a mercy."

In First Month, 1806, she had "a stroke of palsy which deprived her of the use of her left arm and hand," but she was "sensible and in a broken and contrite state of mind."

In Twelfth Month of the same year she has "a more general stroke of palsy and lies almost helpless, speech almost failed, she knows all and is full of love and sweetness." She died on Twelfth Month 5, 1806, aged seventy.

Edward Cathrall was a physician and attended Rebecca Jones when she was stricken with yellow fever. For two weeks there seemed little hope of her recovery, but Dr. Cathrall bent all his energies to save her, saying, "No! No! I can't let her die." One night he assumed the duties of a nurse, and remained with her, "dropping into her mouth alternately water and diluted wine." When Dr. Physick, the consulting physician, called in the morning he found her somewhat revived. Rebecca Jones seems to have been much concerned for Dr. Cathrall's spiritual welfare.

Samuel Smith was a minister of North Meeting, but when the latter was divided he seems to have gone to Philadelphia Monthly Meeting for Rebecca Jones says, "by the late division of our large Monthly Meeting he (Samuel Smith) is likely to become a member of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, which is painful to us both, as we have always been fellow-helpers together in the meeting for the Northern District for upwards of three-score years and are still in the unbroken bonds of the Gospel."

In 1800 he made a religious visit to Ireland with Richard Jordan. This was his second visit and he was absent some time, traveling in other parts of Europe.

In 1805 Rebecca Jones speaks of her "old friend and fellow-laborer" as "declining in health," but he lived until 1817.

I was not successful in finding anything about an Elizabeth Ashbridge, who was not the noted woman and minister of that name.

THE CELL WINDOW.

(Composed in 1916 in Armley Gaol.)

Blue sky, grey flying clouds and shining stars,
Are all that I can see between the bars,
Of my cell window—yet what more need
Of beauty, than the stars and clouds and sky.

Blue sky that spans the earth, an azure dome,
I know is boundless. And when far from home,
Upon a cloudless day I glance above,
It tells me of a Father's boundless love.

Grey stormy clouds, that hang aloft like lead,
While muttering thunder fills the earth with dread,
Are filled with God's own rain, His precious gift,
And when the rain has fallen, clouds will lift.

Each tiny star, that shines above at night,
Is really one vast world. 'Tis my poor sight
And human vision dwarfs the distant view,
As oft I dwarf God's love and goodness too.

For limitless as is the boundless sky,
And filled with goodness as the clouds that fly,
Magnificent as those vast worlds above,
So is the Father's overwhelming love.

A PROGRAM OF SACRIFICE.

Horatio C. Wood, of Germantown, has put into our hands an able paper prepared by his friend, Reynolds D. Brown. After outlining a program of a possible peace service for our country to the belligerents the paper proceeds as follows:—

I know that many will urge that this program is ideal; that the world is not ready for it. Possibly that is so, though as stated above I believe that the very awfulness of the present war is impressing the necessity of the program of disarmament even on minds which before the war believed in great armies and navies. But it occurs to me that there is the practical addition to this proposal which if made by the United States would not only reflect needed credit on the United States, but will also greatly increase the prospect of the suggestions made by this country being accepted by the warring nations. I mean the offer on the part of our country to contribute some very large sum, say, for illustration, $1,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 towards the reconstruction of those portions of Europe which will be unable to reconstruct themselves when peace is declared. Everyone agrees that there will be such portions of Europe; Belgium is one, Servia is another, Poland another, and doubtless there are still others. While I believe that the German proposals show that as to territorial boundaries it is not unlikely that the warring nations may ultimately agree, possibly solving any problems like Alsace and Lorraine by a popular vote (which after all would seem to be the only proper way to decide such problems); yet I fear that even if territorial boundaries can be adjusted, payment of indemnities would prove exceedingly difficult or perhaps impossible of agreement when neither side in a military way can claim success; further, each of the warring nations will of course have after the war is ended such problems of its own that a large financial burden added to it would exceedingly complicate the entire problem. Now without urging that the United States should assume the entire financial burden, I do urge that it may cheerfully assume a large part of it, and for several different reasons. Most right-minded people feel that it is a regrettable fact that the people of the United States should have so prospered as a result of the war with all its disasters and sufferings to the nations involved. There are not wanting those who believe, at least abroad, that the people of this country have forgotten national ideal in their undue prosperity which the war has brought them. Would not the voluntary offering of a large sum for the purpose mentioned be the best reply to such criticism, would not the world at large believe, as we in America believe, that our undue prosperity has not blinded the eyes of the people of this country to the things in life that are really worth while? In the second place, from the most material point of view, it would obviously pay this country better to devote such large sum to this purpose, rather than to begin next year the spending of another very large sum, possibly $500,000,000 annually, for the purpose of building and maintaining a vast navy and a large army. Would it not be wise to use the money involved in the constructive work of relieving the unutterable misery and distress growing out of the war rather than in the destructive work of equipping armies and navies for possible work of destruction in future years? The last and the most important argument in favor of this program is that it seems to be fundamentally right and Christian. We Christian nations must admit with shame that nineteen hundred years of Christianity have not sufficed nor taught us the lesson that the teachings of Christianity apply to nations as well as to individuals; we must admit that up to this time in the history of the world, nations in their relations with each other have thought themselves justified in attempting to get by their power and might from weaker nations whatever they deemed to be to their own interests. The dispensations of Providence are often slow and mysterious, but in dealing with nations as with individuals it would seem as if times of sorrow and suffering were the times when the deeper lessons are learned. The European war may even, humanly speaking, be worth all that it has cost if it has taught the Christian nations of the world that they must apply their Christianity to their national as well as to their individual life. Is it not worth while for the United States to propose this plan to the warring nations and to evidence its own belief in Christian ideals by the suggested contribution?

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WATSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

WHERE THERE'S DRINK THERE'S DANGER.

"Write it on the liquor store,
Write it on the prison door,
Write it on the gin-shop fine,
Write, aye, write this truthful line—
Where there's drink there's danger.

Write it on the work-house gate,
Write it on the school-boy's slate,
Write it on the copy book,
Where the young may often look—
Where there's drink there's danger.

Write it on the nation's laws,
Tramping out the license clause,
Write it on the ballot white,
So it can be read aright;
Where there's drink there's danger.

Write it over ev'ry gate,
On the church, the halls of state,
In the heart of ev'ry band,
On the laws of ev'ry land—
Where there's drink there's danger."

The verses printed above were sent us by a reader in Amesbury, Mass., with a letter of appreciation based on the belief that we had published them before, and explaining how they had passed from lip to lip and page to page with possible profit. We hope their influence may spread wider yet, and that the composer of the verses, while unknown to us, may reap the joy of helpful service.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE USE OF INTOXICANTS (why do we not say Committee to Promote Total Abstinence) of Chester Monthly Meeting, Media, Pa., is sending out a personal letter to both men and women, appealing for the practice of total abstinence on the part of all.

MODERATE DRINKING is the nursery of alcoholism. The fact must be grasped that the idea of a moderate use of alcoholic drinks is a dangerous Utopia. If history did not prove it good sense ought to. We have seen the effect of alcohol on the brain and the human body. To assume that under such conditions general moderation in the use of this narcotic is possible, one must be exceedingly ignorant of human nature and of the nature of this drug. One method alone has succeeded, and it alone can succeed—total abstinence. And by alcohol we mean all the distilled and fermented drinks, all the punches containing alcohol—in short, everything containing the poison.—DR. AUG. FOREL, Switzerland.

KEEPING UP WITH THE WATER WAGON.—In these days of rapid transit we are not much surprised by ordinary changes of view. But the speed of the "water wagon" has become almost confusing. So many and so sudden have been the changes in public sentiment in favor of the onward progress of temperance reform that unless the observer is alert he may fail to appreciate all that is passing. In 1907 we had only three Prohibition States. We now have twenty-six assured, and two more—Minnesota and Ohio—that are very promising. Indiana, the latest accession to the rank of Prohibition States, qualified satisfactorily on Second Month and by an act of the Legislature to take effect Fourth Month 2, 1918.

The growth of prohibition ideals is conspicuous not only in the increasing extent of the territory adopting this policy, but also in the cumulative approval it gains after adoption. Not many years ago much difficulty was experienced in securing testimony favorable to prohibition from men of prominence, especially so from men in political life. Not so to-day. On the contrary, there is an array of testimony, not only from specialists in medicine and sociology, but also from governors of States, from chiefs of police, from mayors of cities, presidents of corporations, commissioners of various kinds, journalists, statesmen, bankers, etc., that is most emphatic in approval of prohibition. The great monthly magazines and much of the daily press, not only refuse to advertise the liquor business but are giving freely of their space to discussions and reports favorable to prohibition. In this connection we would mention the essays by Eugene Lyman Fisk on Alcohol and Physiology and also on Alcohol and Human Efficiency, published in the Atlantic Monthly for First Month and Second Month respectively. The series of articles in The Survey are less technical, but not less convincing; and it is refreshing to have our attention called to a full page of information and discussion with a most telling wood-cut calculated to attract the attention of fashion-lovers, appearing in the First-day edition of the Public Ledger of Philadelphia. The headlines are, What Shall It Be? H₂O or cocktails? So much literature of this kind is published now, that it seems hardly fair not to refer to other papers and magazines that are equally deserving of mention, but space forbids.

One of the most assuring signs of the coming victory for national prohibition, however, is the recent attitude of Congress. So amazing has been the measure of progress that we are not surprised, though a trifle amused, when an influential magazine—a rather recent convert to prohibition—expresses a fear that the movement may be spreading too fast; and while urging the submission to the States of a votes for women amendment, seems to doubt the wisdom of applying the same principles to the elimination of the traffic in intoxicating drinks.

Both "suffrage" and "prohibition," however, were temporarily side-tracked by the Congress just adjourned in order to give the right of way to measures regarded as more imperative. But never before have the nation's law-makers at Washington been so fearless and so united in their legislation against King Alcohol. Following the decision of the Supreme Court in support of the Webb-Kenyon inter-state commerce law, Congress passed the "bone-dry" law, making it unlawful to use the United States mails or any other public carrier as a means of delivering or transporting liquor in or through any State wherein the traffic in intoxicants for beverage purposes is forbidden by law. The same law also closes the mails to liquor advertising in prohibition States. And, furthermore, the plebiscite of Alaska, taken at the election last autumn, having shown by a vote of nearly two to one that the people of Alaska want prohibition, Congress passed such a law for that territory to become effective First Month 1, 1918. This also is a "bone-dry" law, as desired by the people.

But the crowning act of prohibition legislation by the recent Congress was that affecting the District of Columbia, whereby all saloons are to be abolished from the District after Eleventh Month 1, 1917. This is not one of the so-called "bone-dry" laws, however, but by closing the saloons and outlawing the traffic in intoxicating drinks in the nation's capital, great encouragement will be felt by prohibitionists throughout the land. It puts the national government on the side of the majority of States, and not with the minority holding still to license or local option. It was intimated by such papers as the Evening Bulletin (Philadelphia), which in an editorial attempted to ridicule the measure, that the vote would be "a test of the attitude of Congress toward national prohibition." Let us hope it was,

Now what of the future? Certainly those who have labored faithfully according to their opportunity and capacity during the past twenty years or more for total abstinence and the suppression of the liquor traffic, have many reasons for feeling thankful. Apparently the great reform has passed the stage of being a local or State issue and has become a very compelling national issue, with the outlook favorable to nation-wide prohibition within the coming ten years. "It's coming" is now the assertion we hear on every side. How tremendous is the psychological effect of such a feeling when it pervades the minds of friends and foes alike. Yes, it is no longer "Absurd!" "Impossible!" "Impracticable!" but undoubtedly "It's coming" sure enough. Slavery was abolished long before the anti-slavery amendment was adopted by the States, and it is quite within the limits of possibility (some say it ought to be done) for Congress to give us prohibition by statute at once. The issue will not down. Efforts to side-track it, smother it, delay it, confuse it with other issues, all have been employed by skillful politicians with fortunes at stake, and yet both Committees—one of the House and one of the Senate—have reported the prohibition amendment with the recommendation that it do pass. Who can say what may happen after once the great issue gets fully and fairly before Congress for decision? Certainly the spectacle of the gradual overthrow by peaceable methods of a great nefarious business, solidly entrenched in social customs and buttressed by vast commercial interests is a most interesting and inspiring spectacle.

ALCOHOL BIG BOOSTER FOR BLOCKLEY.—Speaking at the dedication of the new tuberculosis pavilion of the Philadelphia General Hospital—"Blockley"—the other day, Henry M. Gratz said:

"Ninety per cent. of the inmates of the Philadelphia General Hospital are here to-day because of intemperance. If the liquor traffic was properly restricted for three years the hospital could close its doors.

"Among the flotsam and jetsam that finally drifts to us are many who have known better days. There is a man in one ward who is translating the Gospel of St. John into Hebrew!

"In another ward is one of the foremost Shakespearean scholars in the country, destitute and ill!"

THE INDIANA PROHIBITION measure is not a "bone-dry" law. It allows the possession of one gallon of liquor and twelve quarts of beer. It permits a person to give away liquors to guests in his own home. It does not prohibit shipment of liquor into the State, in accordance with the Supreme Court decision on the Webb-Kenyon law. The manufacture and sale in the State is permitted of beverages containing one-half of one per cent. alcohol, the thing which caused so much trouble during the first years of prohibition in Georgia and other States. These weak spots in the law must be corrected before Indiana will have real prohibition.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.—(Unpublished Reminiscences by the Daughter of William Latimer)—William Latimer and Abraham Lincoln were chums, calling each other "Abe" and "Bill."

When Abraham Lincoln was a boy he worked hard for his father a large part of the day.

A neighbor had cows that were not good citizens. They trampled the crops and broke the fences, so their owner wanted to get a boy to tend them, and came over to Lincoln's father. He said perhaps Abe could do it for him, so Abe was interviewed, and after a little thought said, "Yes, I can do it, in this way. I will get up two hours earlier each morning, and do my father's work by noon, and then work for you."

So the contract was made that he should receive a quarter for the week's work. At the end of the week he was eagerly grasping his quarter, holding it in his pocket for fear it would get away from him. On reaching home he took it out with great pride to show to his family, when he found with it a little silver five cent piece such as they used in those days, smaller than a dime. He said, "This is a mistake, I must take it back to-morrow." The next day he told his employer that he had given him too much and offered him the five cent piece, but he answered, "Oh, I want you to have that, that's all right, you deserved it." But Abe was not willing to keep it, saying he had contracted for the quarter and that was all he was willing to take, though at the time he was anxiously saving every penny to buy—what do you suppose? A book. What book? The Life of George Washington.

Abe and Bill used to study and work in front of a great old-fashioned fire-place, and one night when Abe was about twenty years old, and stretched on the floor studying, Bill said, "What are you doing this for any way, Abe?" and he answered, "I expect to be President of the United States."

Now children of to-day have exactly the same chance that Lincoln and George Washington had, and within limits can be what they determine to be, by always living up to their best.

When Lincoln and Washington went to school it is hardly likely that they thought of how they were going to turn out in the end, but one thing is sure, the fact that they were honest boys led to their being chosen President.

When Lincoln had completed his law studies, and was starting a new law office which he had furnished with an unpainted pine table and chairs, made by himself, he had just five cents left in his pocket, and had to pay for his office rent, for lighting, and heating, as well as to feed and clothe himself. One day a rich man entered his room and said, "You are Mr. Lincoln, I believe, and a lawyer?" Lincoln answered, "I hope to be."

"Well," answered the rich man, "I am in trouble and I want you to get me out of it. My son has got into bad company, taken to drink, and last night got into a drunken quarrel, broke things up generally in a saloon, windows and furniture, and finally slashed up a man with a knife. Now I will pay you a hundred dollars to prove his innocence."

Think how big that money must have looked to Lincoln, with only five cents in his pocket, and all those bills to meet, but he seems not have given a moment's thought to that. On the contrary he turned on the rich man, asking, "Do you mean to say that your son actually did all these things, and finally killed a man, and that you expect me to prove he didn't?"

"Yes," was the reply, "for I cannot have the family name brought into such disgrace."

Our readers know well enough from Lincoln's character that he could not touch a cent of this man's money, much as he needed it.

Bad citizens often tried to bribe Lincoln to have laws made which he knew were not good, but he never would yield. He was once offered five thousand dollars yearly increase in his salary if he would get a law passed which he was entirely opposed to, but he answered, "I am not here to make money, but to help my country and its people. I want only money enough for food, clothing and shelter."

Though Washington was rich while Lincoln was poor, he also, when commander of the Continental Army, gave up his whole salary to his country, as he did not need it himself and was such a good citizen he wanted to help his people. In his "farewell address" Washington gave this thought, "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations, cultivate peace and harmony with all."

May the example of these two noble men help our young people to be the same kind of citizen, doing everything for the greatest good of the greatest number instead of for their own selfish ends.

"By spiritual birth we acquire a Divine heredity, as truly as by natural birth we acquire a human heredity."

WHY I REMAIN A FRIEND.*

REBECCA CARTER.

To some of us here this afternoon this question is a familiar one. We know perhaps why we remain Friends, but do we often discuss our reasons with one another? Do we know why this or that one of our acquaintance is a Friend? Do we care enough about our particular communion to make it a subject of careful thought and serious discussion?

Do we think freshly on the whole subject; for instance, do we stop before using a well-known term and test it to see whether it has any real meaning for us?

I think that Quakerism, the ideal Quakerism, is very close to the ideal of Primitive Christianity. In their simplicity of speech and manner of life the early Friends were closely following the spirit of that little group of disciples who "had all things common." Their strong sense of fellowship and brotherliness reflected the ideal of the Fatherhood of God, which Jesus had indelibly impressed upon the minds of his disciples. Even as the little group of early Christians turned to their invisible Master for guidance, so these people turned instinctively to the voice of God in their own hearts as the final authority in all things.

Then I think that Quakerism has a special message to the Christian Church as it exists to-day. We all long to be free from everything that is narrow or dogmatic in denominationism, but we must grant that denominations seem to meet a present need in the world's development. Now what does our particular communion contribute toward the life of the Church Universal? If it can contribute nothing it has no further excuse for existence.

First of all, of course, we stand for that intimate communion with God which makes outward forms seem unnecessary, because they fall so far short of that which they attempt to express; and for the naturalness and simplicity of the spiritual life which can claim the truth of the lines:

"Closer is He than breathing, Nearer than hands or feet," because they are born of actual experience.

Resting squarely on this ideal of the indwelling of the Spirit of God is our belief in Silent Worship. There is so much going on everywhere to-day that we need to take time, plenty of time, to listen to the voice of God. We must train our spirits to quietness or we may miss some of the greatest joys, some of the deepest truths that we ought to understand.

Long ago I heard someone say; "Responsibility is a form of creative power." In the ideal Friends' meeting the responsibility for its success or failure lies not upon one or two individuals but on every person present. If there are those who are indifferent or disinterested in the group it is harder for others to really worship. On the other hand, where all meet with a united purpose the life of the meeting quickens perceptibly and all present feel that they have contributed something to the perfection of the whole.

Dr. Henry Hodgkin says: "The Church needs to be reminded perpetually that the ministry is not the work of a class, but of all and that the service of Christ is not a profession, but a freewill offering." If we believe fundamentally that the ministry is not the work of a class, but of all we will enter our meeting-houses with a consciousness that we must minister to those gathered there. I am speaking now, not exclusively of vocal ministry, but of that service of heart which every man, woman and child can render to the meeting.

You know the story of the stranger who went into a Friends' meeting for the first time? He sat for a long time waiting for something to happen, and finally turned to the man sitting beside him with the question: "When do the services begin?" His answer was: "When thou and I begin to serve."

That is exactly it, we must all serve or our meetings will miss their rightful power.

Now how can we prepare for this service? Let us suppose that throughout the day's work our first desire has been to maintain that incessant touch with God which may be as simple and natural as life itself. Then the hour of worship with others will be full of real service.

Let us go a step further and imagine that as the days have gone by we have honestly hungered and thirsted to know more of God's power. Let us suppose that during our ordinary day's work we have occasionally felt it flowing through us.

Then—if we really care—it may be that sometime we shall be granted another privilege, unworthy though we may be; that of simply and naturally being His mouthpieces in the meeting for worship.

We may, perhaps, express to others the spirit that has covered the group or speak a word that meets the particular need of someone present. Whatever the message may be, whether gathered from a recent experience, or whether it comes as a fresh inspiration, let us receive it with thankfulness and deliver it with simplicity. We are to be channels, that is all, just channels, through which, from time to time, God may send His messages.

I know of no other denomination where the power of the individual and the fruits of his personal experience are recognized to the extent that they are in a Friends' meeting.

Another point which I wish to emphasize is the fact that we as a Society stand for the ideal and the visionary as opposed to the expedient and the practical.

Particularly to-day, when to be worth anything at all in the eyes of the world, a person must be efficient above all things else, we need young men who are not afraid to be called fools and dreamers because they are following the guidance of a Higher Power.

In closing, I wish to quote the words of John Wilhelm Rowntree: "Religion and life must be one or neither is anything."

I think that in this brief sentence lies the hope for our present situation. We believe in Quakerism for one reason or another, we recognize the doctrines of the Society when we hear them discussed, but have we made them so completely our own that we are thrilled about it?

Do the things that we believe make us long tremendously that someone else may believe them too? Do we know what it is to be on fire with eagerness to knowmore of the power of God?

I think that some of us here do. Now how can we set about sharing what we have? How can we "get the meaning across?"

The Founder of the Christian religion left no organized plan, very few rules, no written records. His method was just to live so that everyone near Him would be inevitably and completely drawn to Him, so that they would "catch the contagion" of His presence and be filled with longing to share His riches.

Can we improve on His plan? Or can we in the midst of this restless, eager, twentieth century, really and truly be "that kind of people?"

NEWS ITEMS.

OUR Society has furnished many remarkable examples of activity in old age. T. Wistar Brown and Joshua L. Baily will be remembered as two notable examples. The following from the American Friend mentions one who in a sense belongs to the same group:

Timothy Nicholson, of Richmond, active and alert in his eighty-ninth year, is the dean of the lobbyists of the Indiana Legislature, and "the noblest Roman of them all." He has a keen scent for the unsavory bills proposed, and once on their trail their prospects drop at once far below par. He has also been a positive force in the securing of such progressive legislation as that providing for prohibition, the constitutional convention, and women's suffrage. He has an almost uncanny reputation for ubiquity. It is nothing uncommon for him to take a five o'clock train for Indianapolis, spend the day among the legislators at the capitol, and be back at Richmond in time to attend some evening meeting in which he is interested.

THE American Railway Literary Union for suppression of pernicious literature has been noticed in THE FRIEND from time to time. William

G. Hubbard, of Sandy Lake, Pa., is superintendent and treasurer. We quote the following from his report:

"ENCOURAGING CONDITIONS.—The Superintendent has traveled several thousand miles the past year, visiting railway centers of the East and of the West. He is glad to report that he found most of the railway systems in commendable condition. Only one of the large systems had much matter on its trains and news stands that was objectionable. The officials of that road are in hearty sympathy with our work and remove all that we ask them to. But news companies sometimes put on pernicious literature without the railroad officials knowing it, but they remove it promptly when we notify them."

A LETTER from Alice Paige White refers to a recent fire at Friends' Meeting-house in High Point. It appears that the greater part of the interior of the building was destroyed.

NEWSPAPER EVANGELISM.—(A New Way of Preaching the Gospel)—Inspired by the convictions and sacrifices of a Christian gentleman, who is not a Methodist, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church is now developing a plan to preach Christ through all of the newspapers of the world, by furnishing free copy of interesting evangelistic matter, aimed directly at the conversion of the soul. This gentleman offers $5,000 in case $50,000 is raised to make a fair trial in Japan, Korea and China, and at least $15,000 more, in case $1,000,000 is contributed by all Christians, to prosecute the work among all nations except the United States. As this work is to be world-wide and age-long, omni-denominational and exceedingly economical, all lovers of the Lord, in all churches, are invited to contribute liberally to this method of winning the world to Christ. A column in a secular weekly newspaper for a year would cost but little, and would reach a great multitude of readers, many of whom could not be reached in any other way, and would yield great results under the blessing of God. Annuities will be given to donors if desired. Address George M. Fowles, Treasurer, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

We join The Friend (Honolulu) in the suggestion that it will be well to request the President and Congress "to create a non-partisan commission of not less than five members, whose duty it shall be to study the entire problem of the relations of America with Japan and China," and "to invite the Government of China and the Government of Japan each to appoint similar commissions." This suggestion, it is understood, would be welcome to the Japanese.

A MEETING FOR YOUNG FRIENDS.—The Young Friends' Committee which has been in existence during the past year, has received several requests for the holding of a meeting for our younger members in connection with our approaching Yearly Meeting. The Committee fully approves the concern, and having obtained the approval of the Elders of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, proposes holding on First-day afternoon, Third Month 25, 1917, at three P. M., at the Yearly Meeting-house, at Fourth and Arch Streets, a meeting for Young Friends, devotional in character.

The purpose of this meeting is not merely preparation of spirit for the exercises of the Yearly Meeting, but the strengthening of our whole spiritual life. The situation that confronts our Society, our Nation, and the world, means that we must get a stronger hold on our Spiritual Resources, and get nearer to God.

Those interested are asked to bear this meeting closely on their hearts, individually and in the groups of our Younger Friends which exist in some localities, and to extend this information to any who may fall to see this notice.

A LETTER OF JOHN G. WHITTIER, 1869.—AMESBURY, Eighth Month, 1869.—MY DEAR FRIEND:—I was very glad to receive thy letter and for the opportunity of reciprocating its kind remembrance of our brief acquaintance.

The pressure of many cares and duties, illness, and I may also confess, a deep sense of my own deficiencies as contrasted not alone with the perfect purity of the Great Exemplar, but with such a devoted follower of Him as John Woolman, have deterred me from the task to which thy letter invites.

Yet it is often on my mind, and if my life is spared awhile longer I may do something of the kind. I have now before me an unpublished work upon John Woolman by Dora Greenwell, of England, author of the "Patience of Hope," which I may yet find a publisher for.

For myself I cannot follow the "new lights" of our day. Whatever my shortcomings may be, I believe in the distinctive doctrines of Quakerism—the indwelling Spirit—the Christ within—the simple faith of such men as Woolman and other old worthies; unillumined by that the letter is indeed dead and dark.

I am truly thy friend,

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

LOCAL.—A definite step toward the establishment of the Gary school system in Philadelphia was taken last week, when the Committee on Elementary Schools authorized Dr. John P. Garber, Superintendent of Schools, to prepare a plan for introducing it into sections where part time is in force.

In an extended opinion covering several typewritten pages Judges Butler and House, of the Chester County Court, issued a decree and order making absolute the rule to close the four hotels in Coatesville and the two in Downingtown for violation of the laws.

The price of hogs last week reached the $15 mark. Several sales were made at the Herr's Island stock yards, Pittsburgh, at $15.10 per hundredweight. Not in memory of the oldest stockman here can it be recalled when hogs on the hoof sold at so high a figure.

GENERAL.—Probably 50,000 persons saw President Wilson repeat on the east front of the Capitol on the 5th the oath of fidelity he took the day before in the building itself. He came out to the east front from the Senate chamber, where he had participated in the inauguration of Thomas R. Marshall, the first Vice President to succeed himself since John C. Calhoun. He delivered his inaugural address, and then went to the reviewing stand, where he reviewed a military and civic parade that lasted four hours, in which 19,000 men were in line.

When Spring comes no horses will tramp along the towpaths of the Empire State's Erie Canal. The horse-drawn canal boat will be a matter of history and its place will be taken by the swifter propelled vessel with its train of barges. Over this cheap highway can come freight from the Great Lakes to New York City, and it is to be demonstrated whether the latest expenditure of $101,000,000 for making the canal deeper and broader, so that big boats may pass through, has been justified.

Three States since the first of the year have granted limited suffrage to women, making fifteen States where women vote on all elective offices and for Presidential and elective offices. These States are North Dakota, Ohio and Indiana.

According to figures compiled by the Wellesley College News, the average student of the college spends about $1200 a year for tuition, board, clothes, amusements, etc.

Electric power sufficient to turn every wheel and illuminate every dwelling and factory in New York State could be developed from the water power which is running to waste every day in the rivers, streams and canals of the State, Attorney General Woodbury declared in his annual report submitted to the State Legislature. He estimates a daily waste of 750,000 electric horsepower on the Long Sault Rapids and along the line of the barge canal. He urges the Legislature to establish a policy by which the State will reap some benefit from this stupendous resource.

There was an increase in the total number of train accidents last year—from 10,387 to 12,674, in fact—and the total number of persons killed on the railroads from all causes rose from 8621 to 9364, and the number of injured through all causes rose from 162,940 to 180,375.

An exhibit of school work from South America has been installed at Teachers' College, Columbia University. It includes the work of pupils in the primary and secondary schools of Argentine, Uruguay, Paraguay, Chile and Peru. The material was collected by Dr. Peter H. Goldsmith, director of the Pan-American Division of the American Association for International Conciliation, which is a branch of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

FOREIGN.—Business failures in Great Britain during 1916 were in number actually the smallest in more than a quarter of a century. The total of 3,210 insolvencies compared with 4,864 in 1915, with 5,510 in 1914 and with 11,022 in 1893, the maximum of this generation.

During the past three years, according to London estimates, the greatest rise in commodity prices has been in vegetable foods, which, in 1916, were 92 per cent. higher than in 1913.

At Croydon, England, G. L. Beasley was fined £50 ($250) for attempting to send a letter to America otherwise than by mail. He gave the letter, concerning a munition scheme, to a Belgian widow to take across on the steamship Philadelphia and mail in New York.

Three out of every four people in South America can neither read nor write. In Brazil the rate of illiteracy is 71 per cent.; in Argentine, 50 per cent.; in Chile, 63 per cent.; Colombia, 80 per cent. The rate of illiteracy in the United States is 7.7 per cent.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY, 142 N. SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA, will be open from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. and from 2 to 5 P. M. Seventh-days from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. only.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The stage will meet at Westtown Station trains leaving Broad Street (Penna. R. R.), Phila., at 6.30, 8.21 A. M., 2.45 and 4.30 P. M.; other trains will be met on request. Stage fare twenty-five cents each way. To reach the School by telegraph, address West Chester, Bell Telephone, 1016.

LANSDOWNE MONTHLY MEETING will be held on the 22nd instead of the 29th, so as not to conflict with Yearly Meeting week. This has been adopted as a regular course in the future to avoid the conflict.

WOMEN FRIENDS of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are invited to a United Fellowship Conference for deeper consideration of our responsibility to the Yearly Meeting.

This Conference will be held at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on Third-day, Third Month 20, 1917, at 2.30 P. M.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"Religion is the first thing and the last thing, and until a man has found God, and been found by God, he begins at no beginning, he works to no end. He may have his friendships, his partial loyalties, his scraps of honor. But all these things fall into place and life falls into place only with God. Only with God. God, who fights through men against Blind Force and Night and Non-Existence; who is the end, who is the meaning. He is the only King."
—H. G. Wells.

LOOKING FORWARD TO YEARLY MEETING.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is near at hand. What is that to thee, oh fellow member? What is it to me? Is it, in fact, anything to us that we are successors to the men and women of these parts who for over two hundred and thirty years have come together annually in solemn assembly? Is it anything that thus they met with hearts and heads bowed with a sense of their weakness, or lifted up as they realized that the King of Glory had come in? Aiming to do their duty in their own day, they could but dimly foresee the long results of their deliberations, affecting our lives profoundly. May we look back with grateful hearts.

But we are looking forward. It is well. The advice of a Friend given in Yearly Meeting in bygone days comes to mind: "When we arise in the morning," said she, "let us say to ourselves, 'This is meeting-day. This is meeting-day.' Keep that fact before you, and let it shape your thoughts and actions. Let them help you to have a good meeting."

So now as the great assembly approaches we feel that we should be getting ready for it. What do we desire in order to make it a good meeting? First of all, this—that when so many come together of one accord at the same place it may be a hallowed time when our deepest needs are ministered unto. That the universal longing of the human heart for something more strengthening, more uplifting, more comforting, more compelling than anything we have heretofore known may be realized. We want pre-eminently the Divine Life which quickens all things. Let us then "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem;" that "the peace of God which passeth all understanding may keep [our] hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

This year the threatening future calls loudly to us, "Quit you like men. Be strong." The church cannot afford to do less than conserve its whole strength. It must be equal to the task looming up before it. None of us can afford to let this testing time find us indifferent, inefficient, "weighed in the balance and found wanting." "The Lord has need of thee," is the appealing language to each. Our place may be humble and hidden, known only to the Father who seeth in secret, or it may be important and openly recognized, but the need is the same that each should crave to be made equal to what the occasion requires. Oh, the grandeur of the thought! The whole of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting coming up with all its varied gifts and powers to lay them at the heavenly altar to be used in the help of the Lord against the mighty? If all of us are animated by this desire, come what may, our hearts shall not fear.

Nevertheless, it may be that some of us are agitated over possible changes in the administration of affairs or other customs. There are those who favor changes as marks and means of progress, and there are those who deplore them as signs of declension, a weak yielding to unworthy influences. Let us look this troublesome matter straight in the face. Let us be honest with ourselves and with others. Let us be willing to acknowledge that sincerity of purpose dwells with the advocates and the opponents of change. Nay, let us do more. Let us try sympathetically to see the other side. Open-mindedness is a great virtue—up to a certain point. There may come a time when conviction has so seized us that we cannot get rid of it; we are in its grasp beyond escape. Is it not well to have strong convictions? Is it right to be forever driven by the wind and tossed? Should our eyes be given to see and our hearts to conceive the immutable principles of right, on these there must be no wavering. It is not for us to trail our banner in the dust when these are attacked.

But sometimes we are unduly weighed down with the thought of changes that involve no fundamental principles, and are only a different route from the old of arriving at the same end. The earth swings ever onward. There is no standing still. New occasions, new conditions are presented, new causes become significant, and old ones die a natural death. Happy is he with the clear vision to see which means, be they old or new, are best fitted for these variations. But "be not too bold." Why? Because a change to be worth while must do more than be as good as the old way. It must have that excess of merit which will make up for the waste of power involved in the readjustment of relations. And may all our changes from a worthy past be "not by revolution, but by evolution."

Finally, I think we should not be known unquestionably as advocates of either the old or the new, but rather as advocates of truth wherever it may lie. Here then in the regulation of our attitude toward the spirit of change is one thing more for which we may crave our Heavenly Father's help in the coming Yearly Meeting.

A. S.

In looking forward to the time for the gathering together of our Yearly Meeting there is a lively concern upon my mind that we may be able to know a right preparation for the service. There is reason for us to be greatly exercised each for one, as to our place and service in the troubled condition in the world at this time, and this should help to bring us into that attitude to be most helpful in the gathered church.

As we find in the Advices the recommendation to present ourselves in a lively frame of mind at our Meetings for Worship; we understand this to mean a spiritual exercise. This means faith in our Lord's promise to meet with us and so we look to be helped. Again from our Advices, "In conducting the affairs of our meetings, as it is the Lord's work, let it be done as in His sight." These and the Advice which follows them indicate clearly that the preparation and the qualification are to be experienced in the true waiting state. Thus helped we will be enabled to "manage them in the peaceable spirit and wisdom of Jesus" and know an increase of true love for each other.

Of course we expect the business coming in regular order to be presented in due form. This should be the result of other meetings which have been held and conducted under the same concern and exercise.

The reports of Committees of the Yearly Meeting are important as indicating the performance of the service to which they were assigned, and the service of the meeting in accepting or rejecting what is proposed by them must be guided by heavenly wisdom or it will be but human effort. Some who appear to accept the true purpose and design for our meetings for worship seem hardly to understand that the same authority is over the Meeting for Discipline. I have read the statement of one of deep experience in these matters—that he needed the same clear evidence to speak to the business of a meeting as to speak in the ministry. Let us come together if we are spared to meet at the appointed time, with hearts and minds prepared by and in exercise, to do the Lord's work as in His sight.

This thought seems to me to bring us very near to our dear Heavenly Father and to exclude any other purpose in our view. The result of other preparation will be a hindrance to the true object of the meeting and tend to disqualify the individuals for their part in the work and service and peace intended for the faithful. Having observed with deepening interest for many years the course of our Yearly Meeting, and having seen from year to year how the great Head of the Church removes the standard bearers at His will and having felt the loss many times, I have often had my faith renewed by seeing that He has raised up others for His own work.

Let us come up in living faith to the work of the Lord in our day, looking unto Him who has been its author to be its finisher.

THE modern revival of interest in agriculture has had a marked effect in the Society of Friends. Many of our younger members have had courses in one or another of the famous State Colleges, and the stimulus of their more scientific viewpoint has affected both the aims and methods, of farmers amongst us. So many of our readers share in this revived interest, that it has seemed proper to solicit some articles for THE FRIEND from this field. We are not proposing to conduct an agricultural department, although even that might be a legitimate innovation for us. If occasionally we hear from some of our trained farmers we believe our paper will be enhanced in value as a "home" weekly. The first of these articles appears in this number over the signature of Hiram Haines.—Eds.

MINUTE OF FRIENDS' FREEDMEN'S ASSOCIATION IN REGARD TO JOSHUA L. BAILY.

Since the last meeting of our Board, the Friends' Freedmen's Association lost, through the death of Joshua L. Baily, a friend, who, on account of the length and character of his services, occupied a position that was almost unique. Although not one of the actual founders he was a very early member of the Association and Board. He served on it for many years, and maintained his active interest in the work to the end of his life.

A recount of the positions which he held would be an impressive index of the work he has done, but would fail to record the peculiar quality of his usefulness. To our particular problem of Negro uplift he brought an unusually clear and forceful intelligence animated by an unflinching faith in the possibilities of human advancement,—generous native qualities of mind and heart which were trained and enlightened by a wide experience of political and social reform and many-sided philanthropy.

Whenever an important problem confronted us his statesmanlike qualities of leadership were manifested. At the critical points in our later history, such as the purchase of the farm, the necessity of raising money for new buildings, and just a year ago when we started the campaign for the $50,000 Endowment Fund, he always took a strong stand for forward movements. With broad, clear vision he saw and advocated the wise course. He gave generously and induced others to do so. Above all, his example and devotion were an incalculable inspiration to his co-workers.

It is not too much to say that we owe to him and his lifelong friend, Elliston P. Morris, the Association's continued existence. In the period following the gradual transfer of the numerous day schools which the Friends' Freedmen's Association had supported to local management there was a time of rapidly diminishing interest and activity, which seriously threatened the Association's life. It was their plan for an industrial school, their hard work to establish it, and to interest a new group in the work, that successfully carried the Association over this critical period.

It has been a rare privilege to share the labors, generous enthusiasms, and unflinching optimism of Joshua L. Baily. Let us honor his memory by forwarding to the extent of our abilities the cause which he had so much at heart.

The Secretary is directed to send a copy of this minute to the members of his family with an expression of our sympathy on account of their loss.

NOTES FROM THE SOUTH, No. 7.

JOSEPH ELKINTON.

The coldest wave for twenty years, which extended to Miami, Florida, with a temperature of twenty-five degrees Fahrenheit, on the first and second of Second Month, has left most of the orange trees frost-bitten, with the fruit spoiled for shipping and yet the people have borne this visitation with great fortitude. And nothing of the distress and disappointment which followed the severe freeze of 1894-95 has been seen or heard among them. Meantime great advance has been made in growing citrus fruit by grafting on sour orange roots and protecting the trees from frost and insects, while vegetables have come to be almost as important as oranges and grape-fruit and pineapples. The development of the State of Florida during the past twenty-five years is one of the most interesting and significant of any in the Union and the movement for good roads is a real index. This has been emphasized by one who was here thirty-two years ago, viz.: "You see to us of the cold frozen north, it seems incredible that anyone anywhere can be riding about evenings in open motor cars; and when I think of the roads of Florida as I knew them in the early eighties and picture old John Gill and his mules dashing madly back and forth to the Ocklawaha or the station on the Leesburg Road (round trip in twelve to sixteen hours), the present conditions seem like the return of Aladdin with his wonderful lamp. Well, in a way, the wonderful lamp is still at work, but this time via the wonderful oil of John D., and what is a lamp without oil anyway?"

"The last time I was in Orlando was in 1885, I think, and the citizens were proud of a new steam fire engine, they talked of nothing else, the editors and reporters wrote of nothing else and the stranger was urged to walk around and view the wonder by the time he had registered at the hotel, for in that day there was but one you would care to stay at, long. So after supper I was escorted by a band of willing helpers that enthused and gushed over the monster to their satisfaction. Later in the evening, sitting on the veranda, 'the cry of fire rent the peaceful evening air,' the whole town went crazy, ran for the machine, swept it into the street and there she stuck in the sandy road—and for all I know, is there yet. It was when I left on the early train the next morning. It must have weighed 4000 to 5000 pounds and they forgot their roads when they bought it. Hence 'the good roads movement,' in Florida, I suppose, which now gives you so much comfort. It surely seems absolutely unbelievable—these tales of expensive limousines sweeping up the electrically lighted boulevards to the gay campus on a summer night in the tropics.

"But don't I remember the beauty of those days and nights!—and the sunrises! 'Equalled by few and excelled by none' is the testimony of my experience in many climes and seasons."

The same day that these lines came to hand one of the editors of THE FRIEND, with Wm. B. Harvey, accompanied the writer in an auto on brick roads for two hours to the neighboring communities of Winter Park, Maitland, Altamont, accomplishing in two hours what required George Abbott and his appreciative guest of ten years ago a half day to drag through the sand, behind a horse that seldom attempted to trot.

Now we have hundreds of miles of brick and clayed roads in all directions and four hundred houses added to this county seat during the past year. But more than all this material prosperity and convenience is the character of the people, who come in ever increasing numbers from the colder North and West. We have gathered on First-days some seventy-five or eighty strong at "The Osceola"—having outgrown the room in which we have met for years at George Abbott's former home. His daughter, Elizabeth, has organized the Florida Peace Society and last evening we enjoyed its annual supper, when Dr. Hall, Sectional Secretary of the American Peace Society, stationed at Atlanta, Ga., presented the needs of the hour. He addressed 250 persons on the 25th inst., in the Methodist Meeting-house of Orlando and the week before some 2500 who gathered in the large auditorium in Miami. And it was said many were turned away for lack of room. So it is manifest that a large number of persons in Florida believe that the patience with which our President has met the international situation will eventually contribute more to the settlement of the world-wide conflict than "either we or any other nation could have contributed by acting strictly upon traditional standards." Indeed, the time will come when it will be recognized that "America was the first powerful nation that refused to have immediate recourse under provocation, adjudged ample by the world, to the methods of settlement of the primeval age."

The readers of THE FRIEND may recall our visit to the Seminoles, living in the Everglades, a year ago, and may be interested to know that their claims have been presented by the Indian Rights Association to the Federal Government, which has made grants of money amounting to $13,000 for their use, and the Florida Legislature, soon to be in session, is likely to set apart 100,000 acres for their occupancy and raising of crops and herds, to be free from molestation.

The day has at last arrived when these Indians feel some confidence in the good intentions of the white man. When recently conversing with Minnie Moore-Willson, of Kissimmee, she said our visit last winter had helped to convince these Indians that the United States Government was disposed to protect them in their homes, and for the first time in their history, they have consented to let their children attend school.

She has recently written a concise account of these Indians in pamphlet form, under the title of "Least Known Wilderness of America—the Everglades of Florida"—"dedicated to you who feel a thrill of patriotic pride in lending a helping hand to the down-trodden and the oppressed." (The Claud F. Johnson Publishing Co., Kissimmee, Florida, 1917.) In her appeal for this remnant of the once powerful tribe of Seminoles—some 600 in number—she says: "America has been eyes to the blind, an almoner to the poor, a protection to the widow and orphan, and yet, in 1843, under the sacred emblem of this same starry banner, the Seminole made a peace compact with the U. S. Government under the direction of our President. The Seminole was 'to occupy certain areas and to forever abstain from all acts of aggression upon his white neighbor.' The Seminole has never broken that treaty He believes and knows that the land of Okeechobee is his by right of treaty and he cannot understand the merciless driving force of the white man."

Matthew K. Sniffen has also done a notable service in publishing an account of the present condition and needs of these dwellers in the "Grass Water Country" of lower Florida—based upon our observations last winter—as an appeal in their behalf by the Indian Rights Association, endorsed by the Commission of Indian Affairs.

There is an Indian legend that The Big Snake of the Everglades—a "Hooded Cobra"—has never ceased to champion the rights of the sovereign inhabitants whenever an invasion of enemies threatened them. When the Spaniards came this monster reptile lashed his tail and "unsheathed his armored sword," causing such a tempest that the aborigines took refuge in the secret morass until the invaders passed on, and in like manner when the French and English appeared on these trackless waters. A tremendous thunder storm, bestowing a deluge, while this account is being written, has brought the Seminole chieftain's description of this snake to mind—"So big no man can tell—head, big ojus, with horns like the great owl, and eyes look like flames of fires," and how he still believes this Big Snake will yet restore to him his lost domain. While the Seminole is being pushed on and on, while he is pauperized, homeless and even hungry, he still has the faith of a little child and looks to the day when the Big Snake will win the final battle of supremacy and the white man will retire in utter defeat as did the people of olden days, when American history was young. Then with his children and his squaw, free from the driving brute force of land—oeverglade drainage—speculators, he will live as in the days of old upon the rich islands and hummocks, happy and prosperous.

"The channels his forefathers cut through the watery sawgrass prairies will be his cypress canoe 'car line'; his gleaming camp-fires will cast only holy shadows; in the mystic solitude of Nature he will see God in the skies and hear Him in the winds; the wild game will return to its lair; the eagle, the flamingo, the horned owl will nest in his domain, the silvery fish will glide through the Seminole canals of crystal water; the stars will lift the lids of their twinkling eyes to smile down upon the toddling papposes, and the mystic religion of this ancient people, mingled with the creed of the Christian, will make the Seminole an Acadian type, burnished by the fires of century-long affliction, still worshipping the Great Spirit who has given this Pay-hay-o-kee country to his red children, and over the seven colored rainbow of the heavens—the Highway of the Great Spirit—he will make the Last Journey to the Happy Hunting Grounds of his fathers."

"ILLAHAN," Orlando, Fla., Second Month 28, 1917.

DIES IRAE—DIES PACIS.

Only through Me! . . . The clear, high call comes pealing

Only through Me can Life's red wounds find healing;

Only through Me shall earth have peace again.

Only through Me! Love's might, all might transcending,

Alone can draw the poison fangs of hate.

Yours the beginning! Mine a nobler ending—

Peace upon earth and man regenerate.

Only through Me can come the great awaking!

Wrong cannot right the wrongs that Wrong hath done;

Only through Me, all other gods forsaking,

Can ye attain the heights that must be won.

Can we not rise to such great height of glory?

Shall this vast sorrow spend itself in vain?

Shall future ages tell the useful story—

Christ by His own was crucified again?

WHY I REMAIN A FRIEND.*

C. R. CARY.

I am a Quaker because Quakerism places its emphasis upon the spirit which should animate a man rather than upon the beliefs of the man. Creeds and dogma, catechisms and confessions are far from us. This attitude is, I know, not without an element of weakness, but as far as I am concerned it has been a religious life-saver.

In some respects at least I feel free to consider myself a typical product of our present educational system. I make this statement on the strength of my acquaintanceship with many men of many circles. Our educational system has for its goal the development of a race of clear-thinking men and women impregnated with a love of truth. The ideal of intellectual honesty is its finest concept. As a result its true products, and I firmly believe that a majority of the present generation are more or less in this class, will remain outside the borders of the Church rather than violate their intellect by trying to force themselves to place credence in beliefs and doctrines which seem to them to be utterly contrary to reason. I believe that many of the rest of you are in this class, too. I cannot truthfully recite the Creed—that epitome of Orthodoxy—to-day, but I must add that I am much nearer the point where I can do so than I was not so very long ago. That I am is due, humanly speaking, to the wise and gentle instrumentality of our Friendly custom. Therefore, I remain a Friend.

Think how seldom doctrinal points are dilated upon in our meeting. Think of the loving consideration shown by those who are the leaders of our meetings for the beliefs of others. I wish that I might quote the words spoken by George Warner in our School the other day when at the conclusion of a lesson touching on some of the most points of higher criticism he expressed himself in no uncertain terms concerning his own belief, but went on to voice most definitely and beautifully the concern that none who failed to agree with him in his belief should feel that because they did not agree with him they were therefore less members of Christ's church. This attitude, cultivated by the true spirit of the Society of Friends, more than any other bond holds my allegiance to the Society.

Have you ever stopped to consider the general tenor of the sermons, long and short, delivered in our meetings? There are but few words which have to do with the beliefs of the hearers and infinite concern for their spirits. It is to me a splendidly rational attitude. "It is the spirit which quickeneth"—the spirit in which we pursue any secular enterprise in large measure determines the success of the enterprise. "Be ye fervent in spirit"—does a lukewarm person succeed at anything? The spirit of love and unity, the spirit of prayer, the spirit of truth and then the summation of all, the spirit of Christ. Beginning with those effects of a man's spirit upon his life which we can weigh with our minds and explain with our reason, we are then brought face to face with effects which we can only partially comprehend, and finally are confronted with effects which are explainable by no process of reason or logic. There is nothing irrational about it—super-rational is the proper description.

Yes, friends, it is hard for us to realize it, but there is a power which is at once back of the Universe and at the same time internal to my life and to your life, which can by no process of reasoning be explained; if we would seek the truth about this power we must recognize this fact; we must put aside our pride of mind, recognizing its limitations and say with the Psalmist, "It is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain unto it," or to use New Testament language, "We must become as little children."

I can best illustrate the limitations of the human mind when it would seek to penetrate into a field in which it is utterly inadequate by citing a conspicuous example. Can any one of you bring forth a logical explanation which will satisfy himself, much less anybody else, as to how and why a poor peasant with no politics nor influential friends, who never wrote a book nor invoked the aid of art, music or literature, who in all his short life of thirty-three years never attracted the attention of any but those of a narrow and bigoted provincial circle, and who was finally hung, with a couple of robbers, how such a peasant could so fix his imprint upon the world that even his most hostile critics admit that his has been the dominant influence in subsequent shaping of the world, while the most intelligent and progressive part of mankind even date their letters and count time from His birth? I, for one, am perfectly sure that there never can be a process of mental reasoning which can yield a satisfying answer to this world mystery, simply because it deals with a phase of truth which is above human mind and reason.

Men have from time immemorial interested themselves in this phase of truth and have called it religion, and have framed for themselves a language in which to discuss it and have built up a description of the results of this or that procedure, but as all this has to do in large part with the experiences of the individual it is as Greek to those who have not entered those experiences which embody the spirit of it all.

Here is where it seems to me that the Society of Friends is wonderfully wise, for the attempt is made over and over again to bring its members into, and keep us in the spirit of it all and the spirit of it all is embodied in the spirit of Christ, which spirit words, reason or systematic theology can no more bring home to a man than a botanical description of a flower can bring home to his senses the perfume of that flower. Both are matters of experience. Can we come into, keep alive and cause to grow that spirit which enters into as the result of actual experience, our beliefs may be trusted to take care of themselves. Saint Augustine once said, "Love God and then you may do as you please," meaning that you cannot then approve of any wrong course of action or of life. By that same token, he whose spirit is in increasing measure in tune with the Spirit of Christ is by that spirit guided toward truth—"he is given to know of the doctrine."

No sect applies this concept with more vigor and consistency than does the Society of Friends; no concept is more vital to my religious life; therefore I remain a Friend.

THERE IS A SORT OF pride and self-reliance, which is apt to grow on us, as we grow older, especially if we have been prosperous, and are esteemed, and feel ourselves skillful in our several ways of life. We shall never be truly good and happy until we have learned to put all this away from us, and to think more, far more, of any simple, innocent child than of ourselves, and all the worldly-wise men of our acquaintance.

—J. KEBLE.

MINUTES OF PEACE COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, SECOND MONTH 14, 1917.

A meeting of the Friends' Yearly Meeting Peace Committee was held on Second Month 14, 1917, at 3:30 P. M. Twenty-six members were present.

The first subject under discussion was the character of the report to be presented by this committee to the Yearly Meeting. The following suggestions were made and referred to the Executive Committee to guide them in preparing the report:—

(1) That the reading of the report should occupy about twenty minutes.

(2) That the report should cover both a brief review of work done and a forward look toward the future, suggesting new plans for mobilizing our Christian forces in the cause of peace.

An invitation received from the American Union against militarism was read. It asked us to send delegates to a conference of the peace societies of this city and requested that such delegates be instructed in regard to a proposal to federate the societies and to finance joint meetings and other undertakings. It was left to the Chairman to appoint two or more delegates with the understanding that such delegates in representing this Committee should not assent to any federation which would compromise our identity.

An invitation from the American Peace Society was read, asking us to send delegates to a conference to be held in New York City under its auspices on Second Month 22, 1917. It was decided not to send official delegates, but to let those members of our committee, who expressed themselves as expecting to attend, lend such help and strength as possible to the meeting.

The Governmental Relations Committee reported that it had as a body taken no action in the present crisis between America and Germany; but that telegrams had been sent to Washington and other measures had been undertaken by numerous Friends, including one or more members of that Committee. With regard to Mexican affairs, the Chairman reported that he had so far obtained news of two students prepared to take advantage of the scholarships offered by the various co-operating colleges. He also stated that it seemed best to defer the proposed tour to Mexico until summer. Henry Ford has written that he will be glad to make arrangements for a meeting with representatives of our Committee in the near future.

The Churches and School's Committee reported that efforts were being made to secure peace speakers at the meeting of the various synods, boards and ministerial associations. Efforts are likewise being made by this Committee to have lessons on International Good Will introduced into the International Sunday-school Lesson Series. Members of the Committee working in different neighborhoods have made speeches on peace before school gatherings, have distributed literature among teachers and have helped institute peace essay contests.

The Chairman of the Literature Committee made the following report:—

The Chairman of the Committee on Churches and Schools and the Chairman of the Literature Committee were appointed to act with the Committee on Governmental Relations in following up the Military and Physical Training Bills now before our Legislature.

The Meetings Committee reported that a successful afternoon and evening meeting had been held at Race Street Meeting-house on the evening of Second Month 7th, at which Isaac Sharpless and others spoke. The Committee likewise reported that arrangements were being made to hold a peace meeting on Fifth-day evening of Yearly Meeting week at 3:04 Arch Street. As the report of the work of the Peace Committee is expected to be read at the afternoon session of the Yearly Meeting on that same day, it is hoped to hold the audience on the premises by arranging for a supper between the session of the Yearly Meeting and the evening conference. The meeting then adjourned. ANNE GARRETT WALTON, Secretary.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS IN OPPOSITION TO MILITARY TRAINING FOR SCHOOL BOYS, PREPARED BY GEORGE H. HALLETT, PH.D., PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS, UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Some of the arguments which have been made in opposition to compulsory military training in the public schools may be summarized as follows:

1. There are at present too many subjects in the school curriculum. A new subject should be so co-ordinated with one now holding a regular place that a division of time between the old subject and the new is possible.

Military training cannot be so co-ordinated and if introduced can only result in the elimination of one or more of the standard subjects from the school curriculum.

2. Specialists in physical training give evidence that for boys of school age military training is not only an inferior form of training, but is also often positively injurious.

3. The most militaristic of nations have judged military training for school boys to be an unwise expedient.

4. The absolute and automatic obedience which military training demands removes from the individual the necessity of judging of his own actions. The effect of such obedience is to retard that rational self-expression which is man's highest duty.

5. It is impossible to separate military training from its ultimate object, war.

6. The effect of military training on the boy at his most impressionable age when the power of suggestion is a maximum is to create a fixed desire for that military display and those military movements which belong to war and in the end lead to war.

7. Compulsory military training belongs, by implication, to a system of education which ascribes to brute force the dominant place. It is, therefore, in the final analysis, in opposition to every agency for the promotion of universal peace and international good-will.

8. Military training for children fosters in the child mind the idea that the chief service one can render to his country is military service.

9. Many of the leaders in the educational world who believe that some form of general military training is necessary are opposed to the introduction of such training in the public schools.

10. Military training in the public schools is opposed to the best traditions of our American democracy.

11. Real preparedness for national safety does not come through the technique of the military drill; it results rather from the physical and mental control which the normal boy acquires, in part, through his school work and, in part, through his school play.

12. Military training in the public schools is of little military value. To become of value it must be supplemented by a period of additional training. All that is necessary, in a military sense, can be acquired in this additional period.

BOY CONSCRIPTION.

WM. C. ALLEN.

There is, to many minds, a difference between compulsory military service for adults and that for boys. This article specifically calls attention to the latter.

An article entitled "A Challenge to Christians," recently issued by the Commission on Peace and Arbitration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, quotes from the Seven Seas, the organ of the Army and Navy League, which largely stands behind the military propaganda. "World empire," says the Seven Seas, "is the only logical and natural aim of a nation. . . . It is the absolute right of a nation to live to its fullest intensity, to expand, to found colonies, to get richer and richer by any proper means, such as armed conquest, commerce and diplomacy." Here then is the use that many ardent backers of preparedness, whatever may be their ostensible, or genuine, patriotism, desire to put our boys to. Are their parents going to stand for it? Shall our patriotic and well-meaning legislators be thus misled? Shall our Imperialists thus make wealth out of our boys?

The same article calls attention to the tragic moral conditions associated with military training camps at home and abroad. It says: "The situation is appalling."

John F. Hills, M. A., Glenelg, S. A., Australia, who is a well-known educator, makes the following strictures respecting compulsory military discipline for lads in Australia:

"You fine, strapping area officer, looking into the eyes of that bright, tender youth whom you are instructing in the way to thrust a bayonet into a human body, does it ever occur to you what mental anguish you inflict on the finest young souls, and how you imperil weak ones by overwhelming them with that worst atheism, a crushing disbelief in human nature?"

"The specific military training of boys must brutalize them, for there is constantly present the thought: 'I am going through all this prodigious preparation for the purpose of being able to kill my fellows.' Show-off is the life blood of parade."

Hill refers to statements of General Baden-Powell, who is known to the boy world that loves him, and who says in his "Scouting for Boys" that "drill makes boys wooden." He also speaks of the moral risk on the parade ground or in camp that results from enforced companionship with the worst elements of society:

"Your boy cannot pick his mates, as at school; he must stand where ranked. Fortunately, at school the influence of the bad is reduced to a minimum, the better sort of boy can join his own set and associate as little as possible with the bad. But not so in this military machine for leveling down. Those whose company your son has to share are chosen for him. He is placed, generally speaking, where military requirements require that he shall be. He may have to stand at every drill between lads whose language reveals a familiarity with all forms of vice and crime."

Handing the boy over to the military man shows a pitiful bankruptcy of ideas in the field of education and civics. "Boy conscription is a farce, a pitiful semi-tragic one."

Physical training for children of both sexes is urgently needed and is absolutely possible without military equipment or suggestion. Such conserving legislation is now being considered at Sacramento and should be encouraged by every thoughtful citizen.

Military training for boys has been tested in other countries and been disappointing as to results. France dropped it from the curriculum. Germany relies upon gymnastics for her boys. Experts, such as Dr. Sargent, Director of the Hemenway Gymnasium at Harvard University, who is generally acknowledged as the highest authority on physical training in America, condemn it. The burden eventually falls heaviest on the poor. It strikes at freedom and, if enforced, often conflicts with the rights of conscience in parents and children. It has been called by a New Zealand clergyman "paganism in excelsis." To maintain it, a disturbing propaganda of international fear or jingoism has to be kept up. Our educational system should be free from military influences.

Whilst deploring the situation in Europe we ourselves must not yield to the malign sway of the military fear and spirit. America must be consistent.

Bills are now before the California Legislature providing for compulsory military training in our high schools. There is also at least one bill providing for universal physical training in our public schools. Should not careful parents and others immediately write to their Senators and Assemblymen, protesting against the undemocratic and dangerous measure of military training and at the same time favoring any conserving legislation that demands universal physical training for our children? Now is the time to speak.

"You are as near Heaven as you are far from yourself."

SUFFERING SYRIA.

[Emily Oliver has kindly furnished the following extracts from letters of her husband and others. The situation is almost too painful to read, but there is an undoubted service in making the facts known.—Eds.]
FROM DANIEL OLIVER, FRIENDS' FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION.

RAS-EL-METN, Lebanon, Beirut, Syria,
Eleventh Month 26, 1916.

"It is sometime since I have done any writing because I was obliged to give my eyes a rest. I had overdone them and Dr. Webster insisted on perfect rest, so I have not done any writing for over a month. I am glad to say that my eyes are very much better, and now I am beginning very cautiously to read and write again. I went down to Beirut last week and spent most of the week as the guest of Dr. Adams, and I saw Dr. Webster twice. When I came away he was very pleased with the improvement and prescribed additional treatment which I am now using, and I hope in a few weeks more the trouble will have totally disappeared. My general health is excellent, and I have nothing to complain of, but very much indeed to be thankful for."

"Among all the strife and death and sorrow, God alone remains 'the same yesterday, to-day and forever.' I am reminded of the beautiful Arabic proverb which says, 'Nothing remains permanent but the face of God.' How true that is."

"We have had very little rain so far; it is just like summer still. In consequence the garden has some flowers."

"My life is full of work and activity. The evenings I have felt pretty long, since reading has been impossible for me, but that dearest of all pleasures, reading, I hope to be fit for soon."

"With Dr. Webster's approval, I am using the most powerful and stimulating remedies that medicine knows, and though the improvement is slow and tedious, yet there is steady improvement, and I hope in time things will be all right again. Fortunately, I am able to go on with my ordinary work, but alas, reading and writing are almost impossible, and I should find life very insipid and dull if I could read no more. Owing to the use of cocaine in my eyes six times a day my vision is so distorted that it is difficult for me to strike the right keys on the type board; however, in a few weeks this will have passed, for all things pass. That is also an unchanging law, that here below there is no permanence in anything."

"Change and decay in all around I see,
O Thou who changest not, abide with me."

"I am not sure whether I am glad that this is so or not; perhaps, on the whole, I am glad, for there is so much in the world that is intolerable if it were to remain, and yet, on the other hand, there are things that one would wish to remain always. These poor eyes of mine are telling me that I cannot go on much further. The wind is howling outside and I am sitting in my old castle in the room above the gateway, surrounded with the pictures of my dear friends, some of whom are in Heaven long ago, and my book, and 'Jack' lying on the floor on a cushion fast asleep, my medical friend who lives with me, and seems as much devoted to me as 'Jack,' is lying on an easy chair, reading 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' and I am clicking on a typewriter to you and my thoughts dwelling on the fact that I am such a rich man. How does that picture strike you? Did you think I was melancholy and sad? Not a bit of it. If I were, I would not be of any use to any one or to myself. For me, life may be short, and at times I think it will be so beyond a doubt, perhaps very short, but short or long, it is bright and sunny because I have learned to look beyond the things that vex and annoy, and there is an inner sanctuary that cannot be disturbed by things that are outside of me."

On First Month 12, 1917, a radiogram was received from Berlin to Tuckerton saying: "Daniel Oliver excellent health, undisturbed word."—DR. ANDREAS WALTHER.

"Word" is evidently a mistake and should read either "work" or "ward." I understand that Dr. Andreas Walther is a German officer stationed on the Lebanon, who has been very friendly to my husband, and has sent this telegram to Berlin for him as more likely to come through in his name.

Since then a letter dated Ninth Month 14th has come through in which my husband acknowledged the first check of $330, the gift of Friends here, which I sent him last Eighth Month. He says he has used it in buying flour and it is very acceptable. I am glad to say it is still possible to forward funds and we are sending another check this week.

E. O.

Al Hoda, the Arabic New York daily, in its issue of the ninth inst., prints in full two letters from Syria which were smuggled out by a kind-hearted German missionary returning to Germany, and which he mailed in Denmark, thus eluding the censor. The letters are from American missionaries now in Syria. Their names are withheld for obvious reasons.

"It is probable that this letter will be the last I can send you, and this one only by the kindness of Brother B—, who pledged me this one should reach you. After this it will be impossible to have any connection with the outside world excepting through the Turkish government.

"The aid we received from America has been distributed, and the amount was so small compared with the appalling need that it seemed infinitesimal. We are doing all in our power to alleviate the woeful suffering. Our family lives on two meals a day. All over that we distribute among the hundreds who surround our houses begging for something to eat. My donkey is much emaciated from having so little to eat. We soon shall be reduced to just enough to keep us alive, that we may serve this poor people, giving of what we have to the many needy and destitute.

"Your friend, — [a minister], fasted twenty days that he might give his portion to others, and then died himself of hunger. His family is still alive and living with us. The contagious diseases, hunger and more work than we can possibly do, threaten the lives of all missionaries here. We expect to die, and then this unfortunate people will be left with no one to help or serve them.

"In the Lebanon districts alone 250,000 have starved. I visited Junieh recently (Junieh is a town of some 10,000 near Beirut), and sought from the officials permission to help as I was able in relief work. They told me that in the town and just outside there were 5,000 dead. A village two miles distant did not have one inhabitant left alive. As I visited among the Lebanon villages, I found the want greater than anywhere else in Syria. The Wali of the Lebanon sent for me and thanked me for what I had tried to do. He asserted that 200,000 had died of hunger, but by this writing the number has increased to not less than 250,000.

"The city of Tripoli, Syria (Trablos) has lost one-half of its population of 30,000 from hunger and disease. Hums (a town of from 80,000 to 100,000 and the terminus of the railway from Tripoli) has added another 10,000 to the death roll, sixty per cent. of whom were women and children.

"In some places the inhabitants set a guard lest anyone come and try to get the grass and weeds, now covered with snow. I passed yesterday through a village where half of the homes were covered with snow, an indication that none of those dwellings were alive. (If the snow is not removed from the dirt roofs when the thaw comes they leak badly.) Your friend in Hums, H—, died of hunger, and we endeavored to save his property for his family, but were not successful. For a time we fed them, but cholera came along and they all died. There are only three doctors left in the city, and when we sent for them to come to this family, not one responded (perhaps because there were no medicines to give them). A very common sight is two bodies in one bier borne to burial. Pray to God for Syria and its people, that there remain at least a remnant of those we have labored among and love."

(To be concluded.)

FARM TRACTORS.

There are said to be over one hundred makes of farm tractors in this country, and the industry is growing by leaps and bounds. Large sums of money are being invested in the production and marketing of tractors, and farmers are expected to pay the dividends by purchasing the output. Before they begin to pay this big bill, farmers would do well to consider and discriminate.

Before buying a tractor a farmer should answer a number of questions. Is my farm large enough? If three teams are required now, it probably is, especially if the teams are idle a part of the year.

Is my ground adapted to a tractor? If very hilly, no. If the soil is very sandy, probably not, on account of poor traction and also excessive wear. On well-drained gravel, loam or clay land a tractor should pull the load.

Could my hired man run a tractor? It requires a man of a little more intelligence than the average teamster has to run a tractor properly. He should have a general knowledge of the principles of the gas engine, as well as some natural mechanical ability, for best results. I think it is only just to share with labor the saving resulting from improved machinery, and the better wages paid the tractor driver should attract a better grade man than the average farm hand is in these days.

Will a tractor do the same work cheaper than horses? Yes, while the tractor is new. At least that is the way it figures out on paper. The gas and oil bill will be less than the price of the hay and corn that the horses replaced by the tractor would eat during the year. But there are possible contingencies which may alter some cases. The tractor will not do all the work of horses, and some horses would have to be kept for certain purposes. Then there is the very important consideration of the depreciation of the tractor. Some manufacturers put the life of a tractor at five years. It is not likely to be any longer than that. And what will be the cost of repairs during those five years? No one knows. It is claimed that a tractor requires less care than a horse. It is true that it does take less care when not at work. While being used, a tractor takes a man about as long to care for it as the number of horses which it displaces would.

Will a tractor do as good work as teams? Yes, if it is a good make it will. It should be able to lift or permit of lifting the plows so as to plow out square the corners of the fields. It can work as hard in hot weather as at other times, and that is a big advantage over horses. It will get over a great amount of the hardest work and do it very thoroughly. It will do most of the farm field work except row cultivation. Of course, it will do many kinds of stationary power work.

What make of tractor shall I buy? Will it be a three or four-wheel, a one, two or four cylinder; should it use gasoline or kerosene? These are technical questions on which experts differ. My advice is to buy a tractor made by a reliable firm well established in business. An agency should be near enough to supply repairs promptly. A field demonstration is an interesting spectacle, but not a test to buy on. Learn all you can about the machine you are interested in from someone who has used one of them at least one season. Above all, do not take the agent's word, unsupported by evidence, for what a certain tractor will do, or what it will cost to run it.

Even if the best judgment has been used in selecting the make and size of a tractor, the success of its operation will depend largely on the kind of care it receives, and on the judgment, patience and ingenuity of the man who operates it.

Owing to the constant heavy duty, a tractor needs oil and grease applied oftener than an automobile does. Some parts require such applications every five hours or oftener. Only oil best adapted to the machine should be used. With tractors using kerosene oil, in which the combustion chamber reaches a very much higher temperature than when gasoline is used, it is necessary to use a special cylinder oil of high fire test. When kerosene is used for fuel the water is heated and evaporated more rapidly than with gasoline, and should be closely watched to prevent its becoming too low for efficient cooling. Plenty of the right kind of oil and grease, applied often, with care to exclude dirt and grit, is most important.

Do not overload your tractor. Overloading is probably the most frequent cause of premature wear. Experts sent to demonstrate tractors are often guilty equally with the farmers of this serious fault. They want to make their machines show up well. It is a temptation to a farmer who is pleased with his new power plant, to push it to its limit, in order to gratify his sense of superiority over team work. The man who practices the fault of overloading, will be the first to throw his machine in the fence corner, and condemn it and all who created it.

Just what overloading consists in should be judged by the operator, following the directions of the manufacturers, and by careful observation. It would be much wiser to do a little less than the manufacturers claim, rather than more.

When a tractor gets in a tight pinch it cannot exert the comparative power that horses can under a few moments' strain. For this reason a tractor will reach its limit sooner than a horse, although both will show bad effects from continued overstrain. The tractor, therefore, has a load limit which is less elastic than that of the horse.

A well-designed tractor will get enough traction on firm ground to pull the normal load. The slipping of the drive wheels is a factor of safety which helps to prevent overloading. The extension rims and lugs are added to maintain normal traction on soft or sandy ground. When they are used on firm ground, great care must be taken to prevent overloading. The wheels cannot then slip so easily to relieve excessive strain. Driving with the extra lugs on is something like running a boiler with the safety valve tied down. The slowing down of the engine will then indicate overloading.

Ten years from now we shall doubtless look back on the present tractors as very crude affairs. And yet we must admit in fairness to the makers, that those now on the market are the result of a number of years of experiment and trial, and they are proving to be practical and efficient. The tractors have reached a stage where they are serviceable and reasonably economical under careful and intelligent operation, and greater perfection will naturally come with increasing use.

HIRAM HAINES.

NUMBER OF C. O.'S COURT-MARTIALED.

The Home Secretary, in reply to questions on the fifteenth ult., gave statistics of great interest. The number of men sent to civil prisons as conscientious objectors after court-martial he gave as 3,025. Of these, 2,369 have been reported by the Central Tribunal to the Home Office Committee and 339 have not yet been examined. This leaves 317 not accounted for. Of the men reported to the Committee, 2,297 have been or will be offered work of national importance, again leaving a discrepancy of 72. Presumably these are the men judged "not genuine."

Out of the 2,297 men offered work under the Home Office Committee, 265 declined it, 1,731 have been released and 284 are awaiting release. One hundred and one who accepted work have subsequently refused to work or have broken the conditions on which they were released, and have been sent back to prison or the army.

FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED.

At his court-martial at Portsmouth, Malcolm Sparkes made the following statement:

"I want to make clear at the outset that, in anything I may say, I do not abate for a moment my respect and admiration for the brave men who have joined the colors under a high sense of duty. My own call has seemed to lie in a different direction. I have been led to try and make a stand for the sacredness of human life and for the now sadly discredited cause of international brotherhood. And in order to do this

I felt it right to throw up a good business position and prospects, rather than compromise on this vital matter, although I could have had a war service badge which would have exempted me completely from the operation of the Military Service Acts. I claim no merit for this, any man with the same convictions would have done the same; many have made far greater sacrifices both in the army and outside. I merely mention it in order to show that my position is something more than one of merely passive resistance, and was not taken up without full knowledge of possible consequences.

"When ordered to put on my uniform I informed the sergeant-major that I was a member of the Society of Friends (commonly called Quakers), that I believed all war to be wrong and that I must therefore respectfully decline to obey any military orders or to undertake any form of military service. I added that I had already stated my conscientious objection before the proper Tribunals, but had failed to obtain the exemption to which I am entitled by law. Now these allusions to my conscientious objection to the undertaking of all military service, only state the purely negative side of what I believe to be the most positive thing in the world. And this negative side, important and in fact essential though it is, fades into comparative insignificance beside the positive side of the position which I want, if I can, to put before you now."

"I stand here reverently to witness for the heroic Christianity of Jesus Christ; for the belief that the only way to overcome evil, is to conquer it by indomitable love and unwearyed service. By this I mean a love that never admits defeat, that goes on loving and serving regardless of risk, regardless of possible consequences—in literal interpretation of our Master's orders—'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you.' It will no doubt be urged that such a belief is hopelessly Utopian and idealist, and cannot be brought down into the practical world of to-day. But I would reply that if this war itself has taught us anything, it is that those very things that we used to think Utopian and idealist are, in fact, the only practical things. To translate them into constructive politics is indeed our master problem. But I am convinced that it can be done, and that there is no problem, social, industrial or international, that will not yield to scientific organization supported by faith and constructive good-will. Why is it impossible, this mobilization of good-will for the service of humanity? It is only so long as we think it is not worth trying. Is it not worth trying? Is it not in fact the only thing that is worth trying? It would be grave presumption on my part to assume that I was possessed of any special capacity for idealism. I make no such pretensions; I am convinced that what I can see, others can see, and nothing will persuade me that the world is not ready for an ideal for which I am ready. Truth is more to me than victory, and if the great forces of love and service are ever to triumph over those of fear and mistrust, someone must try to make a beginning. I am anxious to take my place amongst those beginners, and shall count it a privilege to make sacrifices and if need be to face punishment, in such a cause."

M. Sparkes has been sentenced to twenty-three months' hard labor and is now in Portsmouth Civil Prison.

A VISIT TO THE PRESIDENT.

About 150 delegates from the twenty-two leading peace societies of the United States met in New York City on Second Month 22nd and 23rd, for a conference on the best co-operative means of promoting international peace.

A committee reported recommendations for certain measures to be adopted in the present emergency. One of these provided for the sending of a delegation to interview President Wilson, and urge upon him the unanimous desire of the conference that he should continue to keep the country out of war and to settle the existing disputes with Germany and Great Britain by peaceful means alone.

This delegation consisted of William I. Hull, chairman, Jane Addams, Joseph D. Cannon, and Emily G. Balch.

The President accorded the delegation an hour's interview on the afternoon of Second Month 28th. It was a time of very grave national tension, and the President talked most feelingly with the delegation, but as he pledged its members to hold in entire confidence whatever he might say, no statement of his side of the conversation can be given. It might be of interest, however, to give in outline the message which the delegation presented to him.

Dr. Hull emphasized a number of historical precedents for the peaceful solution of exceedingly difficult international problems. Among these were the precedents set by Washington, John Adams, Lincoln, and President Wilson himself. When the French Revolution and the French Revolutionary War was raging in Europe, and a large portion of the American people sympathized with France and desired to become its ally against Great Britain, President Washington sent John Jay to England, and succeeded in negotiating a treaty with England which settled some of the outstanding disputes between the two countries. Jay was burned in effigy in America, and his treaty was extremely unpopular—an unpopularity which Washington shared. In spite, however, of the contumely which his political enemies heaped upon Washington's head, the mature verdict of the American people has been that Washington's greatness never shone brighter than on this occasion.

Four years later when the great European tempest was still raging, and even a majority of the President's own party under the leadership of Alexander Hamilton were determined to fight France, President John Adams sent commissioners to negotiate with the French Government. Although armed conflicts between French and American ships had already occurred upon the sea, Adams was successful in settling the dispute with the French Government. This was done in defiance of his own party, and indeed of his own cabinet, and cost him all chance of re-election to the Presidency; but he said in a letter written a score of years later that he would rather have inscribed upon his tombstone the words, "He kept the country out of war," than the record of any other event in his long and illustrious career.

The historic precedent set by President Lincoln in surrendering Mason and Slidell to the British at a time when the country deemed that they should be held at the risk of a war with England, and the settling of the Alabama claims by means of arbitration, were also recalled.

Finally, President Wilson's own success in keeping the country out of the European war, and in tying over the Mexican crises by means of the conferences of Niagara Falls, Washington and Atlantic City was recalled, and the conviction was expressed that the approval of these peaceful triumphs of the administration had been registered by the country at the last election.

In view of these and other notable precedents, Doctor Hull ventured to urge that two joint commissions of inquiry and conciliation should be appointed to negotiate with Germany and Great Britain, respectively, a modus vivendi relating to neutral rights and duties—possibly in line with the Declaration of London—until the end of the war. This attempt might seem especially helpful for the reason that both Great Britain and Germany have endorsed in principle the offer of the United States to investigate and settle by conciliatory means disputes which might arise between them; and also because such an offer would seem so reasonable to the people of the two belligerent governments that those governments could not well decline it.

Jane Addams emphasized especially the anxiety and distress of the German and Austrian immigrant families domiciled within our country, and mentioned several moving illustrations which had come to her personally in connection with her work at Hull House in Chicago. She quoted some of her immigrant friends as declaring that "your President will not go to war, because he is a man of peace." She also expressed her con-vinction that our country cannot be precipitated into war by the "hyper-nationalism" which has forced the European belligerents into war, because of the cosmopolitan character of our American population; and she made a fervent appeal to the President that the great program of social legislation upon which his administration has made so splendid a beginning should not be sidetracked or destroyed by leading the country into a military means of settling international disputes.

J. D. Cannon, a representative of the miners, especially of those in the far West, reminded the President that all of the political parties in the recent Presidential campaign had endorsed the President's policy of keeping the country out of war, and he emphasized especially the overwhelming advocacy of the peace policy in the Democratic Convention, platform, and campaign; and finally he assured the President that only a small minority of the people were in favor of the war, and that the great majority of the American people would support unwaveringly whatever peaceful method the President decided upon for a solution of the outstanding questions with Germany and Great Britain.

E. G. Balch expressed her conviction, on the basis of personal experience since the war began, that the German people were wholly adverse to war with the United States, and that if the President could decide upon some peaceful means of settling the dispute with their government, they would force their government to consider it.

After these preliminary statements were presented to the President, he entered into a very frank and earnest conversation with the delegation, in which he gave further convincing evidence of his earnest desire to find some peaceful means of settling our present international difficulties.

At the end of the interview, Dr. Hull ventured to express on behalf of the New York conference the hope that the President would utilize the first suitable opportunity, preferably in his inaugural address, to bring before the world again his program for international organization and the limitation and reduction of armaments which he outlined in his address to the Senate on the twenty-second of First Month last, and which has already made so profound an impression upon the mind of the world.—From the Friends' Intelligencer.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE sessions of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting are expected to begin in regular course under the new rule on Third Month 26th. The hour of the morning meeting is 10 A. M. On Third and Fifth-days the session of the Yearly Meeting is at 2 P. M. The Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders convenes on Seventh-day, Third Month 24th, and last year adjourned for a second session till Third-day morning at 10 o'clock.

AFTER an absence of five months visiting meetings and Friends in North Carolina, Ohio and Indiana, Abner L. Newlin and wife, Ella Newlin, reached home safely on the eighth of Third Month, grateful for the many favors received and the kindness of all with whom they came in contact.

A CORRESPONDENT from Florida says: "I have attended three of the First-day meetings here at the Oecola (in Orlando) and think they have been favored occasions. Last First-day I understand there were about eighty-one present."

THE Pennsylvania Arbitration and Peace Society had a meeting in Eleventh Month at Witherspoon Hall, on "The Purposes and Ideals of the Mexican Revolution." Since then addresses delivered by the Mexican Commissioners have been published in a bulletin, of much value because it puts this authentic information in permanent form. To those unable to attend the meeting it should be of double value.

Our readers mostly know the work which this Society is doing to promote international good-will and understanding in order that war may be honorably avoided.

A cordial invitation to become a member is extended by J. AUGUSTUS CADWALLADER, Witherspoon Building.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of THE FRIEND:—

I avail of this last opportunity through your columns of reminding the members of our Yearly Meeting that the report of the Peace Committee, presenting a carefully-prepared summary of its doings during the past year, is expected to be read on Fifth-day afternoon, the 29th. It is hoped that the attendance, especially of those in early life, will be large, and that the meeting may rise to the importance of the subject in this crisis of world history. No one of us can say to-day what will be the situation of our country to-morrow, nor what new problem or new duty will confront us. We must seek at the very Source for Divine wisdom, resolved that nothing shall come between us and Him.

Large preparation is being made for entertaining at supper all who will remain, and in the evening a public meeting will be held in the west room, for the instruction and inspiration of those who would be "peace-makers," in the fullest sense in which our Lord applied the word and to whom He promised His blessing. Let us bring in every one whom we can influence, who will give to the speakers a sympathetic hearing. If the capacity of the west room shall be overtaxed, the east room will be opened and the addresses repeated there.

Richard Roberts, recently Secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation in England, now minister of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, will present the claims of the peace propaganda on the spiritual side. Charles T. Hallinan, representative in Washington of the American Union Against Militarism, whose function it is to interpret the actions of the Executive, and the laws enacted and proposed to be enacted by the Congress, will help us to understand the conflicting purposes and motives of men and parties. We hope, too, that he may be able to bring us a message of hope of escape from the maelstrom of strife now ravaging the Eastern Hemisphere, and of a wholesome national influence upon the solution of the world problems which diplomacy and mutual conciliation must settle in the not remote future.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

A tornado swept over central-eastern Indiana on the 11th, killing more than a score of persons at New Castle and two children in Wayne County. The total number of injured was over 200, some of whom were probably fatally hurt. The damage totaled more than $1,000,000 at New Castle and several thousand dollars in Wayne County.

New York City is already getting some of the hundred-mile water of the Catskill Mountains. At a fire in the Bronx the pressure was so tremendous when the Catskill hydrant was opened that steam fire-engines stood aside as something out of date. They could not come near to forcing a stream to as high a point on a burning building as the hose that was attached to the pipes containing the gravity flow from the Catskill altitudes.

A farm tractor, which is declared to be the most compact thing in its line in the world, has been invented by P. O. Fredlund of Pasadena, California. This "vest-pocket farm tool" is a queer looking device with a single wheel. It is propelled by an air-cooled gasoline engine located within the single large wheel or frame, and which revolves around the main axle, upon which both the engine and the wheel run.

Correspondence between pupils of American schools and pupils of schools in the Argentine Republic was discussed by Ambassador Naon of Argentina and several Massachusetts school men in conferences held last week. The fundamental purpose of the international correspondence is to inculcate in the youth of both countries a better understanding of conditions existing in other countries, and to develop the spirit of international-mindedness as a foundation for the permanent peace conditions of future generations.

Support for six months for 725 Belgian children under seventeen years of age was pledged to the newly-formed Belgian Children's Relief Committee, of which William A. Law is chairman. PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

As usual the Yearly Meeting was preceded (on Seventh-day the 24th) by a session of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders. In addition to considering two of the four Queries, a report was received from William C. Allen of the completion of the religious service abroad for which he was liberated three years ago. This report was accompanied by a minute of the London Meeting for Sufferings. As outstanding features of the session the two papers are printed herewith.

SAN JOSÉ, Cal., Third Month 14, 1917.

THE YEARLY MEETING OF MINISTERS AND ELDERS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING:

Dear Friends:—I herewith return the minute granted to me and my wife under date of Fourth Month 21, 1914.

Many unexpected experiences have been our lot within the past three years. I last year reported as to labor in the Orient and Australasia in which our dear friend, William B. Harvey, participated. I now in a few words desire to tell of our simple task during the year 1916.

We left New York on the eleventh of Fifth Month, 1916, and returned to the same port on the eighteenth of Ninth Month, 1916. Most of the intervening time was passed in England. About four weeks were devoted to a visit to our daughter in Ireland.

We were told that we were the only American Friends who have visited England on account of religious service within the past two years. My work consisted in visiting Friends and meetings, with a few exceptions. I did not engage in peace work in England. There were a few seasons of enlargement in the ministry, but I was generally led into an elementary preaching of the Gospel. This is often humbling to preacher and congregation alike. Everywhere kindness awaited us. We could not but feel the stress of the exercises and sufferings of those among whom we moved day by day.

Our Women's Yearly Meeting of 1916 requested us to deliver a verbal message of sympathy and love to Irish Friends. We had not intended visiting that Yearly Meeting, nor had our credentials included doing so, but, in view of this commission of Philadelphia Friends, we decided to attempt it. The action of the military authorities made this effort impracticable. We meanwhile wrote to William F. Bewley, Clerk of Dublin Yearly Meeting, and in due course received a reply from him, on behalf of Irish Friends. The message from our meeting met with a cordial reception from Dublin where our brethren and sisters were assembled under a cloud of discouragement and military discipline. The lives of Irish Friends, and most of their property, had been preserved during the scenes of slaughter and destruction that had been witnessed during the civil war a few days or weeks previously.

It was pathetic in the English Quarterly Meetings, in the country that we visited, to see how Friends would ask if we would not soon visit the small country congregations to which they belonged. Many of these meetings have but little vocal ministry, and they gladly welcome the voices of preachers from a distant land. A change of vocal ministry seems to be a human need, and craving; and is generally appreciated among Christians everywhere. I was sorry, indeed, for the sake of those dear Friends that I did not apprehend myself led into closer fellowship with them,—because after all, it was largely fellowship they wanted. In London Yearly Meeting, as in our own, there are willing workers, but the laborers are few.

Those who love the Lord Jesus have an ever-flowing joy in their hearts which is little understood by those who serve worldliness and pride. Our English Friends have been passing through deep waters. Everywhere their speech and ministry were imbued with the strain, and sufferings, in the midst of which they lived. Injustice and jails, abuse and illegal persecutions are as familiar to Friends as they were long ago. Friends' meetings in prisons are again witnessed in England. But not once in public or in private did I hear unkind criticism of their persecutors. On the contrary the sermons or addresses we often heard abounded in appeals to maintain a spirit of love for all men, and especially toward those who afflicted them. Whilst this was the case they very often with humility would acknowledge their own past failures, and preach the need of repentance right among themselves to-day. "We ourselves must repent, and get right with God, before we attempt to lift others," was the insistent appeal in numerous meetings. So, whilst they have strained their energies and financial resources to assist the unfortunate they, at the same time, have been led back toward the cross-bearing and prayer that distinguished our fathers in the Truth over two hundred years ago. Shall we of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting before many years be called to the same position? Will our young men, in the not distant future, be ready to show that they are prepared to suffer or die for the Christian principles we profess?

There was among English Friends an intense desire manifested to know the Divine will with respect to action and expression. A simpler style of living on the part of many, and a quieter tone in dress and speech, have been an outgrowth of this feeling. The fellowship of suffering has brought Friends into a larger solicitude than ever on behalf of others. With a long vision they are deeply considering the possibilities of serving their country in the expected reconstruction period after the war. They think of the inevitable financial, social, educational and moral difficulties that will then face Great Britain. They hope that in the broad spirit of brotherhood and love they may help their country, as well as other lands that are so bitterly depleted by the sins and curse of war.

I was much impressed with the way in which our English Friends commenced their meetings of a semi-religious character, or committee work, with periods of silent waiting upon God. Occasionally in larger assemblies, when the strain created by divergent opinions among men and women of active minds and strong wills was apparent, the spirit of love was strengthened by reverting to not what they designated "silent prayer," but what they called "waiting upon God." The reward never failed them. It may be well for American Friends, in the midst of the temptations induced by busy lives, to hold to the same valuable custom, as in the past.

London and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings have many visible, and real, elements of weakness and strength. Both are a curious mixture of spirituality and worldliness. Both are capable of much service for Jesus Christ. English Friends have been steadied, and led into a larger unity, within the past three years. The periods of silence in their meetings for worship are frequently longer than those in some of our larger congregations. Their First-day evening mission meetings are still continued in some places and are generally attended by what is practically a different group of worshippers from those who attend the morning meetings. English Friends are in some respects different from us as a natural result of hereditary environment and social customs. But when we look below the surface, to the roots from which spring our faith and practice and our ideals with respect to worship and the ministry, we find that they and we are near to one another in the Lord. Our Master needs us more in the things that now tend to unify us than in the things which have separated us in the past. The future may reveal a definite need of closer union as we both contend for the world expansion of the Gospel of love. This is the sore need of Christendom to-day.

It was with thankful hearts that we once more gazed on the grey shores of America when they were outlined across the autumnal sea and realized that, with God's protecting love and care, our little service was completed.

With our united love to you,

Your friend,

WM. C. ALLEN.

MINUTE OF THE MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS, HELD AT DEVONSHIRE HOUSE, LONDON, FIRST MONTH 9, 1916.

Our dear Friends, William C. and Elizabeth B. Allen, were acceptably present with us at our late Yearly Meeting, and at various gatherings held in connection with it. Since Yearly Meeting they have paid visits in different parts of the country, including the attendance of eight Quarterly Meetings, numerous other meetings and visits to some of our Schools. They have also attended the Meeting for Sufferings several times. These visits and the service of William C. Allen in the ministry, also the accounts of their travels in other lands, have been much valued, and we believe that our dear Friends will return to their home in the Far West conscious that the Divine Presence has been with them in their service, and that a blessing has attended it. We part from them with thankfulness that they have been led to pay this visit to our Yearly Meeting.

Signed on behalf, and by direction, of the Meeting.

J. THOMPSON ELLIOT, Clerk.

ISAAC SHARP, Recording Clerk.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.

Printed copies of the minutes of Western Yearly Meeting, held at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Indiana, have been received from the Clerk, Luna O. Stanley. We print the following brief extract:

MINUTE OF ADVICE.—As we have again convened in the capacity of a Yearly Meeting, we have been brought into a deep exercise for the welfare of the church. We have been reminded that the welfare of the church depends upon the faithfulness of the individual members. If we are filled with Christian love one for another, then we can forgive a brother his trespasses, until seventy times seven. We can love our enemies and do good to them that persecute us and despitefully use us.

We have been encouraged to be diligent in the attendance of our meetings, both on the First-day of the week and the mid-week meetings.

We were also encouraged to read a portion of the Holy Scriptures daily in our families, followed by a time of worship. This we verily believe will add much strength to the church.

The meeting has been deeply exercised on account of the terrible war that is raging across the sea, and we have been tenderly admonished to stand steadfast for our principles of Peace, not wavering in the least, that the world may know our view on the subject of war.

WHAT TO DO.

The heart is the crucible, the Spirit of God is the fire. The dross is consumed only as God's fire is applied. Thoughts can be cleansed and purified only as the affairs of life are weighed in the balances of eternity. God's voice cannot be heard in the confusion of the market place or in the babel of the pulpit and press, but in the silence of the heart. Individual, national and international affairs must be viewed from above. To get the layout of the city of Washington one must climb the dome of the Capitol. To get a vision of the promised land, and the way to it, it is necessary to meet with God on Mt. Pisgah. Haste makes waste. To take the sword and deliver the Belgian children from further oppression might fasten the spirit of militarism on our own country and result in far greater bloodshed. The path from the Mount of Transfiguration may lead to Calvary, but what of it? First, last, and all the time, God's will must be done.—WILBUR K. THOMAS, in the American Friend.

BOSTON, Mass.

A NEW PHASE OF CHRISTIAN DUTY.

[The following from a recent number of the N. Y. Independent expresses what may seem to some as a natural outcome of the war conditions that have been so long prevailing on the other side of the Atlantic.]

One momentous consequence of the present war may prove to be that the national churches of England and Russia will find it easy to understand each other and to arrange some kind of co-operative union. At least the fear of this has apparently penetrated the Vatican and stirred the Pope to action. A statement made this past week by Dr. Palmieri, of the Library of Congress, and based, so the press reports indicate, on private advices from the Vatican, runs to this effect: That the Roman See, disturbed by the rapprochement between the Anglican Communion and the Orthodox Church of Russia, is about to launch under its own egis a movement for Christian unity.

A contributing factor in disclosing the progress of this parley between Russian and English-speaking Episcopacy is the cordial reception given by the Russian hierarchy to the proposal of a World Conference on Faith and Order, planned by American Episcopalians. Clearly the prestige of Rome would suffer an incalculable loss if there should be formed, apart from her, a union of all the other churches which claim apostolic orthodox and catholicity. One can imagine a confederacy of the Russian, Greek, Anglican and American Episcopalian churches, involving such a mutual recognition of each other's orders and beliefs, and such a common refusal to recognize the primacy of the Roman See, as would present to Rome a far more disheartening situation than the defection of all the multiplying sects of Protestantism. "Of course Rome cannot see with indifference," Dr. Palmieri is quoted as saying, "the growing friendship between Anglicanism and Orthodoxy."

One who studies this movement for Christian unity with an eye for the social forces working through it must perceive that this is a highly favorable time for such a coalescing of the churches. Social solidarity and individual liberty are the two poles between which all social life, ecclesiastical or not, is lived. In the history of the church Protestantism represented the movement away from solidarity to individualism. Milton's words in "Areopagitica" reveal with what ardent joy the privilege of forming separate sects was welcomed by an independent mind:

"What some lament of we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men to reassume the ill-deputed care of their religion into their own hands again. I fear that this iron yoke of outward conformity has left a slavish print upon our necks—the ghost of a linen decency yet haunts us. We stumble and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another."

But the swing back to solidarity is here at last. Many old differences between the churches have been outgrown until they seem as unimportant as the boundaries of ancient Indian tribes in a modern American commonwealth; the open avenues of intercommunication around the world are breaking through provincialism and are forcing a cosmopolitan spirit on the churches; the call for efficiency through co-operation is in the air and even the bigoted begin to see that agreement in purpose and fraternity in service may be hearty while identity of opinion lags behind.

Within Protestantism the resulting movement toward mutual understanding and co-operation is pronounced and vigorous, and now with Anglican and American Churchmen making overtures, not unwelcome, to Russian orthodoxy, and with the Pope determining to join the movement lest unity be wrought apart from him, how interesting the situation grows! What if the next stage, in part effected by the war, should be a confederacy of the English and Russian churches and the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, with the Greek Orthodox Communion, it may be, a member too, while an increasingly united body of Protestant denominations, aloof but sympathetic, watches the confederacy grow, and the Papal Church stands alone, insisting on the primacy of Peter's See?

"OPEN THOU MINE EYES."

Touch Thou mine eyes, the sombre shadows falling,
Shut from my sight the kindly light of day!
Out of the depths my soul to thee is calling,
Touch thou mine eyes, I cannot see the way!

Dark is the path, through desert places leading,
Alone I tread the wastes of doubt and fear;
Fainting I fall, with bruised feet and bleeding,
O touch mine eyes, that I may know thee near!

Fain would I see, as in the olden story,
Thy shining hosts encamped on every side;
Angels of light, armed with thy power and glory,
To guard my steps, whatever may betide.

Frail is the flesh that waits for thine appearing,
And blind the dust that turns to thee for sight;
Thy power must quicken earthly sight and hearing,
Thy word impart the Spirit's life and light.

Life of the life that hour by hour is dying,
In death, I live, by thy sustaining grace!
Father, who hearest all thy children's crying,
Touch thou mine eyes, that I may see thy face!

JAPAN FRIENDLY TO THE UNITED STATES.

[The following is a portion of an article in The New York Times, by Viscount Motono. It is printed at the suggestion of F. B. G. Branson.—Eds.]

Japan has always endeavored to maintain amicable relations with the Government and people of the United States. Although there have sometimes been dark clouds which slightly obscured our sky, they, happily, have been dissipated by the mutual good-will of the two Governments. There are certainly questions upon which they could not reach an agreement. These things will happen even among allied countries. But even these difficult questions, when handled loyally and frankly with the will to adjust them in an amicable and conciliatory manner, are sure to be capable of solution. This is the course which the two Governments have always pursued to the great satisfaction of our two countries. I note with great pleasure the symptoms of real sympathy manifested for some time between the two nations. Thus the proposal for common financial action in China has been made by American capitalists. The Imperial Government will follow with lively interest the development of the economic rapprochement between the two countries.

I need not remind you of recent events in China. But we must recognize that in consequence of these events a rather undesirable atmosphere has been created. It is necessary for the welfare of our two countries that this should absolutely disappear.

In view of the great political and economic interests which Japan possesses in China, Japan has always been actuated by the most sincere desire to see that country develop in the path of modern civilization, and with this object in view we have never spared our efforts to come to her assistance. It is for that reason that civil and military advisers were sent by Japan; and that she has concerted herself with other powers to procure for China the financial means for the accomplishment of all sorts of reforms, and that we are also engaged in the education and instruction of Chinese students who come to Japan in thousands. No one will deny that China owes much to Japan in her work of reorganization.

Why is it that on occasion China nevertheless cherishes toward us misgivings and a certain animosity? The chief cause seems to be a tendency to interfere in the internal quarrels of China. Since the overthrow of the Tsing Dynasty and the establishment of the Republic, various political parties have been formed in China, and we have in Japan people who are in sympathy with one or another of these parties. These people have a marked propensity to assist the particular party which is in sympathy with their own political or personal views. I believe all these persons are prompted by perfect good-will, but the consequences are deplorable. We have gained nothing but the antipathy of our neighbors and misunderstanding of our real intentions by other nations.

The present Cabinet absolutely repudiates these courses. We desire to maintain very cordial relations with China. We desire only the gradual accomplishment of all the reforms which China proposes to make for her future development. We shall spare no pains to come to her assistance, if she desires it. We shall try to let her understand our sincere sentiments, and it is for her to decide whether to trust us or not. We have no intention of favoring one or another of the political parties in China. We desire to keep up relations of cordial amity with China herself, but not with this or that political party. It is essential for us that China should be able to develop in a normal manner in the path of progress. What we fear most is her disintegration as the result of continued internal troubles and disorders. We shall make every effort to the end that China may never find herself in such a position, for it is indispensable that she should maintain her independence and territorial integrity.

Another point to which the Government desires to draw your attention is the special position that Japan occupies in certain regions of China, especially in Southern Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. If Japan has a special position in these regions, it is entirely due to the immense sacrifices and incalculable efforts which she has made, and it is in consequence of this that she has acquired these rights and interests which have been consecrated by treaties and agreements. It is the Imperial Government's most elementary duty to safeguard these rights and interests.

If China desires to maintain with Japan, as we desire most sincerely, relations of the most cordial friendship, it is most necessary that she should follow the same line of policy that we intend to pursue with her. It is only on this condition that a solid understanding could exist between our two countries. When the Chinese Government understands clearly and distinctly the intention of Japan, China will have no objection to our very sincere policy.

Nobody disputes that Japan occupies a special position in China. But we must not ignore the fact that other powers have vast interests in China, and, in safeguarding our own interests, we must respect carefully those of others, and we must try first of all to move in accord with other powers with whom we have special agreements and try to reconcile our interests with those of other nations. We are firmly convinced that such is the best policy. In all that concerns the common interest of all nations Japan has no intention of following an egotistic policy in China. She desires most sincerely to work in agreement with the interested powers. The Imperial Government firmly believes that with a little good-will a complete understanding can be reached for the welfare of China as well as of all the powers.

WHAT CHRISTIANITY HAS GIVEN JAPAN.

AN EDITORIAL IN THE (JAPAN) CHRISTIAN WORLD.

An American pastor investigating conditions in our country said to me, "I specially desire to learn what Christianity has added to the former civilization of Japan, and what it would have come to in the course of natural development." The subject thus proposed is one interesting not only to an American Christian, but it also deserves consideration by Japanese believers. Hence I will give the main points of my reply.

1. A CONCEPTION OF KAMI. [This Japanese word is the one that has been adopted by Christians to designate God. As the Japanese language seldom distinguishes between singular and plural, the sense of this paragraph is best retained by keeping the word and remembering that it may be used in either number.] Christianity has to a very marked degree transformed our conception of Kami. Formerly we thought of many kami who were the deified forces of nature, the spirits of heroes, or the patron deities of different localities. Although the philosophy we had received from China spoke of "The Heavenly Sovereign," or "Celestial and Terrestrial Kami," these terms were very indefinite in their meaning. Christianity, on the other hand, has told us of a Kami who is the Supreme Personality, the Ruler of the Universe. The thought contained in the English word "God" has wrought a great change in Japanese literature and also in our spoken language, so that most persons now think of Kami as the Lord and Ruler of heaven and earth. When Japanese now hear such expressions as "the unseen Kami" or "the Kami of heaven and earth," instead of thinking of the Kami as they once did, they spontaneously connect the word with the conception of Kami as taught by Christianity.

2. A CONCEPTION OF HUMANITY. The reading-book used by primary schools at the beginning of the Meiji era (1868-1912) contained the sentence, "God is the Ruler of heaven and earth: man is the spiritual head of all things" (the book was largely a translation, and probably the English of the latter half of this quotation was something like "Man is the head of creation"). This statement concerning man has now gained general acceptance. If we seek the source of the facts that our laws now recognize the rights of individuals and that everybody now thinks of the soul as immortal and of infinite value, we must look to Christianity and Western civilization.

3. SOUND VIEWS OF THE WORLD. In contrast to the Buddhist view which looks on the world as only evil, and to the Oriental view of human life which treats it as a passing jest, an earnest moral conception of the world has been introduced by Christianity. English literature has therefore given to the young men of Japan a sane view of life. Among our writers there has sometimes been a tendency to speak disparagingly of Western nations, sneering at their civilization as materialistic and governed by the worship of wealth; but this only shows that they have written with insufficient knowledge.

4. THE PERSON OF CHRIST. For more than a thousand years our people have worshipped Confucius and the founder of Buddhism, looking up to them as the greatest of men. At the beginning of mission work in this country Jesus was regarded with disdain. Now, at the very least, he is thought worthy of a place beside these two sages as an object of reverence. Probably he is of the three the one whose life is being most widely made known to the people as a whole. The personality of Christ is the most valuable gift that Christianity has brought to Japan. It is through the preaching of the Gospel that Japanese society, as the years go by, is gaining large numbers of those who by their imitation of Christ become endowed with a personality like His.

5. THE BIBLE. Of the thousands of books that have been published in modern Japan, no other has had such continuous and wide circulation among people of high and low estate as has the Bible. Christians are not the only ones that love to read it. It has attained a wide circulation. Its value as literature and its influence on other literature cannot be measured, but the Bible must be included among the great gifts that Christianity has brought to Japan.

6. THE HOME. It is Christianity that has brought us the conception of a pure home founded on the union of one man with one woman. The missionaries have in this matter given us excellent object lessons. Confucianism, Buddhism, and our native Bushido did not teach the sacredness of the marriage relation, or present monogamy as its ideal. They failed to make these principles fundamental in family and national life.

7. ELEVATION OF WOMAN. When Christianity came to Japan, it put forth efforts to raise woman's position and to encourage her in taking an active part in society. Oriental ethics and religion had a tendency to look on women as inferior beings and to treat them tyrannically. Although Japan in ancient times often saw women taking a prominent part in affairs, it is evident that the influences of Buddhism and Confucianism were against this. When Christian missionaries came they opened schools for girls, and we owe it chiefly to Christianity that we now have women's societies, women's temperance unions, young women's associations, and other social organizations of a similar nature.

8. PHILANTHROPY. Christianity has originated many social movements in Japan. It is true that long ago Buddhism engaged in some works of charity, but afterwards these degenerated into mere ceremonies that were chiefly for the benefit of the dead. Shinto did nothing worthy of mention in the way of charity. On the other hand, even when Christians were few in number, they founded orphanages, homes for discharged prisoners, and working girls' homes. They have been the leaders in establishing associations for young men and for young women, in the work of the Salvation Army, in moral reform associations, temperance societies, movements for abolishing licensed vice, etc. Christianity has not only been active in introducing new thoughts and in giving spiritual consolation, but by initiating and energetically conducting philanthropic enterprises it has set such an example that other religious and non-religious bodies have become its imitators.—From the N. Y. Evening Post.

FROM THE REPORT OF JANE C. BALDERSTON.

Jane Balderston sailed from this country Eleventh Month 30, 1915, and reached Chungking about Third Month 1, 1916. There she was detained for some weeks by the military authorities on account of the unsettled state of the country, but finally she made the eleven-day overland journey to Chengtu. Her boxes which had been shipped from home about a year before arrived on Ninth Month 1st, many of their contents very much damaged by water. The boat which brought them from Chungking to Chengtu had been wrecked.

For most of the time since she reached Chengtu Jane Balderston has made her home with Robert J. and Mary J. Davidson, the oldest missionaries on the field, and she has found it a great help to be with them.

Her report for the year is as follows:—

"It seems rather presumptuous for a person who has been in China less than a year to consent to hand in a report of work done, but it is not of work done by myself, but rather of work done by others of the results of which I have been a recipient that I wish to write.

"First and foremost I should like to express my appreciation of the very kind way in which the members of the Mission have welcomed me, an alien, into their midst. It is no mere desire that my words may sound well which makes me say that from my first arrival in Chungking I have been made to feel very much at home amongst them.

"Language study has, of course, been my chief concern since my arrival, and in this two of us have found it very helpful to be working in a class with others with a foreign teacher as well as Chinese to help and direct us. Dr. Kibborn has been very generous with our failings, but he does not let mistakes and inaccuracies pass by unnoticed as Chinese teachers are so prone to do. Besides the regular language work we have, as a class, visited several places of interest, always taking with us a Chinese teacher, and we have thus learned all sorts of things about the history, religion and general life of the people. We went through a Confucian temple on the eve of their semi-annual ceremony, and saw the elaborate preparations being made for the rites which were to take place in the wee small hours of the night. The sacrificing of animals and offering of various kinds of foods, made us think of Old Testament times, but we were told that the idea is rather that of communion between Confucius and his followers. Visits have also been made to the Imperial City, to Buddhist and Taoist temples, and to the tomb of the Emperor who, at the time of the Three Kingdoms, had his seat of government at Chengtu. At present we are having weekly lectures on such subjects as 'Chinese Philosophy' and 'Taoism.'

"Of actual dealings with the Chinese my experience up to the present has been rather limited. I have, for a few months past, been lending the support of my presence to a women's class in which the work is being done by an earnest Christian woman who has been for a long time in the Davidson's employ. And now that my friend Naish has gone to Tungchow there is children's work which she started to be carried on. With the help of some University students she has established a very wide-awake children's meeting which keeps from sixty to one hundred active young minds occupied with material suited to their years while their elders attend the regular weekly service. Sixth-day nights the children, through games, are not only developing the play instinct in very healthy, normal fashion, but are also learning lessons in gentleness and self-control. Just within the past few days two mothers have been persuaded to unbind the feet of their two little girls, aged eleven and nine. We feel that this is a real triumph.

"While it does seem that these first few months have been filled chiefly with blunders and vain attempts to understand and be understood, still I begin to feel that the province of Szechwan in West China is the second best place in the world in which to be. And I hope that eventually I may be able to help in the bringing of Christ's Kingdom here."

SUFFERING SYRIA.

[Emily Oliver has kindly furnished the following extracts from letters of her husband and others. The situation is almost too painful to read, but there is an undoubted service in making the facts known.—Eds.]
FROM DANIEL OLIVER, FRIENDS' FOREIGN MISSION ASSOCIATION.

The second letter is from the interior, presumably Damascus.

"I write these few lines that you may know I am still alive, but I cannot walk a step that I do not see some one lying dead in dirt and filth, and I thank God that He has permitted me to remain and serve this awful need. This letter goes to you by the kindness of Brother B—, who will post it in Europe.

"Damascus has lost 120,000.

"Two hours ago I was in the Bab Tuma quarter, distributing what had been sent me from Beirut, and there I saw thirteen bodies in the street, one of them having been murdered, and all surrounded by their loved ones. One day's harvest of death.

"One cannot walk anywhere in Damascus and not see hundreds of such sights. I found yesterday before a mosque five murdered men, and six others were there. In an interview with the Mayor of the city as to the best method of distribution of relief, I learned that the number of inhabitants was supposed to be about 400,000 and that 120,000 had died during the past two years.

"But it is the villages that suffer most from hunger. Duma, a sizable town in the Lebanon, has lost half its population. (I have spent many summers there.)

"Another thing which increases the death rate is that so many of the doctors have been sent to the front with the army, or have died at home. Among the soldiers typhus, 'the freckled fever,' as the people call it, and cholera are rampant. The mayor said fifty wagons were kept busy carting away the dead from the streets.

"We are hearing now that another horror has been added to an already overflowing cup of woe, that of tetanus, as many as ten dying daily from it and sometimes more. I saw a mad man running after a lad, gnashing his teeth and frothing at the mouth. He was caught by some soldiers and restrained. I do not know if he died.

"But more alarming than all is the pall of melancholia which is settling over the entire country. Omnipresent fear, famine, sickness, execution and news from the war, have wiped smiles from every face. Not one family but wears black, and it seems to have entered the brains and hearts of a people particularly full of sympathy when sorrow comes, so that those left are now half demented or wholly so.

"We try to give them the comforts of religion, but Christians and Moslem alike have become dispirited, so that no one goes to church or mosque any more. Last Sabbath the minister preached to three persons.

"The greatest danger threatening Syria now is the rebellion, of which we constantly hear rumors. It will mean suicide and utter destruction if it does come, for no one is left to fight, no arms are available, and no help possible from outside. I pray God to avert that fearful hour, for should it follow the almost universal melancholia, cholera, typhus, famine and wholesale executions, the result will be certain annihilation. It seems as though God were trying the Syrians in a fire more fierce than those of hell, and it looks to some as though He intends to destroy this people. Or is His Arm outstretched still?"

All advices from Syria tell of an utter lack of medicines. The daughter of a prominent man has been ill with dysentery for two months, but not a drop of medicine of any kind is in the city of Beirut. Others speak of the extreme severity of the government, no one going from one town to another being permitted to carry with him anything to eat on the way. A violation of this rule is instant death.

All speak of the utmost severity being used in the Keserawan in the Lebanon. This is explained from the fact that the stalwart mountain people of the Maronite sect live there in great numbers, and the government fears them more than any other people in Syria. They are powerless, now, however, as famine and disease have rendered them like the rest, impotent.

The grain crop was good this year, but most of it, all of it in fact, has been taken over by the government; a large part sent to feed Turkey's allies, the remainder being sold back to the Syrians at prohibitive prices. The fruits were poor, excepting the figs, the most important fruit. But this, too, was taken over by the government, and the people left to starve. There is no fuel in the land, save the charcoal. The railways were run by coal from Europe, but since the war began not an ounce has reached the country. Hence, a train a week for military purposes runs between Beirut and Damascus. The engine is fed the wood of the very few trees, mostly pine trees, planted within the memory of most of us. And the last word from there says, the people had been ordered to cut down their fruit trees for the engine.

It is interesting to know that Syria first learned of the Arab revolt under the leadership of the Sharif of Mecca, by means of leaflets printed in English and Arabic which a French aeroplane dropped over the city of Beirut.

—RISE UP, O MEN OF GOD.—

Rise up, O men of God!
Have done with lesser things,
Give heart and soul and mind and strength
To serve the King of kings.

Rise up, O men of God!
His kingdom tarries long.
Bring in the day of brotherhood
And end the night of wrong.

Rise up, O men of God!
The church for you doth wait,
Her strength unequal to her task;
Rise up, and make her great!

Lift high the cross of Christ!
Tread where His feet have trod;
As brothers of the Son of Man
Rise up, O men of God!

—WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL.

—"THE COURAGE OF ONE MAN AND THE COWARDICE OF MANY."

The high moral courage displayed by Governor A. O. Stanley of Kentucky in the face of an angry and determined mob, has so many lessons for us in these perilous times that it deserved to be told and re-told. The following items are gleaned from the Independent, although the daily papers have had rather full reports.

A poor, wretched and friendless negro, Luke Martin by name, had committed several offenses which had infuriated the dwellers of the "Black Patch" of Kentucky, which took its name from the black tobacco raised there. Those offenses are reported as being an effort to prevent arrest by an ex-policeman who accused Luke of seeking his life; the second was the return of shots sent by the ex-policeman, which resulted in the killing of the ex-officer, and the final offense was the unwillingness of Luke to be tried in the local court where passion ran high against him. The Judge of the Circuit Court of the District had sent Luke out of the county. The mad mob cried, "Bring back the nigger," the usual term in many parts of the South for the Negro. They added the threat that they would have the judge if the prisoner was not given up to them. These threats were repeated a number of times and the judge finally yielding ordered the return of the Negro. The mob went to their homes with the avowed intention of returning next morning and of wreaking their vengeance on the helpless man. That evening a law-abiding citizen of the town, from an adjoining State, telephoned the situation to Governor Stanley. It would have been a great risk to have telephoned from the town of the mob. After consulting with some other State officials, it was decided to make a strenuous effort to save Kentucky from another disgraceful lynching. The State militia were on the border and no other troops were available. After further investigation, the Governor came to the intended scene of outrage. On arrival, he further conferred with the judge and others and told the citizens that the Negro would not be returned and he sent out a general invitation to meet him at the Court-house. Some of the townspeople responded, but the people from the Black Patch, famous for the Night Riders, who were lawless and desperate characters, made up the largest part of the audience.

The Governor went straight to the heart of the situation.

He was not cheered, but rudely phrased expressions of the Governor's nerve were heard. The conclusion of the Governor's speech thus unequivocally ended:

"The Circuit Judge and the Commonwealth's attorney at your behest, I countermanded that order and I directed the Sheriff of McCracken County to hold that prisoner in Paducah and to protect him from violence at all hazards until I was assured that he could and would receive a fair and impartial trial without the possibility of intimidation of the court or violence to the prisoner. The Commonwealth's attorney and the judge have acted in good faith with you, and but for my order this prisoner would have been here at this hour.

"I, and I alone, am responsible. I am here without troops, without police protection, practically alone, absolutely unarmed, but I am hedged about by that which is stronger than a cordon of bayonets—the majesty of the law. I am here as the chief magistrate of this Commonwealth in the discharge of a sacred duty, and for one I do not fear that any man within the sound of my voice is so lost to every sense of justice and decency as to attempt to force me to choose now between death and dishonor.

"This County of Calloway has been noted for its respect for law and order and religion. No county in this State has a greater number of citizens owning their own homes. I cannot believe that men, that householders, Christian's, men who believe murder is crime and that courts are sacred, will do the things that I am told you have threatened to do."

When the Governor finished, a forlorn-looking woodsman in characteristic parlance, commended the Governor, and shouted, "I'm fer you." Others promptly followed and nearly every one shook hands with this great moral hero!

Information as to what the final outcome of this case may be is not at hand. The good citizens are humiliated that their State had so narrow an escape from mob rule, and they are rightly proud of their brave Governor.

—WESTTOWN YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE.

Plans are being made to hold this Spring a Conference of young Friends for the purpose of strengthening our hold upon the fundamentals of Christian experience and of encouraging us in the service of God as members of the Society of Friends.

The Young Friends' Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is responsible for this Conference. The Committee in charge of Westtown Boarding School has kindly granted the use of the School grounds and buildings. The Young Friends of other eastern Yearly Meetings will co-operate through their General Secretary in advertising the Conference and in sending delegates.

The Conference will begin Seventh-day afternoon, Sixth Month 23rd and will close Fifth-day afternoon, the 28th. The afternoons will be free for exercise and recreation. The mornings (except First-day) will be occupied with simultaneous classes and discussions on such subjects as

The Community and the Meeting.
Christianizing personal relationships.
Ways of serving younger Friends.
The Bible and modern life.
Improving our First-day schools.
National and international service.
War and its alternatives.

Special problems of the Society of Friends.

The deeper questions of inward religion will be considered in small devotional groups and in evening addresses.

All young Friends who are interested in the purpose of the Conference are invited to attend, to spread word of it to others, and to encourage and help others to go who would appreciate the privilege.

The expense of attending the Conference will include a registration fee of $2.50, payable in advance, about a dollar a day for food and lodging and the railroad fare to Westtown, which is about twenty-five miles from Philadelphia. It is hoped that in many cases, delegates may be sent and if necessary have their expenses paid by their Monthly Meeting or their young people's society.

To engage rooms and to secure further information (including a final announcement of speakers and other details) write to

Secretary Young Friends' Conference,

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE LEAGUE OF GOOD CITIZENSHIP OF PHILADELPHIA.—The Philadelphia League of Good Citizenship has done such notably excellent work in Philadelphia that the following samples of the matter put before the children have been sent to THE FRIEND in the hope that this means of teaching true and intelligent patronism may be more largely used and be widely introduced into schools, public and private. Methods of working can be learned. Children in country schools especially need such instruction. It seems very difficult for them to understand the difference between meum and tuum and they often act as if they thought that whatever grows on farm or in orchard from an apple to a watermelon is public property.

In 1896, the Civic Club of Philadelphia, by permission of the Board of Public Education and with the approval of school principals, started the League of Good Citizenship. There are now eighty-nine branches. The topic for each month's lesson is taken from the regular lesson of the class in civics, which is a subject lately included in the public school course. The League is helpful in bringing in "an outside element which is good for the children," and affords them an opportunity to present reports on civic matters.

The method of conducting the League and other pertinent matter for the use of those who wish to have a part in this work or who desire to introduce it into their home schools may be had by application to The Philadelphia League of Good Citizenship of the Civic Club, 1300 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The topic for Third Month this year is Personal and Household Cleanliness.

HEALTH ALPHABET

As soon as you're up, shake blanket and sheet,
Better be without shoes than sit with wet feet.
Children, if healthy, are active, not still.
Damp beds and damp clothes will both make you ill.
Eat slowly and always chew your food well,
Freshen the air in the house where you dwell.
Garments should never be made too tight;
Home should be healthy, airy and light,
If you wish to be well, as you do, I've no doubt,
Just open the windows before you go out,
Keep your rooms always tidy and clean,
Let dust on the furniture never be seen.

Morning—cold water for face, hands and throat,
Night—a hot bath with Ivory Soap,
Old rags and old rubbish should never be kept,
People should see that their floors are well swept.
Quiet books—quiet thoughts lead to good lives,
Remember God's love will make you wise.
Sleep eight hours or more, lying straight as a line,
Thick flannels are better than hat-feathers fine,
Use your nose to find if there be a bad drain,
Very sad are the fevers that come in its train,
Walk as much as you can, without feeling fatigue,
Xerxes could walk full many a league.
Your health is your wealth, which your wisdom must keep,
Zeal will help a good cause and the good you will reap.

LEAGUE OF GOOD CITIZENSHIP—THIRD MONTH LESSON.

General Topic: William Penn, Philadelphia's Great Founder.
General Sub-topic: City Coat of Arms and Colors; Indian Statues in Fairmount Park.

Special Sub-topic: Penn's Hopes and Love for Philadelphia.
Special Sub-topic: Cleanliness; Third Month, the month for cleaning cellars, etc., for destroying coconos and all grub life indoors and out. Reason for use of whitewash and lime.

(To be concluded.)

NEWS ITEMS.

A PEACE meeting for men only was held at the home of George S. Morris, Olney, Philadelphia, on the evening of Third Month 13, 1917. A hundred invitations were issued and eighty came.

Francis R. Taylor was the speaker and so carried his audience, that many were reached—a Methodist present inviting him to say the same in his church. Refreshments were served at close.

The previous week Francis Taylor was asked to address the Episcopal congregation on Peace, in his own village of Cheltenham, Pa. Can we not influence our neighbors thus by able persuasive arguments. In the main those present at the meeting noticed above were laboring men. One of them said he would gladly have listened for two hours to the peace presentation.

THE First Month number of the Japanese Peace Movement, the monthly organ of the Japan Peace Society and the American Peace Society in Japan is at hand. As usual it strikes a high note of Internationalism.

Baron Sakatani shows a keen analysis of world conditions in advocating an international newspaper, international universities and other educational agencies. In treating of "War and Racial Health," Dr. Nagai shows a well-balanced judgment in this conclusion: "It [war] may also be the surgeon's knife for removing sources of inflammation. But when we weigh the advantages and disadvantages of war and militarism, from the standpoint of modern eugenics, we must agree that the gains cannot make good the losses."

Baron Shibusawa puts some problems of "Reconstruction" very clearly. His spirit appears in this: "But by a study of human progress, it is evident that the efforts to aid in this struggle [for advance in production and commerce] by military power, must be abolished." It is an open question whether we are keeping up fairly with this magnificent constructive work of the two Peace Societies in Japan.—Ems.

THE immigration of large numbers of colored people from the South has several times been noted in THE FRIEND. On Second Month 13th there was a Conference in Philadelphia in this interest. Our friend, John T. Emlen is quoted as having spoken as follows on that occasion: "That the number who had recently come from the South was estimated by the Southern papers at about 150,000 to 300,000, although several Texas papers had put the estimate as high as 500,000. The New York World, however, estimated the number as a little over 100,000. Large corporations in the various cities of the North are offering great opportunities. For example, at Chicago, the Swift and Armour Meat Packing Companies are employing large numbers of Negroes and the Pullman Company have increased their force within a year from 400 to 1800. Twelve companies in Detroit and eight in Newark, N. J., which heretofore have not employed any Negroes, are now employing large numbers. Similar conditions exist in other cities.

"Many of these immigrants have been brought North by corporations. For example, the Pennsylvania Railroad has within the past six months brought 12,000, and the Erie Railroad about 3,000. These have been mostly men, but their families will follow. The voluntary immigration is also rapidly increasing. The Secretary of the Travelers' Aid Society stated that in First Month, 1916, the immigration was 79, whereas in Twelfth Month of the same year it was over 250, and it is the general consensus of opinion that it will continue to increase.

"The companies report that in many cases the immigrants had left them. The Pennsylvania Railroad reports a loss of 75 per cent, but the Erie Railroad reports smaller loss. These men are in some cases lodged in camps usually crowded but sanitary as in the Pennsylvania Railroad camps. In other cases they are crowded in houses, as in Coatesville. Adjustment to the new environment is of course very difficult. In Philadelphia while there is large opportunity for unskilled employment, there is great crowding and distress, and lack of understanding of their new surroundings on the part of those who have just arrived."

The Missionary Advocate has a special Cuba number which will appeal to those whose interests are drawn to our island neighbor. We note the following from Martha J. Woody, who spent some time a year or more ago in the Philadelphia neighborhood:

Greetings in the love of Christ Jesus! How wisely and lovingly the Master has planned our lives and service—just one day at a time and that day only moment by moment. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." "My grace is sufficient for thee." Among the pleasant memories of the year are the Bible studies with the young women who have been with my companions from time to time. The Lord brought us near to Himself and to each other.

My day usually begins about 6.30 with a quiet hour Bible study. Then the household morning duties occupy the time until 9 A. M., when class begins, with half an hour of Bible study, and closes at 11.30 for the mid-day meal. Class work claims attention from 2 to 4 P. M. An increasing circle of friends takes up all spare time in calls and religious visits. I gratefully acknowledge my indebtedness to the Friends whose offerings have made this year's service in Jaruco possible and to those whose intercessory prayers have made it worth while.

"The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much."
JARUCO, Havana, Cuba.

The following is taken from the Episcopal Recorder:

"The work being accomplished by Sunday-school workers in the Philippines is full of cheer. In the Bulacan Province, about twenty-five miles north of Manila, there has been an increase of nearly eight thousand in the Sunday-school attendance within the last two years, and there have been more than twenty-five hundred conversions in the same district during the past year. J. L. McLaughlin, in charge of the work there, declares that the Philippines are on the eve of the greatest evangelistic movement that has ever been seen there."

FRIENDS generally will be interested to learn that there is now at the Friends' Institute daily a stenographer who will be glad to do any kind of general stenographical work that can be thrown in her way. Such a co-operation will materially assist all the other Institute activities. The New York Evening Post has been added to the already extended list of periodicals which can be found on the shelves of the Institute.

The following is from a letter to one of the editors under the date of Third Month 17th:—

STATE COLLEGE, Pa., Third Month 17, 1917.

Thinking Friends might be interested to know something of our little group of Friends at State College, I shall briefly tell of our doings.

There are about thirty students who are Friends, besides these, there are six families and a few non-members who attend more or less regularly.

We meet at seven-thirty First-day evenings in the foyer of the College auditorium, and devote a half-hour to a regular Friends' meeting. The silence is broken at times by some member who has a timely thought to express or prayer to offer. Another half hour is spent in the reading and discussion of such subjects as: Religion, personal conduct, peace, temperance and Quaker history.

Our members are firm in their stand against things military and are active in the cause of prohibition. We have distributed anti-military literature throughout the College.

As has been our custom for a few years past, some of our members visited a recent Quarterly Meeting of Friends, held at Unionville, this county.

In Eleventh Month, Joseph Elkinton and Robert Balderston paid us a very pleasant visit. Joseph Elkinton and William Wickersham are to be with us this First-day. We will be very glad to have any Friends who can visit us and attend our meetings.

On behalf of the meeting.

I. ROWLAND EVANS.

THE CALL OF THE CHRIST.

Amid so many Gods and creeds,
So many paths that wind and wind,
How shall a young man cleanse his way?
Where joy and inspiration find?

The world's a dark and dreary waste,
Life's endless evils have no cure;
Gripped in the grasp of gruesome fate,
The Stoic calls "Endure, Endure."

Life is a garden of delight;
'Tis only fools that toil and think
'Sip honied sweets," hear Horace call,
'Vivamus," "Carpe diem," "Drink."

Find joy in service, not in sweets,
Be fearless, faithful, kind and true;
Do unto others as you would
That they in turn should do to you.

The world is all a fleeting show,
Mere disappointment, emptiness;
'Do nothing, dream," the Brahmin calls,
'The soul finds peace in nothingness."

Bewildered, blinded, in despair,
We look to Christ, the Lord of Light,
'Turn ill to good," we hear Him call,
'Make weakness strength, change wrong to right.

"So shall you solve life's mystery;
'Tis not in pomp, nor power, nor pelf;
'Tis wrapped in these six simple words:
Love thou thy neighbor as thyself."

O Guide of youth, we hear thy call,
Our wayward steps we turn to Thee,
Be thou our Way, our Truth, our Life,
Now and through all eternity.

—CHARLES A. BUFFUM, in The Springfield Republican.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WITHIN please find twenty-five cents for copies of Third Month 8, 1917—as many as it will buy. I could distribute a score with advantage, but must not beg too hard. I get no peace literature so well received as THE FRIEND. How much your clear testimony is needed, now that so many friends of peace are wavering, or have gone over to the side of war.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Fifteen elementary night classes and eight high school classes closed last week in Philadelphia marking the end of the winter term of the evening schools. Fifteen thousand pupils ended their studies until the schools reopen.

Now that New Jersey plans to improve her highways at an expenditure of $15,000,000, Governor Edge has asked General Goethals of Panama Canal fame to supervise the work at a salary of $25,000 a year. The argument is that the builder of the Panama Canal can effect economies in the work sufficient to make his employment a good investment.

Philadelphia's typhoid death rate places the city fifth in the 1916 record of municipalities with populations of more than 500,000.

In an epochal decision holding Congress at Washington to be clothed with any and all power necessary to keep open the channels of interstate commerce, the Supreme Court dividing five to four, sustained the Adamson law as constitutional and enforceable in every feature. The immediate effect of the decision will be to fix a permanent eight-hour basic day in computing wage scales on interstate railroads, for which a nation-wide strike twice has been threatened.

The annual earnings of railroad trainmen in 1916 averaged $1344 per man, according to a bulletin issued to-day by the Bureau of Railway Economics, compiled from the official returns of the railways to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Trainmen in the Western district veraged $1450, in the Eastern district $1303, and in the Southern district $1245. Engineers averaged $1865 for the year, firemen $1136, conductors $1615 and other trainmen $1089. The highest paid class was the engineers of the South, who averaged $2297.

Congress has been called in special session for the 2nd prox. A well-known weekly makes this comment: "The advancement of the date for the special session of Congress must be given the gravest interpretation.

The decision of the senior class at Yale to have no liquor at its dinner before graduation and to have none at subsequent reunions of the class, unless a definite vote to the contrary is at some time registered, calls for attention as one of the significant signs of the times.

A report just made by California's Colonization and Rural Credits Commission shows that in the State 310 men own 4,000,000 acres of the richest land, one individual alone possessing 1,000,000 acres; while one railway owns 5,000,000 acres.

Soya bean oil from Japan, worth $2,000,000, has been received in two cargoes and forwarded to one of the large soap manufacturers of the country by a special train of 30 tank cars.

The National Canner's Association has offered to Harvard University annually for a period of three years the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the purpose of investigating the subject of food poisoning, or so-called ptomaine poisoning, with special reference to canned goods.

The United States Indian appropriation bill, passed finally in the closing hours of Congress, is believed by Protestant leaders to end for good and all expenditures by the Government for the education of Indian children in sectarian schools. Some years ago the Government adopted such a policy and Protestant Indian boards have refused to accept grants. Congress has, however, made grants to Catholic boards, gradually withdrawing them until now they are declared to be ended or everybody.

Chargé Wheeler at Tokio has been instructed by the State Department to express to the Japanese Government the gratitude of the United States for the many marks of respect shown the memory of the late Ambassador Guthrie, and formally to accept the offer of a warship to bring the body of the Ambassador home.

FOREIGN.—Ambassador Francis at Petrograd summarized the situation in Russia in the following cablegram: "The last week has seen the most astonishing revolution. Two hundred million people who have lived under absolute monarchy for 1000 years and who are now engaged in the greatest war in history, have forced their emperor to abdicate for himself and his son."

The Czar's income has been estimated by the Almanack Hachette as $42,500,000 a year, or $85 a minute.

Germany has decided to spend over $163,000,000 on making a waterway between the Main River and the Danube. Some time ago the Bavarian Government published a draft bill under which their share of the sum will be raised, and a credit demand is to be submitted to the Reichstag with the next Imperial budget. It is designed to be a real waterway. If carried out, it will be 120 feet wide, over 11 feet deep, and will take vessels of 1200 tons.

409 CHESTNUT STREET,
PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 16, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND:—

At a Peace Meeting, held about a month ago at Fifteenth and Race Streets, under the joint auspices of the Peace Committees of that Meeting and of our Yearly Meeting, there was started a project for the publication in newspapers and other periodicals of a message from the Society of Friends concerning the present condition of affairs. Ellis W. Bacon and the undersigned were appointed as a Finance Committee for the publication of such a message as might be prepared by The Friends' National Peace Committee, which is the permanent organization growing out of the Friends' National Peace Conference held at Winona Lake, Indiana, in Seventh Month, 1915.

The following is the result of the labors of this Committee, and it, or a very similar message, has already been published in seven daily papers, and has or is about to be published in five well-known weeklies, such as The Outlook, New Republic, etc., and will be published in The Atlantic Monthly; all as advertisements. The cost of this has been about $2050, and we desire without urging, but simply if Friends are interested to continue this and to publish it at least in one newspaper of the larger cities of the country.

In addition to the money already spent, we have to-day contracted to use up the balance of our money in hand and pledges (about $1200) in the publication of the message in thirteen additional daily newspapers. There are about sixty other publications in which we should like to insert it, at a cost which would be a little over $300. The money so far received has come from perhaps fifteen people, in amounts varying from a few dollars to $1000. We have had two contributions of $1000, one of $500, several of $100 and several of $50.

It seems a practical way to put our message before our country at this time. If desiring to see this effort extended we shall be glad to have thy help in any amount that may seem good to thee. Check should be drawn to the order of the undersigned.

Thy friend truly,

A. G. SCATTERGOOD.

This advertisement may be seen on the next page.

A MESSAGE

FROM THE

Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) in America

To Our Fellow Citizens:

In this time of crisis when our country's highest good is the common aim of all, we voice this deep conviction of patriotic duty.

We rejoice that even at this time, when the world is crazed by war, so many men are judging war by moral and spiritual standards, and by ideals of sacrifice. The causes for which men fight—liberty, justice and peace—are noble and Christian causes. But the method of war is unchristian and immoral. War itself violates law, justice, liberty and peace, the very ends for which alone its tragic cost might be justified.

Further, the method of war is ineffective to these ends. Might does not decide the right, ideals cannot be maintained by force, nor can evil overcome evil. True national honor is a nation's own integrity and unselfish service. Only unswerving honesty and self-control maintain it. Rights, the rights of all, are securely defended between nations as between individuals by mutual confidence, not suspicion; by universal co-operation and law, not by private armed defence.

The alternative to war is not inactivity and cowardice. It is the irresistible and constructive power of good-will. True patriotism at this time calls not for a resort to the futile methods of war, but for the invention and practice on a gigantic scale of new methods of conciliation and altruistic service. The present intolerable situation among nations demands an unprecedented expression of organized national good-will.

Unpractical though such ideals may seem, experience has taught that ideals can be realized if we have faith to practice now what all men hope for in the future. The American Nation, as a more perfect union of States, as a melting pot of races, as a repeated victor through peace, has proved practical the methods of generosity and patience. Throughout many years of an adventurous belief in the Christian principle of human brotherhood, the Society of Friends has seen the triumph of good-will in all forms of human crisis.

The peoples of every land are longing for the time when love shall conquer hate, when co-operation shall replace conflict, when war shall be no more. This time will come only when the people of some great nation dare to abandon the outworn traditions of international dealing and to stake all upon persistent good-will.

We are the nation and now is the time. This is America's supreme opportunity.

Unflinching good-will, no less than war, demands courage, patriotism and self-sacrifice. To such a victory over itself, to such a leadership of the world, to such an embodiment of the matchless, invincible power of good-will, this otherwise tragic hour challenges our country.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The Meeting of Ministers and Elders mentioned in last week's number was completed at a morning session on Third-day the 27th. Quite an hour was given to a weighty consideration of the general responsibility to have the large meeting for worship at Fourth and Arch Streets on the Fifth-day of Yearly Meeting, an occasion that will worthily represent our views of worship. Point was given to this by an appeal in writing in the hands of the Elders of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting from a young Friend who had been burdened by the lack of settlement in these meetings for some years past, and by a plethora of vocal offerings that had seemed to invade the rights of the individual in gathered worship.

Without attempting any executive action it was decided to make a plea to the Yearly Meeting at large for a better observance in this large meeting of our well-established attitude in worship. Elders of all the meetings were also encouraged so far as might be to share the concern of the Elders of this meeting.

After the Queries had all been answered, the following minute was adopted as expressing the points of exercise emphasized this year:

MINUTE OF THE YEARLY MEETING OF MINISTERS AND ELDERS.

Under a renewed sense of the comforting mercy of our Heavenly Father our annual assembly has again met. This feeling early found expression in vocal offerings of prayer and thanksgiving. Though hearts were bowed under a sense of the unrest and civil commotion existing to an unwanted degree throughout the world, and into which vortex of distrust, strife and bitterness our own beloved nation seems daily more directly and surely drawn, our hearts have gone out in longing desire that as a body of Christian believers we may in no wise desert the banner of the Prince of Peace.

The desire was expressed for us in the language of the Psalmist: "Show me a token for good, that they which hate me may see it and be ashamed; because Thou, Lord, hast helped me, and comforted me."

As beings encompassed with difficulties, and oft times sensible of weakness and failure in the accomplishment of good, we were reminded of the enduring language addressed by the Saviour to the woman at Jacob's well: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

In the exercise of the gift of prayer, a tender caution was extended, that those who enter upon this solemn engagement in our assemblies should do so only under a sense of renewed and direct call, and with deepest reverence; that in the petition rendered care should be taken not to lower the service by the too frequent ejaculation of the name of the Heavenly Father, as though He were a God afar off, and not near at hand, ready to hear the faintest appeal of the sincere petitioner.

William Penn's remarkable testimony regarding our forefather in the Truth, George Fox, seems pertinent in this connection. "But above all he excelled in prayer. The inwardness and weight of his spirit, the reverence and solemnity of his address and behaviour, and the fewness and fullness of his words, have often struck, even strangers with admiration, as they used to reach others with consolation. The most awful, living, reverent frame, I ever felt or beheld, I must say, was his in prayer. And truly it was a testimony, he knew and lived nearer to the Lord than other men, for they that know Him most, will see most reason to approach Him with reverence and fear."

THE GENERAL SESSIONS.

The Yearly Meeting at large opened under a sense of dependence. "God is our refuge and strength," was repeated in the women's meeting, and found expression in substance in earnest prayer, in both meetings. No particular variation from the general order of business was noticeable. A recital of the subjects claiming care will suggest the order to Friends familiar with the meetings. The letter from William C. Allen printed in THE FRIEND last week, had early attention and elicited much interest. The minutes of the Representative Meeting, though shorter than usual, required considerable care. There were several items of change proposed for adoption. These embraced a modification of the mode of using the queries, a revision of the wording of the marriage certificate, a new arrangement in regard to Preparative Meetings and the addition of a fifth query to those addressed to the Meeting of Ministers and Elders. These items were finally all approved. Men Friends had the advantage this year of liberty to omit the detailed answers to the last four queries. This new order is not mandatory. In both meetings much helpful exercise came from the consideration of the queries. They still have a manifest use in making individuals and meetings better instruments for service in the world.

Five communications out of more than seventy-five addressed to the meeting were read. The bulk of the unusual number of letters came as acknowledgments of our special Peace epistle last year. These were referred to the Peace Committee. The epistles from London and from Australia are printed herewith.

A communication signed by twenty-four of our members appealed for the sympathy of the Yearly Meeting in a sincere effort to study present-day applications of the Gospel, especially to social and industrial conditions. Rarely has there been a more fervent reaction of interest and encouragement, and a joint committee was appointed.

The meeting also entered sympathetically into the suggestion from London to appoint delegates to a Peace Conference after the war. The Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee was authorized to make this appointment should the occasion arise before next Yearly Meeting.

An invitation to send fraternal delegates to the Five Years'

Meeting disclosed a very decided difference of opinion. Many Friends felt there would be nothing in such an appointment to compromise our position. It seemed to them that the invitation was very much of a Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us." In recording a judgment not to make an official appointment, much love was expressed for Friends of the Five Years' Meeting and our members were encouraged to attend that meeting if they felt free to do so. It was particularly reported from women's meeting that Friends were baptized together in uniting in this decision.

A Committee was appointed in men's meeting to send a telegram to President Wilson in the present national crisis. This message for the whole meeting was in clear, pleading terms and the acknowledgment which came to the meeting from the White House said its spirit was valued.

The statistics of children of school age gave a total of 731, 27 less than in 1916, but 15 more than in 1915. There are 16 more attending colleges and technical schools than in 1916. In spite of the liberal provision Friends' schools something like 25 per cent. of our children have other school associations.

The question of total abstinence was advanced a step by the conclusion of women's meeting to take up the subject in its relation to culinary use in the homes. A distinct note of encouragement on the subject appeared in the summary adopted in men's meeting.

The report of the Peace Committee gave details of arduous and intelligent labors in this interest. We are printing the concluding paragraphs of the report herewith. A large evening meeting in the interests of Peace brought more than 1000 people together in the Arch Street house Fifth-day evening. The addresses were on a high plane and the audience in concluding the meeting entered into the solemnity of united worship.

The Westtown Committee made an interesting report of the past year. This included a recital of the material resources of the School, presented in a way to impress Friends with the responsibility of stewardship. Assurances that the spiritual life of the children is still the first interest gave a cheering note to the report. A proposition to admit to the School a limited number of children who have one parent a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting claimed some consideration in the meeting. It was referred to the Westtown Committee for a definite report next year. Members generally were also asked to bear it upon their minds and to inform themselves of the actual situation.

The Educational Report indicated a large interest in the small schools and much labor on their behalf. The Educational Committee has pursued the subject of a teachers' retiring fund during the past year. They have collected nearly $100,000 of the required $125,000 for a beginning of the plan. It is hoped the full sum will be in hand, so that teachers may have the benefit in 1917-18. This Committee also acknowledged the advantages already arising from the large gift of T. Wistar Brown for the better equipment of teachers in our schools.

The Tunessassa Indian Report had a special appeal this year. There is not only a rising tide of interest in the Committee, but also in the meeting at large. The School now is more largely staffed by members of our Yearly Meeting than for years past. In addition to a superintendent and matron from our number, the field agent and his wife are our members. For years there have been faithful workers from other Yearly Meetings. It means something for the work that our own members are now drawn that way. The School is to have the benefit of income from $15,000 of the T. Wistar Brown Fund and has had a bequest of $5000 during the year from the estate of George J. Scattergood. As a matter of fact with these additions its present needs will not be nearly met and beside the usual appropriation, the Yearly Meeting encouraged Friends to respond liberally to an appeal about to be issued by the Committee.

As the meeting neared its conclusion some additional members were added to the Indian Committee, other committees were appointed in regular course, and the audit of the treasurer's report was read.

The following minute of the exercises of the men's meeting, though brief, had in it a savor of life. We hope to print the minute of women's meeting next week. A solemnity of gratitude and praise overshadowed the meetings as they adjourned "until the usual time next year if consistent with the Divine Will."

MINUTE.

We have had this year a great variety of exercise. Soon after the meeting gathered we were united in prayer that we might be delivered from anxious thoughts and filled with hopeful trust that He who ruleth all things will guide in judgment and conduct the issues of men to the honor of His ever excellent name; for ourselves, as individuals, may our continued petition be: "Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer!"

The conditions of our various meetings have brought out an earnest expression for that deepening of Christian experience and of spiritual life by which we really grow in grace.

Not a little expression was given to the feeling that among Friends everywhere the outstanding heart cry of to-day is for Christian fellowship, and a desire for closer union in those things which make for the vitalizing of our faith and the renewal of power to endure the testing to which it is being subjected by reason of the times. This was shown by the repeated appeals for a closer and more sympathetic union as between Ministers and Elders, and as between these and the flock over whom they are set for shepherding care.

Finally, in the midst of dark and shadowy days let us walk together and be of good cheer, asking that our Heavenly Father make us as lights in the world and enable us to be "steadfast, unmovable always abounding in the work of the Lord, for as much as we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord."

FROM THE REPORT OF THE PEACE COMMITTEE.

When we have one and all deliberately come to our own conviction on the subject [of Peace] and have dedicated ourselves to the work, various avenues of service will be found suited to the differing interests and gifts of each individual.

If Friends, as spiritual pioneers, are to make new contributions to the ideas and practices of our time, the clear thought of every consecrated intellect in our little group will be needed. Out of this world struggle we believe there will be born new forces, new ideals, new institutions. Looking to such developments we must be concerned to create positive expressions of international good-will. We must work out new and better ways for nations to live together.

But spiritual pioneering is not so much a matter of thought as of life and action. The humblest of us may find expression daily for a sincere peace conviction. The most remote farmhouse can radiate the message. The world needs fathers who will teach their sons that a boy can protect his honor among his schoolmates in better ways than by fighting. The world needs mothers who will bring up their children to respect all races and classes equally, to recognize that it is the color of the heart, not the color of the skin, that matters. The world needs teachers who will educate boys and girls in the knowledge that in God's sight above all nations is humanity. Finally, the world needs men and women who are strong in the power of an endless life. We cannot accept a belief in Pacifism as an intellectual profession of faith. Real Pacifism, like the Christianity of which it is an expression, is a way of life. Our usefulness to the peace cause, as in all our efforts for the Kingdom of God, can be measured not so much by the ideals we hold as by the degree to which we are really living the life of the Kingdom ourselves.

If we claim to rely on spiritual forces we must learn how to get in touch with these forces. We must rely on them in the little things of every day before we can rely on them in the great hour of a crisis. The "perfect love" which casteth out

THE SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS.

Thou Lord of Hosts, whose guiding hand
Has brought us here, before Thy face,
Our spirits wait for thy command,
Our silent hearts implore Thy peace.

Those spirits lay their noblest powers
As offerings on Thy holy shrine;
Thine was the strength that nourished ours;
The soldiers of the Cross are thine.

While watching on our arms at night,
We saw thine angels round us move;
We heard Thy call, we felt Thy light,
And followed, trusting to Thy love.

Send us where'er Thou wilt, O Lord!
Through rugged toil and wearying fight;
Thy conquering love shall be our sword,
And faith in thee our truest might.

Send down Thy constant aid, we pray;
Be Thy pure angels with us still;
Thy truth, be that our firmest stay;
Our only rest, to do Thy will.

FRIENDS AND THE SOCIAL ORDER.

[We have been asked to reprint the following, which appeared in the issue of The Friend (London) for Tenth Month 27, 1916.—Eds.]

The vision has been given us of the Society of Friends definitely setting itself to the task of making the teaching of Jesus Christ the rule by which our lives in all their relations are ordered. This vision implies the belief that the principles of our Lord Jesus Christ ought to be and can be applied in the life of the community as a whole to-day, as well as in the life of the individual. As the ideal for the individual members of the Society is a life of unstinted service to the whole community, the ideal for the Society must be to provide all its members with the fullest opportunity and guidance for this whole-hearted service. A deep baptism into the spirit of love is our fundamental need. Having "the mind that was in Christ Jesus," we shall look not every man on his own interests only, but every man also on the interests of others. This spirit will lead us voluntarily to organize ourselves for such forms of service as the present need seems to call for.

In the position of our nation to-day we have a striking illustration of what can be accomplished by the organization of the national resources. This may well open our eyes to the vast possibilities that lie before our Society if we are all willing to organize ourselves with equal zeal and self-sacrifice not for war but for the cause of the Kingdom of God. Our Society would thus make a corporate witness showing in the mutual relations of members, and in its impact on the world, what it actually means in terms of our life to apply the principle of the Kingdom of God. There is an urgent immediate call to aim at—

(1) A conception of mankind as a family in which there should be equal opportunity for the development of personality in all its members;

(2) A social order in which the rendering of certain forms of service regarded as menial would no longer imply inferiority of status;

(3) The development of the gifts of nature for the good of all.

These and other aspects of the problem must be worked out with humility, courage, patience and faith, the Society providing means for the investigation of all that is involved in the realization of this ideal, and accepting in its corporate life the risks and responsibilities entailed. It must educate its members to an understanding of the problem. It must investigate every aspect of modern life, professional, commercial, governmental, international, in order to discover the meaning of this ideal as applied thereto, and the next step to take in seeking to reach it. Radical alteration in our material surroundings may be necessary. For example, the extremes of riches and poverty, even as they are found within the borders of our Society, would no doubt give place to a closer approximation to a common standard of income and manner of living. To this end the Society calls upon every member fully to consecrate himself and his possessions, and, although seeing only so much of the path as may be at present revealed to him, to go forward in the full belief that the Society will be led to a larger knowledge of the purpose of God, and to far richer experience of His power for the fulfilment of that purpose.

In order to carry out the above ideal we recommend the appointment of a Quaker Commission. We believe that a small number of men and women Friends of clear vision, wide outlook and good judgment should be set apart, who, at the call of the Society and under a sense of concern, will arrange to devote practically the whole of their time and energy for such period as may be found necessary to considering what part the Society of Friends can take in the present-day application of the principles of the Kingdom of God. Such assistance as may be necessary in the way of Secretarial work will, of course, have to be provided. The Commission will be an Advisory and not an Executive body, and it is intended it should fit into and act through the existing machinery of the Society.

Believing that the solution of these problems is ultimately to be found in the clearer appreciation of the mind of Christ, and that direct guidance is given to the human intellect as it seeks to know that mind, the Commission would approach all these subjects in a spirit of continuous search for true guidance and would submit each question to the supreme test. The field of the Commission will be one that has hitherto been very largely unexplored—namely, the endeavor by continuous conference and waiting upon God to discover how to interpret, and put into practice, the revelation of His will for the building up of a social and industrial order in harmony with the teaching of Jesus Christ. Its great aim will be the development, step by step, of a voluntary code of life and conduct expanding and developing progressively as more and more light is given.

It is anticipated the Commission will, in the course of its investigations, avail itself of the assistance and counsel of the best exponents of modern thought on various aspects of social progress as well as those who can from a long or varied experience give personal testimony in regard to the problems under inquiry and consideration. It will probably also organize or gather together groups of Friends individually interested or who may have special experience in any specific question under discussion. It will also endeavor to keep the whole Society in touch with the direction and results of its investigation by literature, special conferences visits, etc.—From Conference on Social Order.

MARGARET FORD.

[We are reprinting the following article from the [London] Friend both for its intrinsic value and because Margaret Ford and her parents are held in much esteem in a number of households to which our paper goes.—Eds.]

The call to-day is all for action—on every side we hear the exhortation to be "up and doing." This is good if we are careful to recognize the need for action as representing only one side of the complex nature of man—if we know that right doing must be based on right being. We must thankfully bear testimony to the fact that much of the deepest influence for good in the world to-day has sprung from lives that were apparently inactive, whose "worth" did not meet the eye but who drew their strength from the deepest Source of Life and of Power.

So those who knew and loved one who has just left u acknowledge with deep thankfulness the lesson that she taught, not through her strength or her active work in the world, but through her patience, her love and her faith which grew stronger and brighter as her physical powers grew less.

Margaret Ford was the second daughter of William and Anna Maria Harvey, of Leeds. Her life as a child and a girl was a very happy one. A member of a closely united family, she was surrounded by loving influences, and inspired with the example of high endeavor in the lives of her parents and grandparents. Except for a time in childhood, she was physically strong and vigorous, and able fully to enter into work and play, at home and at school.

At the Mount School, York, during her happy three years there, she formed friendships which were a precious possession all through life, and her influence in the school, though quiet, was strong and good. Later, she threw herself eagerly into study abroad and at home, went through a course of nursing in an East End Settlement Hospital, returned home to study practical housewifery, and to work hard in a Girls' Club and in connection with the Children's Country Holiday Fund.

Thus, at the time of her marriage with R. Charles Ford, in 1909, a varied and active life seemed to be before her, and she entered her new home at Bentham full of plans for the future. She looked forward to a home life after the pattern of her old one where for twenty-seven years she had unconsciously perhaps breathed in the love and spirit of sacrifice, the simple faith and ideals of duty which were to stand her in such good stead in the last years of her life. She hoped, too, to share in the life of the village, especially by entering into close friendship with those who were waiting to welcome her. And she looked forward with joy to including in her friendship any girls who might appreciate the results of her knowledge of nursing and the experience she had gained by living among those who had had less advantages in bringing up than she herself had enjoyed.

Her longing to be useful was to be fulfilled, but not in the way which she had planned. After nearly two years of married life, and a few months after the birth of her little daughter, she was laid aside by illness which proved to be lung disease. At once she had to set aside all the activities she had so much enjoyed; the many home duties which she loved and could do so well, were to be hers no longer; even the care of her little daughter had to be undertaken by others; and the priceless mother privileges which are taken as a matter of course by so many were denied to her. At first it seemed almost more than she could bear, and she had to fight hard against depression, especially when it seemed right for her to spend seven or eight months in Switzerland, separated from her husband and from her home. But quickly she learnt the great lesson, "To will what God wills is the only way to bring us into peace," and though the rest of her life was made up of long partings and short reunions, of improvement in health and relapses into weakness, those who knew her marveled at the courage which helped her to struggle back to life; and it was noticeable that she never lost her power of hearing and responding to the slightest call for service. She had a very sensitive spirit, and was always eager to use opportunities that came. One friend says how clearly her life taught others never to give in; "and we mean to begin again to turn our backs on our relapses, our selfishness and laziness, and try to love God more, helped by the hope and courage learnt from her and inspired by the remembrance of her purity of heart." Another friend who met her frequently on committee work, speaks of her radiant personality which carried a message of joy and hope to everyone. She took little vocal part in discussions, but her presence was always felt. Towards the end of her illness, in talking with her mother, she said: "It was very bitter at first, but all the bitterness has gone," and again a few months before she was set free, "You must not let anyone pity me; I think I can truly say I have never been so happy in my life as now."

During her last summer she greatly enjoyed being able to join in the meetings of the Bentham branch of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. These were often held at her home and whenever possible, she was present, taking part very helpfully, rejoicing in the opportunity of hearing something of the wider life from which she was so much cut off.

"Hope is the mark of all the souls whom God has made His friends," and it was by her steadfast hopefulness, and her uncomplaining patience that she lifted her friends above the discouragement of everyday life. Although as a child she was naturally impatient and quick-tempered, she schooled herself in patience in such a way that all who came in contact with her felt the contagiousness of her hope. And so when, after a few days of increased weakness, she slipped quietly away on First Month 22nd, the deepest feeling in the hearts of those who loved her was that of thanksgiving first for her life and her example, and then for her release from limitations, and her entrance into the free, full life of the Ages, where she knew she should find "fullest love and fullest service."

The cremation took place at Woking, and two days later her family and friends gathered together at Bentham. The absolute simplicity of this gathering, the quiet family walk over the fields from her home to the old meeting-house at Calf Cop, in its wind-swept graveyard, were just what Margaret Ford would have wished.

The words that were spoken at the graveside and in the meeting for worship were prayers of thanksgiving; and there was a very deep sense of peace and joy underneath the sorrow of the parting.

"We seem to give her back to Thee, dear Lord, who gavest her to us. Yet as Thou didst not lose her in giving, so we have not lost her by her release. For what is Thine is ours always, if we are Thine. And Life is eternal, and Love is Immortal, and Death is only an horizon, and an horizon is nothing but the limit of our sight. Lift us up, Strong Son of God, that we may see further, cleanse our eyes that we may see more clearly. Draw us closer to Thyself, that we may know ourselves nearer our beloved who rest in Thee."

A DAY WITH OLD MEETING-HOUSES IN BUCKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

WALTER L. MOORE.

I—REACHING OUT.

With long-drawn whistle of warning to other craft our boat stole out of the slip to mid-river, leaving behind the busy wharf and idle gaze of loafing stevedore. It is Labor Day, hence the unusual number of pleasure and recreation seekers that throng the vessel. The cause of labor has just, apparently, won a great victory through the rather hasty passage by Congress of the Adamson Bill, or Eight Hour law; so the great national holiday rises into higher significance than before through this recognition of labor's power in our legislative halls, though the wisdom of the law itself will, no doubt, be tested by the courts and by its practical effect upon the general welfare.

Our face is fanned by the morning air of a day in waning summer. The sun glints down through fair skies upon the placid water. The mists distilled in the cool of the night still rest upon the neighboring hills as we pass beyond the limits of two sister cities. The river is the Delaware, our destined port the drowsy town of Bristol on its western shore, and our brief voyage of an hour and a half is to form the introduction to a much more extended jaunt by land, most pleasantly anticipated with friends who there await our arrival.

Our choice of seat had been upper deck aft, but that portion of the vessel proved quite uncongenial, for it was soon invaded by a large company of youth, good-natured and clean in their behavior, but altogether too boisterous for their lone fellow-passenger who was quite disposed to be pensive though not exclusive. Then, too, the wafts of smoke emitted from a devotee of the weed, who sat nearby, put one on the defensive, so that a more congenial retreat was sought and found on the lower deck near the bow where had been piled a quantity of new lumber; this emitted a woody odor which was found distinctly bracing. Here, nearer the water, the tremor of the boat was less perceptible and even took part in playing the agreeable. The vessel was now speeding along between green shores of engaging interest. The beautiful riverside towns on the Jersey side, with their well-kept lawns reaching almost to the water's edge, and the no less inviting estates on the Pennsylvania shore, where country seats, half screened by lofty trees and shrubbery, bespoke homes of wealth and culture, were all passed in quick succession.

There had come to our hands but recently a copy of that boldly instructive little paper—The Venturer—wherein we had caught these inspiring words of John Ruskin:

"I pray you with all earnestness to prove, and know within your hearts, that all things lovely and righteous are possible for those who believe in their possibility, and who determine that for their part, they will make every day's work contribute to them. Let every dawn of morning be to you as the beginning of life, and every setting sun be to you as the close; then let every one of these short lives leave its sure record of some kindly thing done for others—some goodly strength or knowledge gained for yourselves."

Is it not true that our day's work often amounts to a failure because we do not catch the inspiration that is held out to us by its morning? Then, too, the Good Book teaches,—"(The mercies of the Lord) are new every morning." (Lam. iii: 23.)

11—THE QUEST.

"I love old meeting-houses, and could roam
Forever in old Quaker neighborhoods,
By peaceful hamlets and high breezy hills,
And dreamy rivers sleeping in the sun."

—JOHN RUSSELL HAYES.

Ere the boat reached the landing, our river voyager had already spied there awaiting him the other members of the congenial party of five, soon to be comfortably seated in the car of their host, under whose excellent guidance they now enter upon a day of pure recreation, mingled with much of historic interest.

Three of the company had been schoolmates at Westtown; one, our skilled chauffeur, and the youngest of the group, might well be said to fairly represent the aspirations of the really interested younger element amongst Friends; while the fifth, a proselyte to Quakerism, often brought to our discussions throughout the day a piquant flavor which raised them out of the conventional and commonplace.

Later, when speeding along engaged in genial converse, a sudden injection of the old mathematical problem that had faced some of us first in Playfair's Euclid—as to the shortest distance between two points, was worthily answered in terms of our then social relationship, as being "pleasant company."

The first stop was at

"Tranquil Byberry,"
(House of) "Blessedness and holy peace."

Though strictly rural in its environment, it is within city limits, being located in Philadelphia County. It is large, built of stone, and within commodious grounds. A striking feature of the place are the two large burial-grounds, one each side of the building; a second having been added when the first had been filled with those who,

Erstwhile worshipping here,
Passed their mortal frame beneath the sod;
Their beating soul aglow with joy,
Or steeped in trembling fear,
Ascending to the judgment-seat of God.

This meeting appears to have been settled in 1683, and the present house erected in 1808.

(To be concluded.)

MARY DOUGLASS GODDARD.

[So far as we know, Mary Goddard is the oldest Friend in the world. We have some knowledge in this office of two others* who have passed the centenary mark. The Springfield Republican devoted nearly a column to a notice of the one hundred and seventh birthday of our Friend, from which we adapt the following.—Eds.]

"Aunt" Mary Goddard, the oldest Quaker preacher in the United States, received an autograph letter of congratulation from Governor Carl E. Milliken, of Maine, on the occasion of her 107th birthday [Third Month 10th], which she observed at Brunswick, Me. She is the oldest person in Maine, if not in all New England. She has been in rather feeble health this winter and so was unable to entertain as usual yesterday, but enjoyed receiving hundreds of post cards and letters containing birthday greetings, as well as numerous presents of other kinds. She is now much stronger than she was earlier in the winter and is looking forward to the approaching summer, when she hopes to be able to get out of doors.

Mary Goddard, who is probably the most remarkable person of the Society of Friends in the world, was born in the Quaker town of Durham, in 1810, the daughter of David and Waite Douglass. The community in which she passed her younger days still retains its same characteristics, a quiet country neighborhood, in which everybody is a firm Christian, working on the farm six days in the week and on the seventh attending the ancient Quaker church, located on a high rocky hill, from which a magnificent view can be obtained of the miles of fertile farms. In the distance the White Mountains can be seen on a clear day, while under favorable conditions a view of the Atlantic Ocean can be caught by looking in another direction.

Curiously enough there are three interesting religious communities located within a short distance from the place where our Friend was born. In contrast with the little one-story plain brick church of the Society of Friends are the imposing buildings of the Holy Ghost and Us Society, scarcely five miles to the north, while only ten miles to the west is the massive stone building of the Shakers. In such a religious community Mary Goddard grew up, living at the home of her parents until she was twenty-six years of age, when she moved to Portland, Me., where she learned the tailor's trade.

In 1856 she married Mark Knight of Parsonfield, the widower of her sister, Mercy. He died five years later and in 1870 she became the wife of Robert F. Goddard of Brunswick, where she had once lived. They both became Elders in the church. In taking up religious work the subject of this sketch was following in the footsteps of other members of the family, her grandfather, Joseph Douglass, and her brother, Nathan Douglass, both being ministers widely known in the denomination, and her mother having been an Elder.

Robert Goddard died in 1881 and after his death his wife entered more actively into the work of the church. She preached regularly until after passing her one hundredth birthday and has occasionally preached since. She has had no children and has for the past six or seven years lived with her great niece, Jennie D. Cox, in Brunswick.

THE IMMEDIATE PROBLEMS OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH.

JAMES GORDON GILKEY.

Viewed in the large, is Christianity gaining ground in the United States or not? What are the great issues the Church of our day is facing?

When we compare the America of to-day with the America of a century ago, there is unmistakable evidence of a slow but sure victory of Christian principles. Take such a matter as drunkenness. The conditions prevalent at the time of the Revolution seem to us almost unbelievable. Colonel Thomas

* Since this was put in type one of these has deceased.

Hartley, one of Washington's commanders who was stationed in the Alleghenies to protect the frontier against the Indians reported at one time "that his command was in bad shape because its whiskey and flour were nearly exhausted." At that time whiskey was ranked with flour in the list of military supplies. And these conditions were not confined to the army. In 1790, William Ellis, a pioneer settler in Pennsylvania, wrote to a friend of his: "We have just done cutting the grain, and have hauled all our wheat in. This year we cut the harvest without spirits, and without raising wages." Whiskey was such an important part of the harvesting apparatus, that this settler reports with surprise a year when men worked without it. Turning from these conditions to those of our own time, we find that 24 of our 48 States have adopted State prohibition, and that in 85 per cent. of the territory of the United States it is impossible to obtain liquor legally.

This gradual victory of Christian principles has extended to other fields as well. One who reads the private correspondence of a century ago finds that standards of private morality were prevalent then that would not be tolerated among respectable people to-day. And there has been another striking line of advance in the new spirit that animates the best modern business. The Golden Rule seems to be recognized more widely each year as the best principle of trade, and the business which is most truly successful to-day is the one which is most efficient in servicing its public.

Our conclusion that Christianity has gained ground is borne out by the actual figures of Church membership. In 1812 only one American in fourteen was a member of the Protestant Church; to-day the percentage is one in four. In spite of our enormous increase in size, the Protestant Church has been growing three and one-half times as fast as the population. If we include in our figures the members of the Catholic Church and the other non-Protestant religious organizations, we find that to-day two Americans out of every five—forty million out of our one hundred million—are Church members.

This advance of the Church is also reflected in a growing interest on the part of young men in the problems of organized religion. In 1812 only one college student in ten was a Church member; to-day the ratio is one in two.

But while there is much in these and similar facts to make American Christians glad, we must realize that within the past few years four great problems—more serious than any we have yet faced—have been forcing themselves on the attention of the American Church. The European War has for a time delayed the solution of these problems, but once peace is declared, they will demand immediate attention. It is in the greatness of these issues that our danger as well as our opportunity lies.

First of all there is the problem of Church unity, or as we might more accurately say, Church harmony. By this we do not mean the formation of a single new Church to supplant the present ones; we mean the problem of persuading the different religious organizations now at work to regard each other as prospective friends rather than actual rivals.

Within the past few years some progress has been made in this direction, thanks to two forces that are at work among us. One is the realization that all the Churches are working toward the same goal—to bring men into touch with God as He is revealed in Jesus Christ. When we press below the surface of our denominations, we find that there is one common type of Christian experience, which all true Christians share.

The other force that is working to-day for Church unity is the common-sense of the Christian business man, who realizes that it is a waste of time and money to multiply rival means for bringing the Kingdom of God. As Washington Gladden says, "What possible need have we for thirteen different kinds of Baptists, twelve kinds of Mennonites, eleven kinds of Presbyterians, seventeen kinds of Methodists and twenty-three kinds of Lutherans?" When one sees such competition—even within single denominations—one is tempted to agree with Cardinal Gibbons, who in commenting on this situation writes, "The multiplicity of Protestant sects, with their mutual recriminations, is the scandal of Christianity, and the greatest obstacle to the conversion of the heathen."

The second problem is the evangelization of the unchurched masses within our own borders. We have already spoken of the encouraging growth of the Church within the past century; but what an appalling fact it is that three Americans out of every five—sixty million out of our one hundred million—reported themselves to the last census as having no connection with any Church, either Catholic or Protestant.

In our own State of Pennsylvania, the last census reports that twenty-five per cent. of the population is Protestant, seventeen per cent. Catholic and that fifty-seven per cent. is connected with no Church whatever. There are only six States in the Union where even one-half the population is affiliated with any Church. In five of the six (Connecticut, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and New Mexico) it is the Catholic Church which is responsible for this showing, and in the sixth State (Utah) it is the Mormons who have brought the total over the fifty per cent. mark. In not a single State where Protestantism is dominant has the Protestant Church succeeded in bringing even one-half the population to join any kind of religious organization.

The estimates of church attendance bear out this conclusion that the Church is reaching only a fraction of the population. Naturally it is impossible to make anything more than an estimate on this point, but Dr. Josiah Strong, who has given the matter careful study, reports he is led to believe that out of every one hundred Americans, thirty attend some service regularly, twenty attend once in a while, and fifty never go near at all. The need for evangelism in foreign lands may be more picturesque, but is it not time, in the face of such conditions, to ask whether the land of the Pilgrims and the Quakers is really Christian?

The third problem the Church is facing and one which demands a speedy answer, is the problem of religious education. A generation or two ago it was safe to assume that the average American child received some training in religion and morals at home. There is an interesting passage in the diary of Cotton Mather, telling of the way he taught his little daughter Katy, then four years old: "I took my little daughter Katy into my study and there I told my child I am to die shortly and when I am dead she must remember everything I now say to her. I set before her the sinful condition of her nature, and I charged her to pray in secret places every day that God for the sake of Jesus Christ would give her a new heart." You and I smile at the notion of poor four-year-old Katy praying for a new heart, yet with all our modern ideas about child-religion must we not admit there has been a sad decline in the religious training the average American home gives to its children? Cotton Mather may have been misguided, but how many American parents do you know who are trying to do for their children what he tried to do for Katy?

Last fall the Pennsylvania State Sabbath-school Association reported that the Catholic and Protestant Sabbath-schools together are reaching sixty per cent. of the children in Pennsylvania who are of school age—that is, between five and twenty. We may assume that these children are getting some systematic training in religion and morals. But what about the other forty per cent., more than a million of the future citizens of this State? We can hardly say that parents who will not send—to say nothing of bring—their children to Sabbath-school are enough interested in religion to give these boys and girls training at home. Some of them may get it there, and others may get it elsewhere, but what a commentary it is on our Christian foresight that while we insist that every child receive a secular education, we actually allow forty children out of every one hundred to go out into life with little or no systematic training in religion and morals! One can discover the present result of such a system by asking the average school boy a simple question about the fundamentals of Christianity; what the result of this system will be a generation or two from now, one does not like to imagine.

The fourth problem the Church of our day must face and answer is the social problem. Even a superficial study of the facts shows that there has been an enormous increase in our national wealth within the past few years. The census of 1910 reports that the people of this country are saving $9,000,000 per day, and that between 1900 and 1910 our savings bank deposits increased $1680,000,000. If you want a more picturesque statement of the same situation, you will find that whereas in 1885 there were only twenty-eight millionaires in New York City, there are to-day well over two thousand.

But this growth in our national wealth has not been accompanied by a proportionate decrease in poverty. Our means of production seem to be highly efficient, but something is decidedly the matter with our means of distribution and "division." It is easy to collect harrowing stories of American poverty, but the way to a solution of the problem lies rather in the direction of a scientific study of the extent and causes of this misery. How widespread actual need is can be seen from a study of any one of the recent books on poverty. One of the best of these, taking as its definition of poverty "the inability to provide a sanitary dwelling and sufficient food and clothing to keep the body in working order," shows that in fairly prosperous times no less than ten million people in this country are in poverty, and that in the cities this proportion rises as high as twenty per cent. of the total population. Certainly the Church cannot feel that its work is done when such conditions persist among us. Cannot organized Christianity bring about a more equal enjoyment of the fruits of our unprecedented prosperity?

In attempting to meet this situation, the Church does not blame the men who have become rich by honest methods, nor does it excuse those whose vice and laziness have kept them poor. The Church does not propose to enter the field of economies or politics to such an extent that it will lose sight of its real work—developing the religious life of the community. The remedy the Church offers for this situation is a better application of the principles of Jesus Christ to our national life. When the old rule of selfishness has given away to Jesus' new rule of love, when stewardship has supplanted ownership, and when each of us is trying to make the most of himself for the sake of others, as Jesus did—then the Church will have begun to point the way to a solution of this problem.

These issues are those of the Church at large, but the individual church-member can do much to meet them. He can study these bigger problems of Christianity, for only on the basis of this knowledge can he hope to understand his share of the work before us all. He can by prayer enter into the life and purposes of God, and thus come to see the part God has for him personally to do. And he can certainly give himself in a new spirit of consecration to the work of the Church to which he belongs. As he makes that part of the Church stronger and more eager to do its part, he contributes not a little to the cause of Christianity as a whole.

BRYN MAWR, PA.

CLEAR BUT LOVING PROTEST.

Corder Catchpool (Blackburn P. M.), court-martialed on the thirtieth of First Month, said in his statement:

"I believe that a nation with the vision and courage to chose the way of Jesus Christ may win a like redemptive victory,—the only kind of victory that can rid the world of war. My love for England, my faith in her, make me hope that some day she will be that nation."

After expressing the difficulty he felt in withholding from sharing in the self-sacrifice of other men who believe that by fighting they advance a noble cause, T. C. C. said that he was commanded to fight for peace with other weapons, on other battlefields. He went on to give his reasons for joining the F. A. U. in Tenth Month, 1914, and the nature of the service he had given whilst a member of it; also the reasons which had induced him to retire from the Unit last year. Among other things he said:

"At home men who stood for the same ideals as myself were called cowards and shirkers at the tribunals, whilst members of the Unit were often held up as the 'genuine conscientious objector.' I knew that the course chosen by my friends who stayed behind was harder than the one I had so eagerly taken. In the circumstances which had arisen I felt able to serve the cause of Peace better at home than abroad. On Fifth Month 23, 1916, after nearly nineteen months at the front, I left the Unit and returned to take my stand with the thirty-four comrades who were then expecting sentence of death in France, for their faith. I set myself to spread the spirit of good-will, through which alone permanent peace can come, studying and helping others to study the principles which must govern national life and international relations if wars are to cease.

"Meanwhile the certificate of absolute exemption issued to me by the War Office in Second Month, 1916, was cancelled, although it had been granted solely on the grounds of conscientious objection. I went before the tribunals, but failed to obtain the absolute exemption provided by the Act for genuine cases. Refusing all forms of compromise, I continued the work I had taken up until the day of my arrest. It is hard for me to withhold any service, to disobey any orders, or to cause any trouble. But the spectacle before the world as I stand here to-day of two highly civilized Christian nations straining every nerve in the effort to starve each other's women and children, to destroy the greatest possible proportion of each other's manhood, strengthens my confidence in the better way out of the world's trouble, and lays upon me afresh the duty of proclaiming it. I rejoice in every opportunity to do so, and look forward with peace of mind to all that awaits me in this service."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE LEAGUE OF GOOD CITIZENSHIP OF PHILADELPHIA.— HINTS FOR LEAGUE MEETINGS.

It is well for speakers to remind the children of the topics of previous meetings and of their continuity. The living citizen, the thinking citizen, the acting citizen, the speaking citizen, during Second Month, the birthday month, have been vividly portrayed in Washington and Lincoln, our two greatest citizens; greatest because their greatness was built on goodness.

In Third Month, William Penn, Philadelphia's Great Citizen, was the General Topic. The children have learned about his kindness to the Indians and the religious freedom on his Province.

The following points may be emphasized:

1. When a boy of eleven he had once when alone in his room, a strong sense of the presence of God, and of the fact that the soul of man can hold communion with God. The effect of this never left him.

2. At sixteen he went to the University of Oxford, where he came under the influence of a preacher of the Society of Friends. About two years later his father sent him to Paris, hoping that among gay and new companions he would lose his desire to join the Friends. After an absence of a year or so he returned, and his father was delighted by his appearance and manners and his knowledge of French. To his father's disappointment, however, he showed an unchanged purpose and he soon identified himself completely with the Friends.

3. In 1692 Penn wrote what he called "An Essay towards the Present and Future Peace of Europe," in which he put forth the idea of a great court of arbitration. This book was intended to show the desirableness and the truest means of it, to wit: justice and not war. It proposes that the states or nations of Europe should send deputies to a general diet or congress of nations where all their difference might be settled on equitable terms without recourse to arms.

The Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia has just placed in the north entrance to Philadelphia City Hall, facing on Broad Street, a bronze tablet containing the prayer of William Penn for his province. It was while William Penn was on board the Endeavor in the Delaware River, waiting to set sail for England in 1684, that he wrote a letter to friends ashore for general circulation as a final prayer for his holy experiment.

The original, which is somewhat abridged in the tablet, is as follows:

"From on board the ketch Endeavor, the 12th of 6. mo. 1684, for Thomas Lloyd, James Claypole, John Simcock, Christopher Tayler, and James Harrison, to be communicated in meetings in Pennsylvania and among Friends—

"And thou Philadelphia, the virgin settlement of this province, named before thou wert born, what love, what care, what service, and what travail have there been to bring thee forth and preserve thee from such as would abuse and defile Thee. O that thou may be kept from the evil that would overwhelm thee, and that, faithful to the God of thy mercies in the life of righteousness thou mayst be preserved to the end. My soul prays to God for thee that thou mayst stand in the day of trial, that thy children may be blest of the Lord and thy people saved by His power."

General Sub-topic: The seal of Philadelphia is before us so often that we scarcely notice it, but every small part of it has its meaning. The policemen wear it, every public paper bears it, and the officers of this League have it upon their badges. It is a shield divided crosswise. Above, there is a plough, which stands for farming, below, a ship for commerce. These make us think of our fine farms from which our food comes, and the ships remind us of our trade with all the world.

At the top of the seal is a crest, a bare arm holding a pair of scales, which represent Justice. This means that just persons weigh facts carefully in their minds and act with calm judgment.

A woman on the right of the shield represents Peace. She has an olive wreath on her head—the olive branch is the symbol of peace. In her hand she has a scroll bearing an anchor, which represents Hope. All this means that Philadelphia wants peace, and hopes for more and more justice and peace among her citizens.

The other figure holds in her hand a cornucopia filled with flowers and fruit. She represents Plenty, and stands for a wish that Philadelphia may always have plenty of all good things for her people.

Below the shield we have the motto, which consists of two words—Philadelphia and Maneto. Maneto is a Latin word which means "continue;" therefore the motto is "Let Philadelphia continue." But Philadelphia itself is not an English word, but comes from the Greek, and means "Brotherly love." So the city motto also means "Let brotherly love continue."

The city's colors are blue, which signifies truth, and gold, which represents worth, so true worth may be said to be the meaning of our flag.

William Penn's interest in and kindness toward the Indians had much to do with the freedom of development of this colony, since there was no fighting to do. A pleasant picture of his relations with them, tells of a duck pond near Second and Market Streets, where the Indians got up games for the benefit of their friend, and ran wonderful races, all of which Penn enjoyed watching. He sometimes joined in these games, and thus gained the confidence of the Indians by sharing their pleasures.

The open squares in the city were of Penn's planning, and were thus the first public playgrounds for children, and we should guard them with care, to keep them always open.

THIRD MONTH CLEANING.

Third Month is the month for cleaning cellars or any other places where our winter accumulations have made things unwholesome. The students of science tell us that in that month, when the warm days come, every living thing begins to increase and multiply. The germs which bring molds, the eggs of flies, roaches and bed-bugs even, all develop, so that housekeepers who want to have sweet and clean homes must keep busy cleaning out all the things which St. Patrick is said to have driven out of Ireland. Sunlight and fresh air do much for the inside of the house, which has been shut up during the cold weather. Outside are the cocoons which the tussock moth and the bag-worm leave. The caterpillar fastens on the under side of the window sills, on the trunks of trees, and around cellar doors and cellar window frames. The bag-worm hangs himself on twigs, these should be cut off and burned. The cocoons should be scraped away, and then destroyed, if we want shade and green leaves from the trees later in the season.

Whitewash and broken pieces of lime help to sweeten and make pure all the doubtful places, and after their use a dirty corner looks fresh as well as smells fresh.

Rat holes should be filled with the pieces of lime and with strips of tin, which will drive the animals away.

CHALKLEY HALL TO GIVE WAY TO FACTORY.

Within the next few months there will rise on the site of the famous old Chalkley Hall, on Wheatshaf Lane, a modern factory building, thus wiping out one more of the historic homes of the northeast section. The American Engineering Company has recently purchased 23 acres of land bounded by the Pennsylvania Railroad, Wheatshaf Lane, Sepviva Street and Frankford Creek, and paid for the tract at the rate of $3500 per acre. Plans will be made for the erection of several fine buildings.

The property was secured from the Wetherill family, in whose possession the land has been since 1817, when it was bought by John Wetherill. The mansion known as Chalkley Hall has been kept in excellent repair and for several years past has been loaned to the College Settlement as a summer home for the poor of this city. Beneath the shady trees of the spacious grounds, hundreds of unfortunate people have been permitted to enjoy the pure air out from the sweltering streets of the congested parts of the city. At the same time the work of the Settlement along lines of social service and employment were successfully carried out. All summer long the house was filled with the members of the families, many of whom derived much benefit from their week's stay at Chalkley Hall.

The College Settlement has used Chalkley Hall since 1902, and has quartered there a household of from 20 to 30. Each week there were from 4 to 6 picnics held there with boating and swimming in the Delaware River. The original building was torn down some time ago to make room for the Pennsylvania Railroad freight yards, leaving the larger mansion intact.

Thomas Chalkley, from whom the place derives its name, was a minister in the Society of Friends and came to this country from England as a young man, in 1697, and settled in this city in 1701 and moved to Frankford in 1724. He related that his enemies stirred up some bad people against him and to add to his troubles he lost several vessels valued at one thousand pounds, and at the same time his new barn was burned. He died in 1741, while on a visit to the Island of Tortola.

The day before his death, being enfeebled by illness, he preached to the people, concluding his sermon with the words of the Apostle Paul, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." He was buried in the Friends' Burial Ground, Tortola. The Frankford Historical Society has a brick from his now crumbling tomb.

The will of Chalkley is interesting. Evidently he considered the possibility of dying abroad. The will provides, "If I die at home I desire my corpse may be laid in Friends' Burying Ground, in Philadelphia, by the side of my former dear wife so as that there may be room for my present dear wife (if she please), so that I may lay between them, but this particular I leave as a thing indifferent, it's only to show my love to them both till death." He left his small library of books and his Journal, which had been published, to the Monthly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia.* The plantation he willed to his wife for life and then to his daughter, Rebecca, and to the latter another tract of about five acres upon this curious condition, "that my said daughter marry no other way than according to the established rule among Friends, i. e., the people called Quakers; the reason why I lay this injunction on my daughter is because care is taken in this Society that no rakish or profligate persons are suffered (if known) to pass among them in marriage, nor in a clandestine way, and therefore if she marry any other way (she being carefully brought up and educated therein), I will that the premises go to my brother George Chalkley's daughters, etc. _____, and if Samuel and Rebecca Thornton approve of it, I would have their daughter Ann have their share."

Thomas Chalkley bought the plantation in several tracts. It was then a tract of 340 acres and 80 perches, and extended along the road leading from Frankford Road to Point no Point (this is the present Wheatsheaf Lane), and along the Great Road leading from Philadelphia to Point no Point (the present Richmond Street), and extended to Frankford Creek. It also included a tract of two acres below or near the mansion house laid out for a landing.

The original building on the plantation was the old brick house near the Pennsylvania Railroad, which probably was there at the time of Chalkley's purchase in 1715, the deeds referring to a brick message. This building was very old forty years ago.

The western part of Chalkley Hall was the home of Thomas Chalkley, the hall itself was built by Chalkley's son-in-law, Abel James, who married Rebecca Chalkley, between 1741 and 1789. The new building and the old were at first connected by an overhead passage, the space below at first being open; this was built up at a later date.

There has long been a story current in Frankford, believed by many, of an underground passage to Frankford Creek. This is doubtless a myth. There are two brick arched passageways in the cellar, which were used as storage vaults for provisions. Similar stories of underground passages are told of Stenton and Washington's Headquarters at Valley Forge.

The various owners of Chalkley Hall have been: Abel James and wife, 1741-1789; John Drinker, 1789; Frederick Pigon, 1789-1792; Lawrence John Ledger LeSenechal de Cercado, a refugee from San Domingo, 1792-1794; John Nicholson, 1794-1797; Joseph Potts and Joseph Kirkbride, 1797-1798; Samuel Allen, 1798-1814; Samuel York, 1814-1817. The property was bought by John Wetherill in 1817 and has been in the Wetherill family since then.—From The Philadelphia Record.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The Pennsylvania State Senate passed the Tompkins bill to abolish capital punishment by vote of 32 to 12 on the 26th ult., and the measure is now before the House, where it will be merged with the Wells-Hess bill.

Three new playgrounds are assured to Philadelphia's congested districts through the Orphans' Court approving settlement of litigation over estates of the donor, Richard Smith and his w'ow.

Coal is to be 75 cents lower a ton for family sizes, beginning on the first inst., according to action taken by officers of the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company.

Efforts by all railroads of the country to obtain a general increase in freight rates, probably of 10 to 15 per cent., were forecast by a preliminary petition of the principal Eastern roads to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Western roads notified the Commission they would file similar application soon.

While the law for an eight-hour day for railway employees was before the Supreme Court, it was commonly stated that such a law would increase the annual pay-rolls of the carriers anywhere from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. Such an increase in expenses, it was declared throughout Wall Street, would be a serious blow to the transportation industry. Last week, however, the very instant it was known that the Supreme Court had declared the Adamson law constitutional, Wall Street promptly began to take a hopeful view of the railway outlook.

The food conference called by Governor Capper of Kansas to cope with the problem of high prices produced a number of suggestions, among them being a vegetable garden in every back yard in the cities, cultivation of potatoes in vacant city lots, an extra half-acre of potatoes on every farm, and more common sense in expenditures in the home.

Through a co-operative agreement recently entered into between the New York Botanical Garden in Bronx Park and the International Children's School Farm League, instruction in gardening will be started in this month and continued by various courses throughout the season.

Harvard's Board of Overseers has appointed a committee of seven women to make an inspection of the University dining halls and kitchens and suggest improvements. These suggestions will be read at the monthly meetings of the Board.

A Massachusetts paper says it is expected that the Whittier Home Association will be enabled to buy and preserve the Amesbury home of the beloved poet, John Greenleaf Whittier. There ought to be sufficient local pride to furnish the needed money, but if that fails outside help must be advanced in measure to retain the building with its valuable contents so intimately related to the life and work of Whittier.

The presidents of Vassar, Wellesley, Smith and Mount Holyoke Colleges met at Mount Holyoke last week to form a permanent conference of these institutions. Among the subjects to be considered is a uniform plan for college entrance requirements.

Restoration of pre-historic cliff dwellings, comprising the Navaho national monument, and supposed to be the homes of Snake Indians whose descendants live to-day in the Hopi villages in northeastern Arizona, has been ordered by the Smithsonian Institution. An announcement said that Neil M. Judd, of the National Museum would undertake the work, which was authorized by Congress at its recent session.

National Negro Health week is to be observed from the 21st to 27th, at the call of the executive committee of the National Negro business league. The annual observance was inaugurated by Booker T. Washington in 1915 as one of his last acts as leader of his race.

President Harry Garfield of Williams College voiced the sentiment of educators in Massachusetts when he opposed military training in public schools, advocating instead physical training to provide a physical and mental base for either fighting or citizenship.

Julius Rosenwald, president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, telegraphed the American Jewish relief Committee at New York a conditional offer of $1,000,000 to feed and clothe Jewish war sufferers. The relief committee has announced $100,000 as the amount that must be raised immediately if 3,000,000 Jews in the eastern war zone are to be saved from death. J. Rosenwald will pay $100,000 as each $1,000,000 is raised.

FOREIGN.—All clocks in the United Kingdom, it is announced, officially at London, will be moved forward one hour at 2 A. M. on the 8th. The clocks will be moved back again Ninth Month 17th. The Italian Government has issued a decree that all clocks shall be moved forward similarly.

The United States is the first nation to recognize formally the new Government of Russia. Ambassador Francis made a preliminary call on Foreign Minister Milukoff immediately upon the receipt of instructions from the State Department at Washington.

"A STATE OF WAR."

The State of War which has been proclaimed by our country, has not come upon us suddenly. For more than two years past, in the face of a "moderation of counsel and a temperateness of judgment" truly phenomenal, we have advanced step by step to the abyss. The military power has used these two years for what has been called preparedness. Have those of us who oppose war been similarly engaged? Are we prepared now to face the issue so as to leave no room for doubt that we have chosen "a better way of life?"

When the present cataclysm broke upon Europe it came to many as a bolt out of a clear sky. It has been noted many times since in Friendly circles as most remarkable that the first official proclamation of the "Friends of Truth" had a dominant note of self-accusation. "We all are guilty" was the heart-searching confession. So now with us. This expression "a State of War" should first of all be accepted as a challenge to try our own hearts.

"Search thine own heart what paineth thee
In others, in thyself may be."

How few of us can escape the implication! If in no other territory, perhaps in that of maintaining our ideas we are in a state of war.

But let us apply the test candidly to our circle of home, of business, of ordinary daily association with our fellows. Are we in a spirit of asserting our rights, rather than of remembering how others with ourselves are "compassed with infirmities?" Can we see wrong in others and feel "infinite pity," or are we censorious and insensibly resentful? Every day while the war is in process we may wisely subject ourselves to unflinching self-examinations, so that when it is at last over we shall have gained so much in the fiery discipline, that none will fail to confess that soldiers of peace excel in courage, in sacrifice, in devotion.

So much for a first step in the present emergency. Figuratively speaking, this first step is like "buckling on our armor." It is the sine qua non of preparedness for the peace battle.

Nor is the second step, as we conceive it, unlike the first. It also is a step of self-examination. Our service—the service of our daily life and toil—is it for self or is it in the final analysis for the world? First of all, this service makes possible a home. Is that home a barred castle or a refuge, in measure, for the needy and suffering? Society is calling aloud for a regeneration that can come only through rightly organized homes. But—secondly, this service of our lives makes necessary the multitudinous lines of business. Christianity has had wonderful triumphs in this territory, but as yet the fringe of business only is dominated by unselfishness. Who can believe we should have had such a war were all our business put absolutely on the Christian basis?

Finally, the service of our lives often fails most signally where we should least expect failure. We go into our church organizations—our meetings, in the spirit of getting rather than of giving something. It seems to us, perhaps, that we are not born for expression. We rejoice at the commission of a brother or sister to hand out the broken bread at the Master's bidding. Such a service, however, may be of little worth compared to the warm hand-shake, the hearty soul-to-soul touch quite within range of all. The actual practice of brotherhood in all our Friends' meetings by all our members, might now be the most notable peace work possible for us!

But when all this chastening of self-examination has had its legitimate fruit what remains for us actually to do of sacrifice and of service for our beloved country? We shall not cease to make a firm but loving protest against every invasion of the sacred rights of freedom by the legislative powers, we shall not cease with tenderest consideration to do our little to enlighten those consciences that have not seen how all war is incompatible with the spirit of Christianity. We shall not lose faith in the practicability of the sacrificial road to victory. That which we printed a month ago from the pen of a beloved minister under the title, "Endurance," involves all this. But it puts no barrier to one step more. In the domain of mercy we shall surely press to the front. Bereaved families, orphaned children, bleeding brothers will not appeal to us in vain. Some of us may be called to make fine distinctions. There is eloquent testimony at hand in records of our English Friends since the war began to show the service of such distinctions. But we shall not count our lives dear, shall not shirk danger, shall not hoard our estates, if we can labor and suffer and die with a "conscience void of offence." Our patriotism is to be above all for the Kingdom of God. We believe in the practical expansion of His Kingdom, so that enough of the Kingdom of God shall be here and now in us to make wars to cease to the ends of the earth.

AFTERMATH.

It must have been pretty widely noted of late years that when the sessions of Yearly Meeting have been completed one hears at nearly every hand the expression, "We have had a good Yearly Meeting." It seems a plain indication that Friends are making progress in what is called "group reactions." Certainly the points of view in the meeting multiply with the increasing opportunities of Friends. No one surely would think that there is any growing reticence of expression unless it might be on the part of the more conservative. Surely the subjects at hand are quite apart from the mere routine business so much emphasized in former years. The whole situation suggests the parable of the new wine and the old wine skins. Perhaps it is important not to be misled by this seeming similarity. Quite evidently the wine skins do not burst. What if we have learned from the parable to make our organization something quite different from wine skins! The ferment in life is part of the process of life. Our vital principle is to seek life rather than dead form. From some standpoints we may still do this very poorly, but we are surely in the way of doing it.

Such a new condition has its dangers. We can learn from others who have preceded us in the way. Some notes of their recorded experience are here set down as generalizations. If they have any use to us it will be because we make some real application of them. A Yearly Meeting then must strive to be something before it makes the effort to do something. Possibly its primary function is not executive—the Monthly Meeting is the working hand of the Society. So we observe in places the undoubted cry of overloading to the point that the "group functioning" in power is severely curtailed. Let us continue our "waiting upon God" rather than change to the point where we shall cry aloud for it.

The Message and Mission of Quakerism has found some very forceful expressions of late. In some of these the dangers of too much organization and of emphasizing officialism unduly have been made very clear. It is easy to get tangled in machinery, perhaps it is easy even to excel in out-reaching Christian love without some of the approved modern forms. Let us all continue our resolve to trust to the life as against methods either of conservatism or of liberalism.

WOMEN'S MINUTE OF EXERCISES.

The opening silence of the Yearly Meeting was broken by a petition for Divine help for those who were to transact the business of the meeting, and also for such as were in a more hidden way to share the exercises of the body.

A longing was expressed that the spirits of all might experience restlessness until they found rest in the Lord; and the aspiration was breathed forth: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." The comforting assurance was revived: "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The oft-needed warning was repeated: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." He will be faithful on His part as we are faithful on ours.

We were incited to recognize in this gathering of representatives from various meetings, a call to that fellowship one with another that comes to those whose "fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ." This fellowship should be felt, not only towards our own members, but also toward all the children of our Father in Heaven, and it may often find expression in "the soft answer" that turneth away wrath, and so contribute to the true preparedness for the coming of the Kingdom.

It is important, when entering into spiritual communion with our Father in Heaven, that we be in the right frame of mind toward all His children. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath gone against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift." Let this Christian love embrace every person, every people, every race. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

As we entered upon the reading of the queries and their answers, we were assured that in thus examining our condition we may be brought together in a nearness like the family relation. If we would measure our lives by the queries, and so become more careful in every walk of life—the result might be an ideal womanhood.

When we feel that we have had a good Yearly Meeting, do we find the next week, that we are different from the week before Yearly Meeting? The queries are to us as the hand-clasp of an old friend, but they ought to be something more. Do we know the power that makes us live up to their spirit? There ought to be each year as it were, new leaves from the perennial Root of Life. Faithful adherence was urged to the principles and testimonies of our predecessors in religious faith. Let us be loyal to these, carefully examining the ground upon which they stand. By suffering, we were told, many English Friends have been brought back to greater simplicity in their manner of living. Will we require the same thing to bring us back to simplicity or will we yield now? In this connection a dear Friend feelingly repeated the 46th Psalm: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble," etc.

During the consideration of the second query we were admonished to cultivate care as to the manner in which we speak of "those who have the rule over us," cherishing a spirit of prayer on behalf of our President and other officers of our government, and for our beloved country.

The third query was shown to be in close relation to the second by the quoting of the words: "The atmosphere of love is as essential to worship as the physical atmosphere is to breathing." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another."

The reading of the fourth query brought out much earnest concern that the practice of daily family Bible reading be neglected by none, and be entered upon and conducted in a prayerful spirit. More than one allusion was made to precious memories of Scripture reading in the childhood home. Those who are beginning their married life were encouraged to establish the habit of Bible reading in their new home. It was urged that employees be invited to share in the occasion, and that parents should see that their children take part in reading the Scriptures. We should look unto Him who "opened their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures," seeking His help and enlightenment, and the baptism of prayer often so marvelous in its results.

Much earnest concern was expressed for the right guidance of our children in regard to amusements. Attention was called to our deficiencies in this matter, particularly with reference to the theatre. Appeals were made that we do nothing that would be a stumbling-block to others. Let us try to realize that we may, in some measure, be "our brother's keeper." Let us avoid the appearance of evil. "Those that have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works." It is often easier to profess belief in words than to exemplify it in actions. When busy with the great cause of Christ we may exclude the things that are less worth while. Is life long enough and are our minds comprehensive enough to have room for everything? The loudest preaching is in our daily lives. We were, however, encouraged to trust our young people when assured that they are eager to find the right way. A Friend recalled the practice of her mother, who expressed clearly her own position in words of advice and caution, and then left the decision with her children with the words, "If all is peace within I have nothing more to say."

In considering the proposition to extend to women the inquiry as to the use of intoxicants as a beverage and in cooking illustration was given of the hurtful effects from example, and also of the temptation to employees by the use of alcoholic preparations in the home.

In connection with the answer to the eighth query we were encouraged to be not only just but generous—looking not alone on our own things but also on the things of others.

Much discussion was called forth by the proposition to revive the ancient query, to be answered in the meetings of ministers and elders: "Is there in your judgment any growth in spiritual life, and do there appear to be any convictions?" Some doubt was felt as to just what was meant in that connection by "convincement" as contrasted with "conversion." A Friend made the distinction that conversion was a conscious entering into the relation of a child to the Father in Heaven, convincement the clearing of the vision as to the definite views of faith and obedience as advocated by the Society of Friends. Let us not fear the word conversion so aptly described as "a turning around with the back to sin and the face to righteousness." Convincement to be truly worth while must be made vital by conversion. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

We were assured of the love for the body at large which spread over the meeting of ministers and elders, their desire being that there should be among them no feeling of superiority over the rest of the body.

Sympathy for those advanced in years was extended, encouraging them to believe in the faithfulness of Him who has been with them all their lives long, the language of their hearts being, "Abide with us, for it is evening, and the day is far spent." "Having loved His own, He loved them unto the end."

The appointment of a Committee to labor for the spread of the kingdom of God, especially in our industrial and social order, in which we are conscious of the seeds of war, brought the meeting into deep exercise of spirit. We realized that we have fallen far short in our application of the Gospel of love and reconciliation in our lives, both individually and socially, and if we will each take up our daily cross and follow humbly our crucified and risen Saviour, He will work through us beyond what we can ask or think.

The report of the Peace Committee told us much of their valuable work throughout the year. Our attention was, however, called to the fact that while Committees are necessary for the efficient carrying out of such work, yet the burden of responsibility falls on each of us individually. In the trying days in which we live it is most important that we be able to give a reason for the hope that is in us, and that we so live that we shall bear the tidings of love and good-will to all with whom we come in contact.

"Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day and having done all to stand." (Eph. vi.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

THE FRIENDLY METHOD OF REACHING CONCLUSIONS IN MEETING.

The proceedings of our last Yearly Meeting have drawn attention and some criticism to the method of arriving at decisions in Friendly gatherings. It is agreed that simple majorities should not decide. Two other theories are often advanced. One is that the weight of the meeting as determined by the Clerk and the more spiritually-minded members, should prevail. The other is that substantial unity should exist before any new measure is adopted.

It may easily happen, however, that the two will be in conflict with each other—that the undoubted weight of the Meeting will be in favor of a new proceeding but a minority, considering weight as well as numbers, will oppose. Which method of deciding under these circumstances should prevail?

If the views of such a minority are determined by simple conservatism, by living in communities outside the main currents of thought and feeling of the Yearly Meeting, or by any other motive, however honest, which would fetter progress, it is not likely that the method which permits such a block to be placed on what the most spiritual and best informed members consider safe and sane advance will conduce to good feeling or permanent adoption.

In an even division, or anything approximating to it, there would probably be no difficulty in negotiating any new proposition. But if there is a manifest preponderance of weight in its favor, the only way would seem to be for the other side publicly to admit the fact and be the first to propose that the Clerk should minute the will and wish of the Meeting.

Rigid adherence to a cause of which the Meeting does not approve not only places an unpleasant burden on the Clerk, but tends to bring into disrepute our Friendly policy of recording decisions.

ISAAC SHARPLESS,

THE LIGHTBEARER OF SAN SALVADOR.

Who bore the light Columbus saw,
Pacing his deck with storm-tossed soul,
His hopes with mutinous fears at war,
When it was darkest ere the dawn unrolled?

Some Indian toiler, early at his chores,
His lantern rude shining with feeble ray;
No thought it heralded the long-sought shores,
The morning star of the world's coming day.

So what in lowliness we do or bear
Sends helpful light to other straining eyes;
In heaven at last we shall the story hear,
And bear our honors with a glad surprise.

THE LATE YEARLY MEETING.

The Yearly Meeting of 1917 has now become a part of the history of the Society of Friends. Its sittings are concluded, but its works and influence will live after them, and Philadelphia Friends will feel their effect for generations still to come. I have the impression that as time moves us further away from this year's gatherings their momentous and epoch-making character will become more and more apparent.

Who of us who were present can ever forget the sense of the deep underwell of spiritual exercise which even threatened at times to capsizé our ship—were it not for the steady hand of the unseen Captain at the helm? His wise and patient and calm leadership behind the scenes brought harmony out of apparent discord, and progress out of what some might have regretted as stultifying reaction. As always, so now the inevitable contrast between the liberal and conservative elements made itself felt. But why pit them against each other? A church, in order to be healthy and useful, must find room for both within her bosom. The conservatism must not "judge" the liberals. The liberals must not "despise" the conservatives. "Thou, why dost thou judge thy brother?" This is to the conservative. "Or thou again, why dost thou set at nought thy brother?" This is to the liberal. "For we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of God." This is for both alike. Thus does the conflict of tendencies repeat itself from the days of the Apostle Paul till our own day, and probably always will. But He who called His disciples the salt of the earth, also named them the light of the world. Salt is conservative, preserving the good, checking the spread of corruption, giving savor to the mass, while light is imperatively aggressive, liberal, diffusive. Yet both are in their inward nature sacrificial and self-renunciatory. Neither can do any good except they lose and consume themselves in their beneficent work. And thus the Cross becomes the center around which extremes meet, and in which they find their unitive principle and from which they derive their inspiration and high motive.

Truth always lies in the extremes, but never in one extreme only. The via media is often a colorless compromise, while the mere partisan is generally right in what he approves, and wrong in what he denies. "Just as the lens of the eye accommodates itself to various distances, whereby the object which at one time is clearly seen is on the next occasion so blurred as to be almost unrecognizable," so it is with our spiritual vision. We generally see only one thing clearly at one time, but the horizon encircles a grander sweep, and we remember that it is easy to serve one God "with all humility of mind."

We were reminded that the Church is not one field of labor but one instrument of service. "The field is the world." And that "the chief business of the Church is to further the concerns of her concerned members."

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has not a few such, both young and old. Our young men are seeing visions of future possibilities, and our old men are dreaming dreams of the glorious past—and both are from the Pentecostal Spirit, as the Apostle Peter pointed out. And with all our eager pushings forward into the firing line against the entrenched evils of our age, the younger members of this Yearly Meeting will not cease to honor their spiritual fathers and mothers, which is the first commandment, with the promise of continuance, but like this year's fruit-bearing branches will seek their support in last year's—neither one without the other in the Vineyard of the Lord.

Heartily do I bless Him who has in the recent meetings made it so evident that Philadelphia Friends lack neither "old men for counsel," nor "young men for war."

MAX I. REICH.

A DAY WITH OLD MEETING-HOUSES IN BUCKS COUNTY PENNSYLVANIA.

Speeding along an excellent highway leading through country most delightful to look upon, we soon reach the high ground upon which stands the beautiful village of Langhorn, on the western verge of which is Middleton meeting-house, formerly known as Neshaminy, established in 1682—the year of Penn's landing in his colony. The present building bears the date 1793. At the other end of the village we visited the house (now transformed into a very attractive dwelling) formerly used by the Orthodox Friends. The portion that chiefly interested us was erected in 1841. Some of our number distinctly recalled being present at the last meeting held therein, whereat were gathered Friends representative of the three bodies bearing the name in the neighborhood, besides a number of persons of other religious persuasions. The meeting, in Quaker parlance, "was favored," and remembered for the kindly spirit that pervaded it. The text of one of the speakers was, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that Thou visitest him."

From the high ground on which Langhorn is situated the beautiful valley of the Neshaminy bursts into view, on the farther side of which the celebrated George School is imposingly situated. The rival of our own Westtown, the buildings met our gaze with more than a passing interest.

Crossing the second ridge we again descend until we reach the quaint village of Newtown. Once dignified as the county seat, it belongs to that class which, owing to their remoteness from good railway connection, at one time ceased to grow; that limitation having some years since been removed, the town appears to have taken on, as it were, a new lease of life. Many of the older residences partake of the charm of mellowing age; and here again we find the unmistakable evidences of Quaker influence; for, close beside the leading street, stands

"Newtown's cheerful, sunny meeting-house."

And once again, as we invade the quiet precincts, our admiration is evoked by the general inviting up-keep of the property. This house was erected in 1815.

Leaving Newtown a ride of about six miles brings us to Wrightstown. The country through which we pass is undulating and well cultivated. The broad-acred farms, with their spacious dwellings and accompanying outbuildings, elicited our continued favorable comment. Many of these homes, we knew, must at some time, if not now, have belonged to Friends, and this thought brought up visions of the Quarterly Meeting dinners and "free-hearted hospitality" that once reigned within them.

Crowning an ascent from which the land slopes off to most every point of the compass, lies the little hamlet named above, with its one or two dwellings and inviting general country store, wherefrom are dispensed the modest household needs of the countryside, from a pound of sugar or yard of muslin to a post card picture of the meeting-house across the road. This bears upon the end fronting us as we enter the spacious yard, the date 1787, though the records show the meeting to have been established just one hundred years earlier. Considering the property as a whole, its beauty of situation, the commodious grounds, and the very inviting appearance of the great house itself, it is doubtful whether, save one to be directly mentioned, a more imposing meeting property can anywhere be found among the many that set forth the taste and outward prosperity which distinguished what might be designated the golden age of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and this we would set down as occurring a century and a quarter ago.

The hour was quarter to one when our car was brought to a stand beneath the shade within the grounds. Its five occupants alighted and were soon arranged for the dispensing of an inviting lunch which our genial host now drew forth from sundry packages which had ridden with us thus far but without occasion of comment. If there is a time when by common consent the normal human nature unbends, the heart grows warm, and the memory awakens, it is in the prospect of refreshment for the "inner man." The social spirit, already strong throughout our journey, now became more sprightly. One of our number recalled (without quoting) those pleasing lines from Vergil's "Æneid":

"Tum victu revocant vires, fusique per herbas Impletur veteris Baachi pinquisque ferinas."
"Then with food they regain their strength,
And, stretched along the grass, they take their fill of old wine and fat game."

The old wine and fat venison were, of course, remote from our repast, it is needless to say.

The conversation now gravely turned to a subject naturally suggested by the environment—namely, the great separation in the Society of Friends the causes which led to it, and the possibility of a reunited body of believers exercising its distinctive pristine influence and power—in fact, some of the deepest problems of the hour, as concerning the Society, were more than lightly touched upon.

Loathfully we parted from scenes so inviting; lingeringly we gazed upon those far away hills which ringed the horizon to the southward, and upon which the haze of departing summer rested so peacefully. Strive as we would to keep it down a tinge of melancholy was seeking its way into the feelings as we compared past with present. A pet explanation is mostly offered to account for all these changes indicating decline of numbers along with spiritual influence and power; it is phrased as lack of faithfulness—

"The zeal with which our fathers wrought
Has faded from our view.
Like words they spake, the doctrines taught
Have vanished like the dew."

WAR means destruction. It almost invariably means the destruction of some small nation, and the destruction of a small nation with high ideals is far greater a blow to human progress than the fall of a great empire in which such ideals do not prevail.

[The following is from a letter written by our friend, Herbert V. Nicholson. The report of Dr. Inazo Nitobe's address will doubtless be of interest to many and we are glad to insert it.—Eds.]

PRESENT TENDENCIES IN JAPAN.

For want of a letter head I have made out the suggestion to show what I represent in writing this letter. This Association holds meetings for worship on First-day afternoon once a month, and once a quarter have half-day meetings with talks by members and general fellowship together.

At our last Fellowship meeting, Dr. Nitobe gave a most interesting talk, on which our Secretary took rather full notes. At the meeting of the Executive Committee some time later it was decided to send a copy of this talk to the Philadelphia FRIEND, with the thought that it would be of interest to the readers. It was of course most interesting to us in its entirety; but it is perhaps too long for THE FRIEND and could be cut down considerably.

This is not sent as from our Mission, therefore I am not sending it to Julia C. Collins to be forwarded. I am, however, sending her a copy, as a matter of interest and telling her that I sent it direct to thee, as from the above Association.

In case the article cannot be used as it is, perhaps thee could send it to Joseph Elkinton for alteration, and he could also tell something about the Fellowship, as he doubtless addressed it while in Japan. Our next meeting is to be Second Month 14, 1917, and Irene Smith, just out from Ireland, is going to tell about Friends' work in England, and others are to speak about the Conscientious Objectors.

Trusting that this will be of use to THE FRIEND and that the Japanese words in it are not too difficult and with all sorts of good wishes.

I am very sincerely thine,
HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.
For the Executive Committee.

Address given by Dr. Inazo Nitobe at a Fellowship Meeting of Friends from Yearly Meetings Outside of Japan, at the home of Dr. and Mary P. E. Nitobe, Tokyo, Japan, Eleventh Month 24, 1916.

In Japan to-day we hear much of corruption visible and invisible; hidden things come to the front; the last newspaper gogai (extra) tells of a member of Parliament arrested for vice, and such things are by no means rare. The older generation bemoans that the spirit of Bushido is gone or going. As to being content, though there is a great deal of discontent there are many signs of contentment—of self-complacency. You may have noticed the public tone about the dignity of the nation, of Japan's having risen to the rank of nations of the first estate, being one of the Great Powers, and so on, which shows this state of mind. This spirit of content has its dangerous side as well as its merits; its danger is patent; it is a kind of spiritual chauvinism, and somewhat like the German "Deutschland über Alles." It tends to exalt the national interests above all, even above the human interests.

Yet I confess there are signs of a deeper and better interest in things spiritual and religious. The very fact that religionists of all colors, Shinto, Buddhist and their offshoots are bestirring themselves, vying with each other to do some social work, is a sign that they are at least desirous of asserting their vitality.

The matter of matrimony is taken up by the different religions because they wish to show they are alive and take an interest in the living issues of the present. Hence also the interest they take in public affairs, in war, in national morals. They have Sunday-schools, and express opinions on all public questions, especially questions of public morals and of political ethics. The Buddhists have the advantage, because out of their abundant literature—which exceeds the Christian—they can prove almost everything. When the spirit of nationalism prevailed they could quote scriptures to uphold it. On the other hand cosmopolitan can prove that Buddhism overlooks all national boundaries. It is very convenient. Shinto is ethnic; it cannot pretend to be a universal or anything but a national religion; but Buddhism can.

An immense amount of Zasshi (magazines) is flooding the country; is going into all nooks and corners. They (the magazines) are not solid but give some information and thus are a great stimulus. All this creates discontent, a yearning for better things and the elders cannot satisfy their thirst. I have received many letters asking information on more or less spiritual matters I answer, "I do not know you. I cannot answer such questions without speaking face to face. Is there no priest in your neighborhood to whom you can go?" Many a time they answer, "Yes, there is one who is highly virtuous, but he is not up to date." It is true, the young want answers from someone with a knowledge of the present. Therefore the Seinen Kwai (Young Men's Association) movement—not necessarily Christian—has started in all parts; there are 20,000 of them. There is no village where there is not one. These associations often have for their object some material improvement for the village, planting trees, a library, better roads, setting up signs, etc. Sometimes the object is educational; such as night classes, or the inviting of speakers to lecture. Sometimes it is religious; as the coming together in temples, and hearing sermons preached. The vast numbers of these associations formed an influence so great that the government began to take fright, because they can easily be made an instrument in the hands of politicians. Also when they started economic improvement, such as planting trees, etc., the associations tended to become a business corporation carried on by irresponsible young men who started them to make money. To avoid possible abuse the Ministers of Home Affairs and of Education gave instruction to discourage (the formation of) Seinen Kwai, which meant to forbid—they have no authority to forbid, but it amounts to that—to make yoo (making money) their business; and to confine the societies to moral questions and not to have small associations, but to unite several. Since then instead of the opening of (small) Seinen Kwai there has been an increasing federation of village ones with the bigger associations.

With the formation of Seinen Kwai (Young Men's Associations), having a cultural object—shugyo we call it—comes an increase of periodicals not only to foster them but to supply their need. "Our object is to supply information to the Seinen Kwai"—which number millions of members—they say, especially for the country ones. There are fifty or sixty publications claiming to be official organs. These are good signs. The young men are trying to get if not new at least better ideas and information on moral and spiritual questions.

(To be concluded.)

AFRAID? OF WHAT?

Afraid? Of what? The dark of night?
The boisterous wind? The tossing waves?
Dost doubt His love? Dost doubt His might?
Where is thy faith in Him who saves?
Hast thou so soon forgot the bread
He brake, and hungry thousands fed?
Hast thou forgot His healing touch—
The lame that walk, the blind that see,
The dead that live? Forgot how much
Through all the years He's done for thee?
Forgot the birds and flowers, His care
Of all things, here and everywhere?
O soul of mine, thy God of love
Hath built foundations for thy faith;
If thou wilt dwell on them and prove
The blessed truth of what He saith,
No doubt, no care, can e'er affright;
He'll bring thee joyous through the night!

THE GREAT VISION.

The world is in the midst of a great conflagration. We have seen love and hate, generosity and greed, cruelty and tenderness, high ideals and low ideals, all thrown into the fire together, and we watch with horror and dismay, wondering what will be left when the flames go down, and what remnants of civilization can be gathered up from the ashes.

How can the mind of humanity be sustained through this terrible ordeal, if there is no dream of hope to cling to?

What is there for the coming generation which will enable them to rebuild civilization again? Let us look earnestly for a gleam in the darkness, a hope to dwell upon, and then let us cherish and strive for it.

There is a well-known legend of a beautiful bird, that, once every five hundred years is burned to ashes on the altar, matures into new life, salutes the priest, and flies forth into the air.

From the ashes of this great conflict we hope there may come forth a higher spiritual life for the soul of the world.

Before these dark days, we have had peace, we have had prosperity, we have had wonderful scientific development, which has given us a wider reach, and a great command over material things. We have learned to work together to increase our own wealth and power, but this has not brought to us a commensurate spiritual growth. We have decided to eat, drink and be merry, and have not listened to the searching question, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Consequently we have carelessly kindled the fires which are burning away the things we held so precious. In our own country, still so prosperous, we have not yet felt the scorching flame, but if we do not weep with those who weep, and mourn with those who mourn, if a great spirit of sympathy, and helpfulness and good-will does not go out from us, if we do not gain the new spiritual vision which came to Job out of his sorrows, then I fear that we, too, shall feel the consuming fire.

Great lessons are now being burned in upon humanity. We are learning how wonderful are the powers of human beings. We see that physical and mental capacity can be developed. We see how mankind can work together when dominated by one ideal, what sacrifices can be cheerfully made, what sorrow and deprivation can be borne, and we have learned that heart and soul are stronger than body and mind.

The thought of the underlying unity of human beings, the great force which flows through us all, has of late been much taught by philosophers and teachers and various religious cults. We have now had a powerful demonstration of that unity, which may point out a new way for humanity to seek after and to walk in.

France, they say, has found her soul. She has probably done this more completely than any other nation because more highly civilized, more homogeneous, and more united in interests. All barriers are removed among Frenchmen. They are one. They feel it and rejoice in it, and it sustains them in their great suffering.

Dr. Jowett, coming from England recently, said, "I anticipate social revival and social reconstruction such as we have scarcely dared to look for in our fondest dreams."

"Every doctrine of our faith is being questioned and tested in the crucible of a fierce and tremendous experience. I believe, with all my heart I believe, that the message of the Church of God will emerge from the furnace purified and refined as by fire, with a reality and an authority which will more than ever command the reverent attention and homage of the world."

Dr. Jowett sees a new spiritual vision coming to the thinkers and writers of England. He says, "Who would have imagined that the calm and radiant presence of the Lord would have been seen in the pages of Bernard Shaw? Amid all the bitter irony and satire of Shaw's thought and spirit, amid all his irreverence, the strange, pathetic figure of the Saviour has recently appeared for a moment."

"I am ready to admit," says Bernard Shaw, "I am ready to admit, that after contemplating the world of human nature for nearly sixty years, I see no way out of the world's misery but the way which would have been found by Christ's will if He had undertaken the work of the modern practical statesman."

"Perhaps most of you have read H. G. Wells' "Mr. Britling," and felt the solemnity of the conclusion, when his heart-broken search after truth and consolation, finds its end, like the search of Job, in a vision of God.

In this great world-contest for mastership, the white, the black, the yellow man have found themselves side by side. The Protestant, the Catholic, the Greek, the Jew, the Mohammedan and the pagan have found religion no bar to their joint action. As brothers in arms they have lived and died together. In the final settlement, they must all have their share.

If these can be brothers in the wild fury of battle, may they not also be brothers in the struggle for a higher and better human life. Is there not here a vision for us of the day when the whole world may be bound together "by golden chains about the feet of God."

Mankind has struggled through the ages, gradually conquering the material world, seeking for the things necessary for his natural life, and, these obtained, has felt a deeper craving for the satisfaction of his soul. He has an inward hunger to know himself and to know God.

To this yearning, a response has come. The great prophets, the great teachers, the great poets have spoken to us. We have had revealed in Christ the Way, the Truth and the Life. Why is it that these great messages, centuries old, have not more uplifted the mass of humanity? Can it be because we have not realized that we cannot reach the heights for which we long, until we can all go together?

In the flame and smoke of this awful world-struggle, we have seen revealed our glory and our shame, and our souls, weary, suffering, terrified, have cried out for God.

Let us hope and pray and dream, that from out of this agony of the world, there may arise in our souls a great vision, the vision of humanity, united, looking up to the God of love.

REBECCA N. TAYLOR.

TRUE DEMOCRACY.

We live in a democracy—the fathers of our nation framed its policy in these few clear words, "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Again, in the midst of our four terrible years of civil war, Lincoln gave us his Gettysburg address with its concluding words of lofty patriotism, "It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion, that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

My friends, this is a lofty ideal for a nation to make its own. When we restless, busy Americans stop for a moment to consider our birthright we must feel a thrill of pride, and we should feel deep gratitude.

What does this government of the people, by the people, and for the people mean? We all know it means that questions of state and national policy should be decided by the people through their representatives, that the voice of the majority is the final word, and that the minority must accept it as such, and faithfully and loyally acquiesce in the decision, and stand by the nation. This method of government seems to foster reason and tolerance and to be altogether admirable.

In the midst of a great body of people of all varieties of thought, and of very many nationalities, such as comprise our country, it is perfectly legitimate for any of these groups or individuals to do all in their power to persuade others to their way of thinking, but meanwhile they must loyally obey the laws of the nation as they stand. Now there is a group of people, comparatively small in number, who live in this American democracy, accept its protection and privileges and share its wealth, and then, usually at times of great stress and peril, refuse to do its bidding. I heard it said of them not long since, "The Friends are good people, but poor citizens." It made me a little indignant, but the words stayed with me, and I have thought of them more than once.

Are we indeed poor citizens of our great republic? We are troublesome people when we take our stand on our conscience and say to our government, "There is a higher authority than yours, bidding us set your laws at naught." I believe that in most cases, where we do so assert ourselves, the government has no wish to make our lot a hard one and would willingly make any reasonable concessions. But there is its own authority to be upheld if the nation is to live, and here are we, plainly and uncompromisingly refusing our obedience at certain points. Both seem in the right; what is to be done?

Friends, as a group of people standing apart and refusing to obey the laws of our land, let us look at such a situation from every point of view. Let us realize the difficult position in which our attitude places our government, and let us be sure that in so taking our stand we follow absolutely the voice of the Spirit within us, neither resisting nor yet exceeding the authority of its clear call. When we thus withhold our obedience to laws willed by the majority because we cannot do otherwise, surely we seem to be false to the great principle of government by that majority. Unless something very real and true compels us, we have indeed no excuse for the position that we take.

But suppose, as in England to-day, or as in the crisis that appears to be almost at our own doors, the government is trying to force obedience to measures which our conscience forbids us to endorse and to which we cannot conform. For instance, the bills for enforcing military training on all young men of a certain age, and severely punishing those who refuse such training seem, to many of us Friends to be a grave menace to personal liberty and the spirit of democracy.

In the hysterical excitement which has swept over the land, the American people seem to have forgotten something of their old-time love of liberty. The spirit of unreasoning fear has gripped them, and they are near to cutting loose from some of the strong anchors of the past. Here let the quiet good sense of the Friends do its steadying work. Until such measures are passed, let us do all in our power to stop them, and to show to those about us what far-reaching evil we believe those laws really will mean to our democracy. If they pass, and we must either violate our convictions or suffer for them, in choosing the latter course perhaps we may not only gain our own peace of soul, but have the further happiness of believing that we are, in our measure, furthering the cause of true democracy in our loved nation.

"But Thou wouldst not alone
Be saved, my Father! alone
Conquer and come to Thy goal,
Leaving the rest in the wild."

Ralph's clear, schoolboy voice put some real pathos into the words.

"It's strange," said he, "how strong and enthusiastic one gets when one reads anything fine! I begin to feel quite anxious to be doing something for somebody. And yet, O dear me, when some one asked me this morning to run down to town for him, I said I hadn't time."

"Yes," said Marion, "it seems beautiful and grand to live for others, when you read about it, but quite different when it comes to the point. I believe Edith wanted me to go out with her this morning. But it looked as though it was going to be very hot, and I let her go without me."

"Well," said Dorothy, "it seems very dull and flat at the time, but afterwards you do feel different."

Ralph read on:

"Therefore to Thee it was given
Many to save with Thyself;
And, at the end of the day,
O faithful Shepherd! to come,
Bringing Thy sheep in Thy hand."

"That is the poem father was reading the other night, isn't it?" asked Marion.

"Yes," said Ralph, "I don't profess to make it all out, but, as he read it, I thought to myself: That is the kind of man I should like to be! It seemed to me this man, Dr. Arnold, I suppose it was, had found out the right way of living; to help others, of course, but in a fine, nice, grand way, strong and splendid, and all that," and Ralph gave a descriptive wave of his arm.

"I don't think we can really help others unless we really love them," said Marion.

"There are plenty of fellows," said Ralph, "who give up their lives like that. They live in poor, out-of-the-way places, and see nothing but low, miserable people. They don't do it because it is their duty to do it, or because they expect at the end they will get rewarded for it, or because they are any happier for it now."

"There is plenty of sin and sorrow in this little village," replied mother, "quite enough to keep us all busy for the rest of our lives. Then there is the town, which needs help more. There are all the large cities in the land, with wants more awful than we can think of. There are all the heathen lands, stretching away into darkness on every hand. Hundreds of thousands, who have never even been told about the Lord Jesus, and we Christians have known it nearly two thousand years. What a deal there is to be done!"

"We must never forget that the work these brave men and women are trying to do was the work that the Lord did Himself, and that, even to Him, it was a work of disappointment, and in some sense, of failure. He lived, a man of the people, among the people, quietly helping, teaching and curing them. But with what result? They allowed themselves to be led astray by their leaders; they rose against Him and slew Him. It is tremendous work, full of disappointments and anxiety, and if He, judged by our outward and human standards, failed, how can we succeed?"

"But the Lord conquered in the end," said Dorothy.

"And why?" asked mother.

"Because He died," answered Dorothy, in a lower voice.

"Yes," said mother. "The world, with its sin, its pride, its revolt against God, is very strong, and the prince who rules it is strong. But Christ, through His death and resurrection, conquered them all. 'Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world,' He said. And He left behind Him a band whose work it was to go on with the work that He had begun, and to conquer as He had conquered. Faith has often waxed dim since then, and His followers have not done all they might. But this is what He still wants us to do, both at home and abroad; to go forth and win the world, and help the world. Now, you see, Christians ought to do this better than those who are not Christians. They have a great power behind them—the power of the Lord Jesus, who Himself has overcome, and who has promised that same power to them. They have the promise of success: 'This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.'

"And there is yet another reason. They ought to do it just because they are Christians. The Lord saved us that we might be used to save others, that we might join in His work. It is literally true that our lives are not our own; they were meant to be given to this great service. If we take all the good we can for ourselves, and do nothing more, we are not the only losers; the world is the loser, because there is one less to do the work that the Lord left for us all to do."

"Still, I don't see how to begin," said Marion.

"Be simple enough," said mother, "we often run away with the impression that great things are duties, and little things may be let alone. My experience is that little duties done, open the way for great ones.

"There is no happiness like the pleasure of helping others. But sometimes we do not find the Lord gives us these opportunities. Never mind, if we do promptly and well our daily duties, we are preparing ourselves for our work, and pleasing Him just as surely. We all have our little failings, and they get sadly into the way of our service. These must be cured."

"I know," said Dorothy. "Putting off things till the last moment, and doing them in a hurry, and reading story-books at night, when we ought to be going to sleep, and not getting up when the dressing-bell rings, and not practicing one's exercises often enough."

"Oh, and getting one's drawers into such confusion," said Marion, "they are endless."

"Well," replied mother, "you know just what has to be done, evidently. When your Heavenly Master sees fit, He will give you greater things to do. You are wanted, dears; we all are. Ask Him to give you real love for others, that you may be hungry to help them, and in an unexpected way, perhaps, the time will come."—G. CROSFIELD.

ANOTHER CENTENARIAN.

We recently published an account of Mary Goddard in THE FRIEND. A footnote explained that one of two other centenarians to whom we referred in that article had died after it had been put in type. This referred to Lydia Heald Sharpless. We adapt the following from the American Friend.

On Third Month 9th at Whittier, California, a great many people met to honor the memory of "Grandmother" Sharpless, a life-long member of the Society of Friends, who passed away Third Month 5, at the age of more than one hundred and six years.

Born in Middletown, Ohio, Eighth Month 22, 1810, Lydia Heald Sharpless had lived through all four of the wars in which the United States has engaged during its national history, and could vividly recall first reports of the battle of Waterloo. Her father, who lived to be one hundred and one years old, cast his first vote in a Presidential election for George Washington. His daughter, at the age of one hundred and six, was the first woman to register and cast a vote in California in 1916, when she, her son, granddaughter and great-grandson all cast their votes in favor of prohibition.

She was married in Middletown in 1836, according to the custom of Friends, to Albert F. Sharpless, with whom she celebrated the sixty-third anniversary of their marriage before his death fifteen years ago. Of their four children, three survive her—Benjamin Sharpless and Sarah Hiatt, of Whittier, and William Sharpless, of Los Angeles. There are thirteen grandchildren and twenty-three great-grandchildren.

With her husband and family, Lydia Sharpless moved from Middletown to Morro County, one hundred and fifty miles by wagon, on to Iowa in 1866, where they lived for twenty years, and in 1884 to California, where she lived a simple, industrious and happy life until her death. After reaching the century mark, she pieced twenty-five quilts for her numerous grandchildren and great-grandchildren. She had read her Bible through many times and, until the past two years, had attended meeting faithfully. Earlier in life she had held the position of an elder for many years, and had twice served as clerk of her Monthly Meeting. She was a great reader, especially interested in religious writings and in biographical and historical works.

THINK of Christ's generosity. An open, tolerant and kindly temper, that welcomes confidence, that overlooks faults, that makes much of any good in other men, that easily forgives wrong; that is a part of any ordinary notion of manliness.—PHILLIPS BROOKS.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS TO COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

In the heart-searching times in which we are living, it is a great cause for happiness that Friends in America are showing so deep a concern for the high and difficult ideals of love and brotherhood toward all men to which our history and our vision call us. It is not strange that many feel the tug of the popular appeal to force through what seems right "just this time," but perhaps never since the question of slavery was being considered has our country so needed our best and highest contribution to her thought, rather than our acquiescence in the popular voice. The needs of this hour call us each one to a whole-hearted devotion to love and good-will in our own lives, in the meeting to which we belong, in the village or neighborhood where we live, in our approach to foreigners and those distasteful to us, and to faith in and study of its efficiency in international solutions. This, and this alone, is the key that unlocks all hearts and finds how to straighten the apparently hopeless tangles into which our human affairs have gotten.

With a full faith in our ideal we recognize too that the trend of the time needs very practical action to try to save some of our American principles which are being swept away. Compulsory Military Training seems to be almost inevitable. What should we do about it? We would not alone save ourselves from going to jail, but it may be a strength to our country to write into its laws a recognition of conscience and of the individual's right as a man with high spiritual allegiance.

The following suggestions have, therefore, been made for amendments to the Chamberlain bill. The change in the caption is to try to give more of "Police" type to the training.

The second clause "4½" is to try to meet the need of those who feel unwilling to be compelled by the government.

I should be glad to hear from any who have suggestions. If anything is done, it must be done at once.

Instead of the present caption, the caption should be: "A bill for training the citizens of the United States for the maintenance of National and International law and order." Or, "A bill to provide for universal service of citizens of the United States in promoting National efficiency and preserving International order."

That instead of Section 4—"Training of Members of certain religious sects.—That members of any religious sect or organization now organized and existing whose creed forbids its members to bear arms in war shall not be required to undergo training in the bearing or use of arms, but shall be trained in the non-combatant branches of the military or naval service." (Chamberlain.) The section should read: Section 4.—That any person who has conscientious objection to any form of military or naval service, and who shall be determined by the United States District Court of the district in which he resides to be conscientious in his objections, shall not be required to undergo the training provided for in this Act, but in lieu thereof, shall be required, unless otherwise exempted hereunder, to train for a period of equal duration for the relief of suffering under the American Red Cross Society, in work under the direction of the State, Treasury or Post Office Departments, or the Department of the Interior, of Agriculture, of Commerce, or of Labor. The District Courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to make the determination herein provided.

Section 4½.—At any time within two years before any male citizen reaches the age of compulsory training for service he may with the consent of his parents or a surviving parent or in case neither parent is living, with the consent of his guardians, offer to the President of the United States to give in lieu of compulsory training, twice the amount of time for training in some service of national importance and if his request is granted he shall be required to train under the American Red Cross Society for the relief of suffering, or under the State, Treasury or Post Office Departments, or the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce or the Department of Labor.

BIBLE READERS' SOCIETY.

We are pleased to notice the Bible Readers' Society of which our friend Susan G. Shipley is Corresponding Secretary. The following are extracts from their forty-seventh annual report:—

Our eleven Readers have again carried on their varied work during the past year, as will be seen by the following approximate summary:

Visits made	19,769
Religious exercises	19,358
Meetings and classes held	191
Clothing given, articles about	5,000
Tons of coal given or sold at reduced price	360½

They have found lonely ones—rich as well as poor—and some who had been better days and were the last remaining of the family; Russians, Serbians, Hungarians, Poles, Rumanians and some of other nationalities have been brought under the influence of the Gospel, and good feeling has been promoted among these foreign residents of our city. The Readers are still able to reach those of other faiths. Factory girls and women in the Prison Laundry have been again taught and helped—the “Shut-Ins” and those who have gone astray through drink. Families have been reunited after years of separation. They visit at homes and hospitals as well as from house to house; one has a class of foreign girls, thirty of whom have pledged themselves to read a chapter in the Bible every day and help their parents to understand it. Even in the month of vacation visits have been made. A great deal is done to get children ready for the Country Week and seashore, but last summer many were disappointed on account of the epidemic, and the Readers felt it as much as the mothers and children. One Reader spent the most of two days with a sick woman who had no one to do anything for her, putting her shoulder to the wheel. They mend clothing for their people and sometimes take them to their own homes. One stayed all night with a poor woman, helping her sick husband and allowing her to get some rest. She says: “How glad I was I felt so strongly impelled to go to that poor soul that evening, for the man passed away next morning. The woman had a good night’s sleep and was more equal to what was before her in the morning.” The same Reader says: “I was able to see two marry who should do so and went with them for a witness, and as neither had any friends living, I took them home for a little wedding set-out.”

MINUTE IN REGARD TO ISAAC SHARPLESS.

At a Stated Meeting of the Managers of The Corporation of Haverford College, held on the seventeenth day of Eleventh Month, 1916, the following Minute was adopted:—

The resignation of Isaac Sharpless as President again claimed the attention of the Board. It was unanimously decided that it would not be right to urge him further to continue the heavy responsibilities which he has carried with conspicuous ability for nearly thirty years. Accordingly his resignation was accepted with regret.

Isaac Sharpless came to Haverford as Professor of Mathematics and Mechanics in Eleventh Month, 1875, and held the position for that year. He subsequently served as Professor of Mathematics and Chemistry from 1876 to 1879, Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy from 1879 to 1880, and Professor of Ethics from 1880 to 1914. He was appointed Dean of the College in 1884, served for three years with marked ability in administration and discipline, and in 1887 was made President.

During his presidency Haverford has had a remarkable material growth. It has developed from a weak and struggling institution to one of the strongest small colleges in the United States, widely known for its ample equipment, its high standards of character and scholarship, and its faithfulness to the ideals of a liberal education.

The endowment estimated at $250,000.00 in 1887 has grown to $2,500,000.00. In 1887 there were five buildings on the campus.—Founder’s Hall, the Observatory, Alumni Hall and Library, Barclay Hall, and a machine shop. To these have been added the Gymnasium, Merion and Lloyd Halls, Roberts Hall, the Haverford Union, the Dining Hall, the Morris Infirmary and the Chemical Laboratory, as well as a number of minor buildings and additions. Many new houses have been built in appropriate parts of the campus to supply comfortable homes for members of the faculty, an important part of the building equipment of the college.

The facilities for outdoor athletics have been correspondingly increased by ample fields for cricket, football and other college sports. The natural beauty of the campus has been enhanced by careful development, the extension of cultivated lawns and the liberal planting of trees and shrubs.

The Library has grown from 16,700 bound volumes in 1887 to about 70,000 in 1916.

In summarizing the development of Haverford College under President Sharpless undue emphasis must not be given to material things. For him buildings, campus, and equipment are but the body which makes possible the life of the mind and spirit.

The student body has grown from 87 in 1887 to 195 in 1916. During this time progressively higher standards of scholarship and character have been maintained. The number of the faculty has increased from eighteen to twenty-five, but faculty salaries have increased from $25,000 in 1887 to $71,800 in 1916. We believe the efficiency of the faculty is increased more than proportionately to the financial outlay, and regard as one of the strongest features of President Sharpless’s administration, his ability to gather around him a body of men marked for intellectual ability, capacity as teachers, and earnest Christian character.

If Haverford had not been a place where generations of young men have had their minds broadened by liberal study based on a love and reverence for the truth, and their spirits kindled and energized to Christian service, the statements made above would be insignificant. By his wisdom and foresight in planning for the future, by a rare mingling of the progressive and conservative spirit, by his insight into the lives of young men, his sympathy with their problems and his faith in their growth, by his allegiance to high ideals of scholarship and character, President Sharpless has influenced the development of the college in every relation of its life. He has impressed his spirit on Haverford.

Two features of his administration stand out conspicuously: One is his belief in the place of the small college as an influence of great importance in the educational life of our country. He has realized his ideals in so large a measure that Haverford now holds a unique place at the head of the list of our small colleges and his high standing as a constructive thinker has had large recognition in the educational world. He resisted the temptation to rapid growth and withstood the lure of numbers as a measure of success.

The other is his influence as an exponent of Quakerism. With the earnestness, simplicity, strength, and sincerity of the best type of Friend, he has combined practical wisdom, a just sense of proportion, and a broad sympathy with liberal and humanitarian movements, without any compromise of fundamental principles of the Christian life. In his scheme of education the humanities in their broadest sense have had ample place, and the sciences and mathematics have been emphasized, but always with the idea clearly held before the student that these should be fused into effective Christian character and contribute toward a useful life actuated by the motive of service.

As his years at Haverford have lengthened, his former pupils have recognized the rare quality of his work and have learned to reverence and love his personality. They have shown their faith in him and in the college under his administration by their loyalty in providing for its material needs and in fostering its ideals.

President Sharpless leaves his office rich in the memory of work well done, and in the love and honor of his colleagues and the Alumni. In the leisure so well earned we hope he may enjoy years of service as a clear thinker, wise counsellor, and scholarly writer, and that Haverford and the larger community of which it is a part, may long benefit from his ripe experience, his rich wisdom, his broad sympathy, and his penetrating insight.

On behalf of the Board,
ASA S. WING, President.
MORRIS E. LEEDS, Secretary.

NEWS ITEMS.

AMONGST Yearly Meeting visitors we have note of the following: Charles and Emma Perry, of Westerly, Rhode Island; Esther Fowler and Dilwyn Stratton, of Winona, Ohio; Alfred E. Copeland and Henry Outland, of North Carolina, Elizabeth Underhill, and Dikron B. Doucchan, of New York.

A REPORT in The Friend [London] of the Second Month's meeting of the Central Education Committee has the following:

The question of the Training for Service which is given to the boys and girls in our schools was again fully considered. Many experiments are being tried to make this training more effective. One school reorganized the whole of its work for the greater part of a month in 1916. "Guilds of Service" are being established, help has been given to farmers, the service of the boys and girls for the school community has been in many cases extended, and the sense of responsibility for the life of the neighborhood has been developed. Teachers in several schools are feeling their way towards self-government and the management by pupils of their own affairs. The schools were encouraged in these efforts to live up to their educational traditions, in the hope that the boys and girls when they go out into the world may apply the lessons in peaceful service in a variety of ways as they may be individually led, in accordance with the genius of Quakerism.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Both branches of Congress have passed the resolution declaring that a state of war exists.

A New York paper, quoting James Wood, says: "Quakers have issued no statement concerning their course in the event of war, but when asked about it reply, without exception, that they will follow the pattern of English Friends and upon grounds of conscience refuse to serve or to indorse others who serve. In England at the moment many Quakers are in prison, on these grounds, and American Quakers declare that if prisons await them here they are ready to enter them."

The first in a series of mass meetings throughout New York State to arouse interest in the passage of the Ahearn bill for the abolishment of the death penalty, was held in Brooklyn last week. The meeting was held under the auspices of the People's Campaign League, Inc.

In "The Confessions of a Hyphenated American," by Dr. Edward A. Steiner, born in Austria, one reads that a visit to Vienna has aroused no patriotic thrill in his breast. "I have," he says, "nothing but loathing for this foul and unthinkable war, for I have lived where it was bred."

A Massachusetts Legislative Committee has reported favorably the measure appropriating $3,583,300 of State money for the improvement of the Merrimac, the plan being to induce the Federal Government to appropriate an equal amount.

Four prizes are offered by the Massachusetts branch of the Women's Peace Party for essays on "Constructive Peace," to be written by students of women's colleges in the State. The first prize is one hundred dollars; the second, fifty, and the two third prizes, twenty-five dollars each. The essays must be handed in on or before the 15th prox. Further particulars may be obtained by writing to the Chairman, Prize Essay Committee, 421 Boylston Street, Boston.

A good authority says: "It is a mistaken notion that there is a scarcity of garden seeds this year, and that prices will therefore be abnormally high. It is true that there has been a slight advance all along the line, but it has been so small as a rule that the amateur will find out little difference in his seed bill. Potatoes, of course, are much higher than usual, and there is a decided shortage in wax beans."

Statistics compiled by the National Association of the motion picture industry, submitted at New York to the joint Legislative Committee investigating the motion picture business, showed that in a canvass of twenty of the largest cities of the country a decrease in the number of theatres was found in thirteen, an increase in six and no change in one. In Chicago, Philadelphia and New York, it was shown, there has been a marked decrease in "movie" houses, and in Chicago, where exact statistics had been obtained, it was stated the decrease in seating capacity amounted to 209,000.

Of 6755 patients who survived infantile paralysis during the recent epidemic in New York City, 102 have been discharged by clinics as cured. Ninety-five have died since apparent recovery from the acute disease. Of those still receiving treatment 5003 are under clinical supervision and 1073 are in charge of private physicians.

Late dispatches from the stricken districts of Western Asia have compelled the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief to make a nation-wide special appeal in order to meet the appalling need of the Armenian, Greek and Syrian refugees in Turkey, the Caucasus and Persia, of whom there are to-day at least 2,000,000 on the verge of starvation.

The display-room of a modern plow factory contained more than three hundred different kinds of plows. There was a special plow for every kind of soil. Many of the plows were of odd designs. These were for foreign countries. Some were designed for special conditions in Russia; others were for South America, and a few for Africa.

FOREIGN.—The Russian Provisional Government has decided to abolish the death penalty, says a Reuter dispatch from Petrograd to London.

Reporting on the use of electricity in farming in England, the following is given: "Electroculture has passed the back-garden, amateur stage. It is now a serious proposition. But knowledge of its possibilities and limitations is scanty. It falls into place with other possibilities of development in plant industry, which will only reach fruition by the help of well-organized, large-scale research and experiment supported by public funds."

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION ANNUAL MEETING.—The business of the Friends' First-day School Association is now transacted at an annual meeting and conference. These are to be held this year on Sixth-day afternoon and evening, Fifth Month 4, 1917. Announcement of the program will appear in these columns later.

A grasp of the Bible as an interpretation of human life such as Willard Sperry gave us Fourth-day evening of Yearly Meeting week brings home to us the importance of our Bible Class work. The modern world to whom we must minister needs this revelation. Our children must obtain an adequate understanding of Scripture such as our First-day Schools are helping to give them. All of those actively engaged in this work and any others interested are cordially invited to attend the annual meeting and Conference, Fifth Month 4th.

"THE MUNITIONS OF ROCKS."

In the days of ancient warfare, the possession of a place of defence or of refuge was a matter not beneath the attention of the bravest warriors, and the terms corresponding to our words fortress and stronghold had naturally great significance. To be hidden from the archer, or to be out of the reach of the spearman, was a purpose attested to by the towers and the walls and the encircling moats of many an ancient structure. So the terms indicating such refuge or defence—as well as that of a natural fastness—easily passed over into figurative use, and came to be often employed by prophet and psalmist when they would describe the safe abiding-place of the children of God. He was Himself their defence, their strong habitation, their very present help in trouble. Thus Isaiah, in describing the reward of the man that walks righteously and turns from violence, declares: "He shall dwell on high; his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks."

It is not needful to cite many passages of this character, but the heart turns to such assurances of Scripture with comfort and hope in times of distress. Little, we may suppose, did the writer of the Ninety-first Psalm realize that his song of security, "so rich in chastened faith," would come down through many, many centuries, with a message of consolation and confidence for oppressed and fearful hearts. Yet it still rings true in its assurance of Divine care, and thus harmonizes with the tender thought of the Father's personal love, so clearly revealed in the New Testament, and indicated in the expression,—"casting all your care upon Him, because He careth for you."

Amid the tumult, the anxiety and the distress of the present time, how necessary it is to remember our refuge and source of strength, and to seek the support of the Everlasting Arms, as well as the counsels of Supreme Wisdom. If, in a course consistent with these we do what we can, it may be that faith will then have a fresh reward through obedience to the command, "Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord."

OUR COUNTRY'S CALL.

Very few of us, older or younger, are so constituted as to be insensible to our country's call. Historically and in most cases practically we are good patriots. We love freedom and are ready to suffer for it. We love justice and most of us love it enough to practice it. We wish to be second to none in any and every act of mercy that comes to our hand. Feebly perhaps, but in some measure always we have gone out to the very ends of the earth with our goods and at times with our lives to make the profession of brotherhood a reality. But this we are told is not a time for platitudes. Our country needs our service—needs us. We can not train to shed blood, but we can train to save life. We can not make ammunition, but we can make food. Can the young, can any of us, withstand such pleas? Is there any other ground than that of cavil upon which to withstand them?

It may be well for us to discriminate between our country's calls and the present clamant call, more or less divorced from the general claims of life, to take part in a system of military preparedness. Behind that system as so lucidly explained in Yearly Meeting by Isaac Sharpless is the menace of a surrendered conscience. Perhaps we love our country too much to enter that blind alley!

But our country has need of us! Possibly never more than to-day, in the face of the mobilization of every form of physical force, has the cry been more poignant for the highest spiritual ideals of service, of suffering, of death. Have we these to give? Can we escape from the clamor of the hour to the silence of God and surrender ourselves to Him for service to our country? Some who have made this effort have believed themselves led into the trenches, others are this moment sounding a note of triumph from prison cells. God is with his own wherever they are. Now as never before let us resolve that we will "Let God work."

THE SENSE OF THE MEETING.

Perhaps it is no exaggeration to say that amongst the special characteristics of the Society of Friends as an organized body, the principle behind what we call "the sense of the meeting" comes nearest to being what the scientists name a "specific difference." Without use of creed or verbal profession of faith, we can test ourselves as Friends, and can make or mar our meetings by our faithfulness or lack of faithfulness to this peculiarity. Hardly any incident of modern Quakerism is of more striking interest than the interview between the late apostle of peace in our Society, William Jones, and the famous churchman Cardinal Antonelli. We are reprinting the interview in this number. The conversation had proceeded a very little way till the astute scholar of church polity put his finger on this matter of the sense of the meeting, and pressed his visitor to what one might call the last trench in his searching questions. It was very much as if he were saying, "If you can make this ideal real you have in very truth an instrument of unusual power for service in the world."

So it is well enough for us to keep this matter in mind, and to ask ourselves with sufficient frequency to keep our ideas clear, what is absolutely fundamental in the application of this expression—the sense of the meeting—to the affairs of the church. Once a year, perhaps oftener, we hear from the advices in regard to meeting business the telling statement: "As it is the Lord's work, let it be done as in His sight." Very little analysis of this is required to make it clear that the business of our meetings demands an atmosphere of worship. The whole aim is to put a meeting upon the spiritual plane and to keep it there. Our profession as Friends involves God's immanence. He is in us and has concernment with all we are and with all we do. Nothing less than this can fulfill our ideal, can make us and keep us a spiritual people.

Now the learned cardinal in Rome perceived at once the charm of this profession, but he also perceived its exceeding difficulty. To most of us it is a hereditary matter. We lose sight of its difficulty, and assume that our ordinary practice at least approximates the ideal. Now and then we go away from a meeting with a feeling that after all the principle involved in our practice has become obscured by a lifeless form. For any of us it is easy to confuse human preference, human determination, human judgment, for the "mind of Truth." Once a meeting consideration becomes subject even to a well-tempered discussion from any of these points of view, the danger of obscuring a real "sense of the meeting" ensues. A clerk may gather then the weight of opinion, and record it in a minute. This may seem the outcome of justice in the case. As a judgment it may work out in practice as a good thing, but it has not been determined as a sense of the meeting. In order for such a sense the spiritual atmosphere must be undisturbed, our advocacy or our opposition must be out of human feeling into the "peaceable spirit of Jesus."

Is it true then that anything so difficult, so subtle, so sensitive can be fundamental in a program for practical management, even of the affairs of the Church? Is this not a greater test of faith in the participation of God in petty human affairs than we are called upon to make? Two hundred years of history answer the question. With failure at every hand—often with more failure than success—the question of spiritual guidance has had an undoubted affirmative answer times out of mind. Christ is practically Head of His Church. But He has not confined His Church to one body, and our constantly recurring infirmities have prevented "the mind of Truth" from having an uninterrupted expression through us.

THE SENSE OF THE MEETING.

WILLIAM JONES and CARDINAL ANTONELLI in CONVERSATION.

It was now my turn to be interviewed. The Cardinal, inviting me to place myself beside him on the sofa, I rose from the seat I had been occupying near the door, and crossed the floor of the cabinet, inwardly wondering what my friends at home would say, if they saw me seated side by side with the virtual ruler of the whole Roman Catholic world. A deeply interesting le-té-a-lé, lasting over half an hour, ensued.

The Cardinal, being an Italian gentleman of the old school, than whom no more courteous being exists, his manner was so thoroughly kind and genial, that all feeling of reserve was taken away, the charm of his bearing and his smile causing me to feel quite at ease in his presence. Let me add also, that the Cardinal's mode of speaking the French language was in itself a pleasure to hear; his voice mellow and soft, together with his perfect knowledge of the idioms of the language, caused his French enunciation to sound like pleasing music to the ear. How vague his notions were, in regard to the Society of Friends, was evident from some of his first questions. For instance, he asked if my friend and I had been sent out "two by two," after the manner of "the seventy disciples of Christ," on works of benevolence, adding, "The seventy, you know, correspond to our Conclave."

"What! of Cardinals?" I exclaimed, with a smile at the incongruity of the thought, adding, "We have no Cardinals, no Hierarchy, no distinction in fact between clergy and laity. We are simply 'Friends' or 'Brothers,' all are on an equality in our Church." (Such, at least, I flattered myself, is our theory.)

Some further inquiries rapidly followed as to how our ministers were appointed and maintained, also with regard to the preaching of women; the answers leading incidentally to the subject of silent spiritual worship. Speaking generally, he appeared to take a deep interest in the religious principle specially held by the Society of Friends, with regard to the indwelling and perceptible guidance of the Holy Spirit in the regenerated soul.

We did not get into really close quarters in the discussion, until he started a subject on which his questions were most searching, and betrayed the liveliest interest. Our conversation was then substantially as follows:—

CARDINAL ANTONELLI: "I understand that in your meetings for church affairs you have no President, and that you never decide any questions by vote. Is that so?"

W. J.: "Practically that is so. One of our number is appointed as 'clerk,' (in French, secrétaire) of the meeting. His principal functions are to ascertain the 'evident sense' of the meeting, or the general consensus of opinion, upon the various matters under consideration, and to register its decisions in suitable minutes."

CARDINAL ANTONELLI: "I am deeply interested in knowing how this can be done without a vote; for so far as I know, your practice is quite unique in the Christian world, or in the annals of church history."

I here explained, at some length, the workings of our meetings for "discipline," or church government, and the method of gathering the "sense of a meeting," by the "clerk," according to our usual practice; also how the minutes, when made, were submitted to the approval of the meeting—for adoption, or for amendment, as the case might be.

CARDINAL ANTONELLI: "But suppose questions of great importance were to arise; questions which might even be vital to your existence as a church. How could the opinion of the meeting be correctly ascertained, and a satisfactory decision be arrived at, in cases like these, unless the sentiments of each individual church-member were plainly manifested by a vote, or its equivalent?" Then, after a pause, turning to me, "Have you ever done this?"

W. J.: "Yes, whilst acting as 'clerk' to what we term a Quarterly Meeting, which is composed of several smaller sectional, or Monthly Meetings, questions came up for decision which were of grave importance, though none, within my remembrance, that could be described as vital to our existence."

CARDINAL ANTONELLI: "Ah! Now we have got down to a man that has done it! I am all attention" (Je suis tout oreilles). "Pray, my friend, tell me how you did it."

The question for a moment puzzled me, as I mentally asked myself, "How did I do it?" Never before has the difficulty been thus pointedly presented to my mind. Custom and habit, from youth up, in the Society of Friends, has enabled us, I suppose almost intuitively, to arrive at the result, without so much as a thought of the difficulties which our method of procedure presents to outsiders. To those who have never witnessed, in our meetings for Church affairs, the mutual concessions, the bearing and forbearing, in the spirit of that charity which thinketh no evil, it may doubtless appear strange that, on questions which cause a wide divergence of opinion, a sufficient degree of unanimity is ever obtained to be accepted as the deliberate judgment of the meeting; at the right moment, however, the "clerk" generally sees his way to record the decision, as the "evident sense of the meeting."

Cardinal Antonelli is by no means the only person I have met with who has confessed his difficulty in understanding the Quaker method of deciding questions, not by majorities, but by that which in the view of "Friends" constitutes the "weight of the meeting."

The explanation given in answer to the Cardinal was to the effect, that it was not always the length of speeches, or their number, that influenced the decision of the "clerk" in discussions of importance, but that due regard was paid to the sentiments of a minority, if such minority were constituted, as is sometimes the case, of the more experienced, and the more spiritually minded among the members present. In a tone of surprise, he exclaimed, "What! have you done that?" I hoped I had said nothing amiss. Then, with the acumen and tact so characteristic of him, he pressed on me the yet deeper question, "Tell me, my friend, how did you know who in the meeting were the spiritually minded? I should hesitate very much to decide who were, and who were not spiritually minded among our people, or in our conclave" (i. e., Roman Catholics). "Je n'oserais pas, Monsieur" (I should not dare to do so). Feeling myself like clay in the hands of this intellectual giant, reputed to be the astutest diplomatist of his age, I begged a moment for reflection, and then replied, "Do you think, Cardinal, there can be any mistake in a matter like this, when we have the explicit rule of Christ, the Head of the Church Himself, to guide us, 'By their fruits ye shall know them?' In forming your judgment of a man's character, do you judge him by his words only? Do you not look to the testimony of his life, and where you see the evident fruits of the spirit, may you not safely conclude that such a man is spiritually minded?"

Whilst admitting the appositeness of the reply, he still maintained that I did not "touch the fringe of his difficulty!" Discouraged at the smallness of the result of so searching a cross-examination upon Quaker doctrines and practices, I rose to take my leave. "Are you in a hurry?" he asked. "Not at all," I replied, "but uneasy at occupying your valuable time, while personages of importance are waiting in the ante-room." "If that is all, pray be seated," he rejoined, placing his hand in a kindly manner on my knee. "I may never have another opportunity of seeing you or any member of your Society, and I want this information." Then, with a significant gesture, pointing to the door, he added, "Qu'il s'attende!" (Let them wait.)

Recognizing something here, deeper than mere curiosity, a genuine thirst for information, on what evidently was to him a deeply interesting phase of church government, I resumed my seat. Question followed question, with a power and skill, tempered with refined courtesy, which, whilst taxing my own resources to the utmost, far from causing any unpleasant feeling, served only to deepen the admiration and regard I felt for the capacious intellect, the genial kindly heart, which could thus throw off all reserve, and enter with the freedom and familiarity of an intimate friend, into questions closely touching the sacredness of the inner life.

At last, when he stood up to intimate that our interview was ended, I said he would observe that the leading ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church in England (Dr. Manning) had signed my credentials, in which were set forth the sentiments held by the Society of Friends in regard to war—namely, that it was contrary to the Divine Will, as revealed in the New Testament, and I ventured to ask the Cardinal, whether the Church of Rome admitted this to be the Biblical view of War. He paused thoughtfully for a moment, and then said, "That is New Testament teaching, we should not deny; whether we have, or have not, always, acted consistently in the matter." I bowed gravely, accepting his remark without comment.

It was hardly to be expected that one in the dignified position of a "Cardinal," should have been more frank when speaking of any possible shortcoming of that which he regarded as the one true Church.—Quaker Campaigns in Peace and War, 1871, pp. 194-201.

IN THE STILL NIGHT.

In the still night there comes to me
The blessed boon of liberty.

From all the cares that chafed and choked,

The spirit is at last unyoked
To seek her heaven, as she ought,
On sturdy wings of fearless thought.

Then come the dreams which through the day

The mail of living shuts away.

Then can the soul her fountains fill,
While all the universe is still,

From streams of quietness that rise
Out of the hills of Paradise.

And I can tell the day was meant

For some design beneficent,

For sweet-imagined sounds I hear

And forms of beauty hover near

To win me to the perfect trust

That life is good and God is just

And permeates His world, whereof

The essence and the end is love.

A DAY WITH OLD MEETING-HOUSES IN BUCKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

WALTER L. MOORE.

Here let us open an old leather-bound volume yellow with the stains of one hundred and thirty-six years. It is the journal of that eminent minister of the Gospel, John Griffith. The year is 1765, when he thus writes:

"Next day I had a large meeting at Wright's-town; I was opened therein, to shew the similarity between the travels of the soul towards spiritual Canaan, and those of the Israelites towards the outward Canaan. It was a close awakening time to dry, formal professors."

We left as an unspoken farewell greeting to that unseen, unknown little band who might worship here, a feeling of tender sympathy, desiring their encouragement in every good word and work.

Close to the highway and upon the meeting-house grounds, there arises from a pile of large stones loosely thrown together a tall, rough-hewn shaft of red sandstone. This monument was erected by the Bucks County Historical Society to mark the starting-point of what is known as "The Indian Walk," regarding which no unbiased student of early colonial history can read without a blush of shame for the perpetrators of that iniquitous land-grabbing scheme upon the Indians of the upper Delaware.

Leaving Wrightstown, a ride of another six miles brings us to where stands

"Buckingham, above thy dreamy fields,"

—a meeting-house of meeting-houses. Located on the western verge of Buckingham Mount, in the midst of a wood of grand old forest trees, the visitor at once sees that here, as elsewhere, our Quaker forefathers were not less mindful of beauty of location than David of old, to whom it was always, "Let us go up unto the house of the Lord." Though erected in 1768 there is an air of substantiality about this house that rivets the attention and reflects credit upon the builders. As representing the prevailing type of its day it approaches very nearly to the ideal of roominess, comfort and simple impressiveness which that type was meant to serve. A traveling Friend of many years since writes of this house, "Buckingham Meeting-house justly deserves especial notice, as being one of the most substantial meeting-houses which I have seen in seven of our States."

It is not, however, until the visitor has passed into the graveyard to the rear that the full effect of the environment in all its impressiveness is realized. The enclosure is the largest we remember to have seen dedicated to the purpose amongst Friends, covering, as we estimated, at least eight acres. It gently slopes off in two directions, and is nearly surrounded on three sides by forest containing some trees of great size and age.

As we passed among the simple mementoes to the very many who here had found their last resting-place, the not uncommon feeling, but now intensified, of reverential awe came stealing o'er the mind, as we remembered the lines,—

"All that tread
The globe are but a handful to the tribes
That slumber in its bosom."

Long shall we remember the atmosphere of stillness and perfect peace that hovered o'er the scene that beautiful afternoon, as Reverently we passed from stone to stone,

Reading with mute lips the names to us unknown;
Remembering that we, too, in some such place, full soon,
Here leaving the "words and works we call our own,"
At the call of God, shall pass into our final home.

Through the kindly assistance of an engaging youth of about twelve years we gained admission to the house. The forms, the galleries, and general furnishings were of the best of the conventional type afforded a century and a quarter ago. The great room was divided near the middle, as usual, into the men's and women's side, by moving partitions, the raising or lowering of which had doubtless broken the tedium of many a long meeting and held the curious attention of many a child. The spacious "youths' gallery" had here the unusual feature of extending quite around the house. Our youthful conductor, in ready answer to the question as to the size of the congregation accustomed to meet here, responded that there were present the previous First-day "seven ladies and two gentlemen." Feign to learn the name of this bright and gracious lad he informed that it was Watson. As we recalled that again and again we had read this cognomen on the headstones in the graveyard, we felt a warm desire that should he reach manhood he might faithfully serve the church for which his interest was thus early so keenly and helpfully manifested.

Buckingham lies high, breezy and woody. The air is pure. It is envied by pleasing farms and rolling landscape. It is the ideal place for meditation and prayer; a delightful one about which to linger, especially on sunny afternoons, when its ancient oaks throw their lengthening shadows upon the two great horse-blocks on the verge of the wood, now lichened by the handwork of many years since trod by the feet of men and women who, perhaps, dreamed not of the curious vehicle that had brought us hither. Could a stranger contrast be afforded than that of going to meeting on horse-back and by automobile!

Buckingham throughout its past must have laid a wealth of contribution upon the altar of human affection here erected. Here words have been spoken by God's messengers that have stirred the soul in its desire for deeper knowledge of Divine truth. Here the course of the gay and thoughtless has been changed by words of instruction and warning. Here soul has met soul in happy social greeting, and some cares of life have been brushed away in the realization that all are alike subject to temptation, and that in very many respects men have one common lot. Here children, their innocent prattle hushed in the long ride to meeting, have with awe-struck feeling entered with parents the house of prayer. Here youth and maiden have lingered, seeking in each others face the occult signs of love's betrayal. And, finally, here the scene of life has closed forever when, in these quiet precincts, loved ones have been laid to rest.

(To be concluded.)

BE STILL.

In the stillness of the heart
God is found;
Ceasing from our works of care,
Not an edge too lifted there,
We may find the place of prayer—
Holy ground!

Wouldst thou hear His gentle voice,
Troubled soul?
When thy strings all shall cease
From thy pain to find release,
He will give thee perfect peace,
Make thee whole.

Wouldst thou strength for service find,
Ready heart?
Wait in quiet for His will,
Fold thy hands, just now be still,
He will thee with courage fill
For thy part.

On thine altar's unhewn stone Sacrifice.
Not by steps ascend thou up,
On his knees Christ drank the cup,
Of the same thou needs must sup,
Pay the price.

He will touch thy gift with fire
From above.
All thy gold He will refine,
If submission's calm is thine,
And will make thy face to shine
With His love.

INTERNATIONAL SERVICE AND QUAKER LITERATURE.

[The following letter in The Friend [London] is of very special interest in view of the undertaking in translation now in hand by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The Germans mentioned in this letter are friends of Max I. Reich and they live near his early home in Germany.—Eds.]

To the Editor of The Friend [London]:—

DEAR FRIEND:—R. B. Hay and Joseph Schaller are doubtless right that a knowledge of German would directly do little to ameliorate the bitterness which exists to a woeful extent between this country and Germany. On the other hand, there is a more widely-spread knowledge of our language in Germany than of theirs here, and while it is probable that this has tended to a rapprochement, much more powerful counter-currents have obliterated these beneficial tendencies, so far as appears superficially. Since 1902, I have been four times in Germany, and one standing impression left by those visits is the blighting effects of militarism on the manhood of the country, in the way of turning men into machines, deadening conscience, and lessening the sense of moral responsibility. The same blighting influence, but with rather different manifestations, is to be seen in France, and assuredly is hanging over England like the sword of Damocles.

Up to this point, I largely agree with J. Schaller and R. B. Hay, but they offer little or no hope for the future, and adumbrate conclusions which the consideration of the whole of the evidence available does not warrant us in accepting. A Government that has such a control over the minds and ideals of a whole nation, as that of Germany has, can easily poison the sources of sane judgment in the people at large; but then, are we face to face with the best elements of German life, prejudiced though they may be, and entangled in Government sophisms? What are the counter influences to those which are most in evidence, and of which English papers take good care to remind us? What are the religious and moral forces at work?

We have, on the one hand, leaders in influential positions who scarcely admit into their gospel anything worth having of historical Christianity, and on the other a dry—very dry—orthodoxy in the Landes-Kirche. Above and beyond that, there is an element of evangelical Christianity reachable by, or approximating to, Quaker testimony.

From such a kernel as exists at present, great results may be expected, not at the moment, but, as we may hope, in the near future. Are we prepared for that possibility? I gather that J. E. Hodgkin's concern lay in that direction, though it was perhaps too optimistically expressed. Such a writer as Lhotsky sounds a note much more like the blast of the Quaker trumpet, than is the case with almost any prominent leader of religion in England to-day. Then, again, there is Frieda Ufer, the author of "Die Vershlossene Tur" (the closed door) and "Schweigende Anbetung" (silent worship), a rare spirit, albeit she is strongly biased in favor of the Kaiser. About two years before the war, she attended Westminster meeting, and three or four members of London Yearly Meeting have at different times been at her home; her literary gifts, and they are not small, are exercised in the pages of a small weekly sheet, with a circulation of 100,000 entitled "Komm mit," an invitation to Y. W. C. A. fellowship among young women. Does not the simple fact of such a circulation to a paper which seeks to bring Christian principles to bear on practical life constitute a claim on our interest?

There is the further question, what is the Society doing to prepare literature for spiritual wants both in Germany and France? Apparently the fear that almost everything that is printed will stay on the shelves has operated to make the output nil for some time. We cannot force the production of living testimonies, to the grace, the Truth, and the Light of Christ; true, but are we fully excused, does no burden rest anywhere, is there no call to do something that is not being done, something lowly and small, perhaps, that would be a stepping-stone for further testimony?

Thy friend,

JOHN E. SOUTHALL.

CONTRIBUTION OF FRIENDS TO THE UNITY OF RELIGIOUS WORK ABROAD.*

The following is reprinted from The Friend (London) with a feeling that it has a message on this side of the Atlantic.—[Eds.]

For us at home the question of uniting the divided members of the Christian Church is more or less academic, but for many of those who are doing religious work abroad it is a pressing and very practical problem—at any rate in those countries where the task of building up a native Church is well in sight. For there seems little sense in raising Churches in which are reproduced the divisions of Western Christendom—divisions which have come about (for the most part) through controversies about matters of Church order which are without meaning for most native Christians. Why should we try to make them Episcopalians or Presbyterians, Methodists or Congregationalists, and so forth? There seems to be little hope of establishing a real native Church on such lines. Besides this, present difficulties arise. Missionary comity requires some delimitation of areas, so that different missions do not interfere with one another's work. Native Christians frequently remove from one district into another. Are they to be excluded from membership and from joining fully in worship with their fellow-Christians because they have not been baptized in a particular way, or (if Friends) have not been baptized with water at all? Is a Church to direct its members not to join in worship with fellow-Christians because, according to its rules, the ministers of the latter are not ministers at all but laymen? Are joint communion services to be impossible because Western theories differ as to who can "validly" administer them? To many thoughtful natives such questions seem absurd. These difficulties have led to the making of plans for the Federation of Churches, as in West China and in Madagascar, and that which was proposed at the Kikuyu Conference in British East Africa in 1913. These plans usually include arrangements for a common Confession of Faith, for the reception of members from other Churches, for joint communion services, and so on. The plans adopted at the Kikuyu Conference were, as we know, bitterly attacked by the Bishop of Zanibar (supported by the Bishop of Oxford and other High Churchmen at home), who repudiated any attempt to federate Episcopal with non-Episcopal bodies as contrary to Church order and tending if allowed to divide the Anglican Church the world over.

Now does not this suggest that there must be something wrong with theories that will not work out in practice, that will not find room for the new facts of expanding life on the mission field? The position is closely akin to that which faced the Apostles, when Gentiles like Cornelius "received the Spirit" and were therefore clearly Christians though outside the Jewish fold. The Apostles had the grace to follow the guidance of the Spirit which came to them through what had happened. They could not shut their eyes to the fact that Cornelius was a Christian, though uncircumcised, and so the broader-minded of them let their theories go and made room for the facts. So it is now; and no question of the effect of new departures on the home Churches ought to prevent missionaries from following the clear guidance of the Spirit, even when this upsets their exclusive theories.

For Friends the situation is specially difficult, for they refuse to recognize the necessity of some things that most other Christians insist on—such as baptism with water, confirmation, outward communion, and a ministry humanly ordained. Their refusal is not merely negative, for they can point to bodies of men and women who are undoubtedly real Christians and show by their lives that they have received the Spirit without the use of any of these outward forms. It is fully recognized by Bishop Gore, who in his pamphlet, "The Basis of Anglican Fellowship," says:

"For my own part, if I am to judge by the fruits of religion as I see them in life, I should be disposed to rank the Friends among the highest in the Kingdom of God, and they have no ministry and no sacraments."

The Bishop is a typical Englishman, to whom logic is a small matter. One would have supposed that this admission finally disposed of his exclusive theory, and that he would have seen that his theory committed him to shutting out from the Church some whom he regarded as the best of Christians.

Friends, it is clear, cannot join heartily in any Federation of Churches based on the necessity of converts having been baptized with water, partaking of the Lord's Supper, or attending a form of worship which can only be conducted by a properly ordained minister. The Friends' Pemba Mission was obliged on such grounds to stand apart from the Kikuyu Conference. Hence the "stiffness" of Friends is often objected to, as an obstacle to unity. Ought they not to give way on these points, in order not to obstruct? If others come some way towards meeting them, as by allowing a Friend to preach in their churches, ought not they to give up something to meet others? The answer is, I think, that they have nothing really to give up. They are asked, not to cut down a hedge but to help in planting one—not to broaden the Church but to assist in narrowing it. Friends' principles and practices exclude no one—they do not unchurch anybody because he thinks it right to be baptized or confirmed. But they are asked to join in measures that will exclude Christians who cannot adopt certain forms.

What, then, is the contribution that Friends can make towards unity in the mission field? It may seem paradoxical, but I believe that their best contribution is to stand by their principles—not, of course, in any contentious spirit. For, by standing firm, they may compel the rest to broaden their foundation by the recognition that Friends have the reality of Christianity without its forms. In West China, and I believe in Madagascar, they have been strong enough to make their influence felt in this way, and to direct the stream that flows towards unity into a stronger and broader channel than it would have taken had they been less "stiff"—had they suppressed their special testimony for the sake of a more superficial unity. The fact is that if we really understand our own position, we have a different, and I believe a much truer conception than many others have of the real basis of Christian unity. For us it does not consist in a single organization, with common sacraments and forms of worship and statements of belief. We do not think that real unity can ever be achieved along these lines. These outward forms have always divided Christians, and probably always will. The unity we seek is not in uniformity of creeds or practices, but in a common spirit of loyalty to Jesus Christ, based on a common experience of His power in our lives, and leading to a life of practical devotion to the good of men. Wherever he sees this spirit, the Christian has unity with it—a unity that goes far deeper than any acceptance of a statement of belief or the adoption of a particular practice. It is the unity of those in whom Christ is reproducing His own character. "The glory Thou hast given Me I have given them, that they all may be one." His "glory" was the character of God which shone through Him and radiated itself into other souls, bringing men into a measure of the same life and love. "I am glorified in them." Those who can see and feel this character in one another are already one in spirit, however they may express themselves outwardly, whether by creeds or forms. Passages may be quoted from the writings of the most thoughtful Friends, from the seventeenth century onwards—from Pennington, Penn, Thomas Story, John Woolman, and many more—showing that this has always been our position. Thomas Story, for example, wrote in 1737: "The unity of Christians never did nor ever will or can stand in uniformity of thought or opinion, but in Christian love only." That, I am convinced, is the real contribution we have to make towards the Reunion of Christendom. What the mission field is showing us is that unity will be discovered, not in theoretical discussions about forms or creeds, but in a common work done in a common spirit—in co-operation in the mighty task of bringing in the Kingdom of God.

DISARMAMENT.

FROM A REPORT OF A LATE SESSION OF LONDON AND MIDDLESEX QUARTERLY MEETING, AS REPORTED IN The Friend.

The second important topic was that of disarmament, arising out of the Minute of the Meeting for Sufferings, spoken to by Marian E. Ellis, who urged the great need for a re-statement of our view. We are faced with a great choice between faith and fear. At the close of the war there is likely to be on the one hand a great reaction against the whole military system, and on the other a great danger of that system being fastened on the nation more firmly than ever. Christ could not have done what He did if He had relied on any forces of the world for the overcoming of evil. We must go down to the foundation of our belief and find out what is the inner power of God. There is a great call going forth to the Christian Churches and most of all perhaps to the Society of Friends; it may even be that God has a message for the world to be given through us.

Many Friends took part in the discussion that followed this weighty address, and whilst a few thought they saw insuperable difficulties, the feeling of the Meeting was strongly in favor of the Minute sent down by the Meeting for Sufferings. It was pointed out that unless we seize the present opportunity we may be absolutely committed to compulsory military service. If our confidence is in God we need not mind what the wisdom of man may say. The growth of militarism will stamp out the Spirit of God. Carl Heath felt strongly that this question of disarmament was the logical outcome of our peace principles. We must not be afraid of ideas, for we are apt sometimes to forget that every change that comes about in the progress of humanity is due to an idea translated into action. There is bound to be a great disarmament in any case after the war is over, as the present huge armies cannot possibly be maintained. Most people, including a great many non-Christians, desire security, but we cannot get this by war. The only guarantee for security and for the maintenance of peace is to get rid of sectional influence. We must help people to see that the only ultimate safety is that which rests on the Spirit of God. "The angel of His Spirit saved them."

"OH, WHAT A HYDRA IS THIS EVIL OF WAR!"

What numbers does it ensnare and draw away from parents, wives and children, and all the beneficial purposes of life, to be cut down as grass before the scythe of the mower, ignorant and unconcerned about the true end for which life was given them.

But when will the rulers of the kingdoms of this world lay these things to heart? When, with an earnestness equal to that with which they engage in war with each other, will they be concerned to devise means for accommodating their differences and disputes with each other, which may render this wanton waste of human lives unnecessary; and no longer multiply the cries of the orphans and the tears of the widows, by sacrificing so many of those, whom Providence has placed under them, to their cruel ambition?—(Page 13) Thomas Shillitoe's "Caution and Warning to the Inhabitants of Great Britain, but more especially to the Rulers and All in Power."—1797.—Selected by Amelia M. Gummere.

SCARCITY OF FARM LABOR.

On First Month 12, 1914, Henry Ford announced his plan of paying five dollars a day for every workman in the Ford factory. Six weeks after this plan went into effect a comparison was made between the production for First Month, 1913, and First Month, 1914. In 1913, 16,000 men in one month working ten hours a day, made 16,000 cars. Under the new plan, 15,800 men, working eight hours a day, made and shipped 26,000 cars.

Henry Ford is without doubt an exceptional genius, but the rank and file of his workmen are probably very much like other men in a similar line of work. There must be some fundamental law of human nature which made fewer men in fewer hours turn out more cars than in the year before.

It is said that Ford believes the eight-hour day should not apply to farm hands. It is not my purpose to suggest running the farm on the shop system of time. I have seen it tried, but never with success. It is very unlikely that a farm hand could do as much work in eight hours as in ten hours a day, especially if he were using a team.

If, however, there is anything in the results obtained by Henry Ford which can be secured on the farm, let us try for it. Improved efficiency and business organization have helped to make possible the better working conditions for the industrial laborer. There have not been corresponding improvements on the farm within the past twenty-five years. Milking machines have not greatly lessened the cost of milk production, nor have power sprayers materially lessened the cost of fruit growing, although both have tended to improve the quality of the product. It is too early to know what changes the farm tractor will make in agricultural methods. Whether the use of these recent appliances results in an added expense or a saving in the operating cost of the farm depends on the ability of the farm manager. Efficient farm management is one of the greatest needs of the farmers of America. Whether the farm labor available is used to the best advantage depends on whether the farmer has made his plans wisely and can execute them judiciously. Every hour of every day of each man's work should be made to count for the most, not by nagging or crowding, but by studying his adaptabilities and by devising all the short cuts possible consistent with efficiency and thoroughness.

If we share in a measure of Henry Ford's experience, we should get more work done following a raise in wages, either because it encourages better efforts, or because it attracts a better class of help. The day is past when we can expect to hire a good man for seven dollars a week, with house rent and firewood, or five dollars a week and board. Some farmers are now paying as high as ten dollars per week with house and privileges. The purchasing power of a dollar is so much less than it was a few years ago, that we farmers must realize that the same percentage of increase should go into wages as goes to purchase our food and supplies, or as we receive by the sale of crops. In no other way can we be fair to our men, nor meet the competition of other classes of employees.

As a result of the large number of men from the country who have recently moved to town to work in munition factories or other industries, some of whom had been rural residents all their lives previously, there is a number, in the aggregate quite large, who for one reason or another want to quit the city and get back on the farm. Sometimes their wives are unhappy in the city, often their neighbors are un congenial or troublesome, or their children are in an unwholesome environment. There are possibilities for mutual benefit to the farmer and such working-men if they can be located.

Some farmers have had success with students for help. We would naturally expect the agricultural colleges to be the preferable source of such young men. Agricultural students are more likely to have an intelligent interest in their work. Owing to the short summer vacation, students are usually not available during planting, but come in for harvest time. Some farmers have a decided prejudice against college students for laborers, believing them to be soft or lazy and full of theory, but with no practical experience. This description may fit some, but not all of them by any means. An agricultural college student of my acquaintance applied by letter to a prominent farmer for a position. The farmer replied that he had hired a student once, and never would have another one work on his place. A few weeks later the college man went to this farmer's home and asked for work, dressed in well-worn clothes, and without any allusion to his identity. He was promptly "taken on" and completed a season's work satisfactorily to his employer.

Some of the agricultural colleges require a student to spend a certain number of months working on farms, the farmer turning in a report to the college on the quality of work done. This makes a strong incentive for the student to apply himself.

When farm labor is so scarce as it is to-day, methods of farm practice should be studied to save effort whenever possible. For instance, lime may be bought in a form ready to apply, and so avoid the labor of slaking, and the added work of spreading by hand. In the preparation of the ground, one man should drive two teams whenever practicable. Improved tools can often be used, which combine the work of two in one operation, such as the combined grass seeder and weeder, which sows and covers the seed. One cannot take too much pains and forethought to have all machinery and equipment ready for use, that no valuable time be lost when they are wanted.

The value of time is something that farmers are learning to appreciate more than they used to. The familiar soap box or nail keg at the village store, now kept in memory by cartoon and tradition, is not occupied in these days by the busy farmer. The automobile has helped the farmer to save time in going to town on errands, and it has done even greater good by giving needed relaxation and a zest to life which has kept him stepping to the tune of the motor all the rest of the day. The automobile is more than a time saver, it is a teacher of time saving. It is a tonic for mind and body that helps to keep the farmer from getting fagged out, slow going and prematurely old.

To come back to Henry Ford, why cannot we farmers apply some of his methods in our relations with our hired help, not in an extravagant way, but so as to share with them some of the little comforts and pleasures of life, and see if they will not feel like taking the hard places and the steady pull at a little quicker pace when they find the throttle has been opened another notch or two.

THE N. E. A. AND MILITARY TRAINING.

At a recent N. E. A. Superintendent's meeting in St. Louis the subject of military training was considered. Friends will be interested in the outcome as reported in the Journal of Education. Apparently the military sentiment was strongly mobilized. This should be a pointer to peacemakers.

"The climax of the meeting came at the close of the morning session when the report of the committee on military training in the schools was presented. It looked to the committee, appointed to prepare the report, that the cards were surely stacked against its report, as six speakers during the week, at the general meeting and at round table conferences, had strongly favored military training in the schools, one speaker going so far as to recommend its introduction down to the kindergarten. And immediately preceding the report, circulars favoring military training were distributed freely among the audience by the Universal Military Training League. The report of the committee, however, was a unanimous one against combining military training with school work, and the arguments of the speakers who joined in the discussion were so convincing that the convention, in spite of the fact that the atmosphere had been charged with militaristic spirit, by an almost unanimous (standing) vote approved of the resolutions submitted. The first resolution favored universal and compulsory military training for young men from nineteen to twenty-one years of age, and the second resolution "opposed the introduction of military training and military drill, or any form of instruction which is distinctively or specifically military, into the elementary and secondary schools." The remaining resolutions gave a constructive plan of physical training and of patriotic and civic service. Many present asserted that this report was the most important and far-reaching of any presented."

QUERIES AS TO HOW WE ARE FRIENDS.

Am I a Friend merely by acceptance of the Friendly ideals (so called), or by the New Birth unto Righteousness, which?

Am I a Friend by the taking thought and action to add to my Spiritual stature, or by being born of the incorruptible Seed and Word of God, which?

Am I a Friend by an intellectual grasp and appropriation of the truths of Christianity, or by putting my mouth in the dust, if so be there might be hope, which?

In this time of all times, when Christianity is being put to the test, as perhaps never before, to make good the rightful claim made for it; that it is the great panacea for every individual and national ill; how does it behoove its adherents, of all ranks, to experience its true standard erected upon its righteous Seed base within us, that this not exaggerated claim may be more fully vindicated.

Especially should Friends, whose profession is the highest, be concerned, to be no longer found in the background as to Christianity's righteous rule, reign and government over us, as indicated in the latter part of the above queries. It would then be as it should be, we should be found more in the rôle of servants, and not as now (I fear) is too much the case, the manipulators of Christianity's sacred truths in our own will, wisdom, time and way.

OMO.

D. H.

"I am the light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." (John vii: 12.)

From the number of articles touching the subject that have appeared in THE FRIEND since the beginning of the war, it seems that Friends generally are filled with deep-felt and sincere regrets for present world conditions; and, what might be taken by some as a more hopeful sign, under the pressure and rapidity with which events are shaping themselves, Friends seem alert and active as being willing to do their full part in the propaganda for the principles of truth and right as they see them; yet there seem to be some clouds of doubt, even in their horizon, as to the proper aims and methods to be pursued looking toward the future course and testimony of the Society as regards the methods whereby international peace and good-will are to be made lasting.

Prophecy seems to my mind not so much the forecasting of future events as it does a method of giving expression to eternal truth, and eternal truth must necessarily be always effectively present. Such a prophecy is the one which declares that Jesus comes in the clouds of heaven. Amidst the clouds of the present, then, we are to watch for the little gleams, as it were, or flashes of truth that now and then break through the clouds and seem to gladden the too-anxious hearts of the watchers with more hopeful prospects. The calling of an International Peace Conference of Friends to sit in London after the war indicates that a need is felt amongst Friends for more light and the dispelling of clouds from the horizon.

It is when Jesus has come that the above text applies, and it is possible that He has not yet come to many now bearing the name of Friends that they should still be watching for the sky to clear and reveal Him? It is possible; nevertheless, to them that look for Him is the promise that He will appear. If, then, we are yet walking in some darkness, let us look for Him in view of the promise, but remembering that to some, when they see Him, "There is no comeliness in Him," but also, "Blessed are they who love His appearing."

Whether the proposed Conference will ever convene is to be seen, but the fact remains that in this call for a Conference is a self-confessed need for more light. It may be timely, then, to inquire why Friends, who are the professed "Children of the Light," should have their vision of the truth obscured by clouds and their pathway darkened by their shadows. Is it because they have had no heavenly rain to clear their sky, or have they allowed "the clouds to return after the rain?" Clouds are but vapors that rise from the earth, they do not come from heaven. The earthly nature will continue to send up clouds of doubt where the understanding remains unconvinced. Truth appeals to the understanding, and truth is light. Falsehood and deceit, before they are penetrated by the understanding, are indeed felt to be clouds that darken the pathway, but a clear revelation of the truth quickly dispels them. Who hath a revelation let him speak; he that is encompassed with doubt, having no revelation, let him keep silent. Let us pray God to send much heavenly rain upon our parched ground, and when we are revived let us be careful to allow no clouds to return after the rain.

One of the clouds of deceit that we have, in some measure, allowed to overshadow us is the popular notion of the "Common Brotherhood of Man," forgetting that "In Adam all die," and that the Heavenly brotherhood is not after the law of kinship of the flesh. We speak of "infinite possibilities" and the Divine "potentialities" of all men, which are said to be destroyed by destroying a human life, forgetting that the Divine potentiality is not at all in men but in the holy seed that is sown in men, and that when the seed has grown and brought forth its proper fruits the earthly part will return to the earth from whence it was taken while the fruits will be gathered into the heavenly garner. Indeed, it is not possible to destroy the Divine seed with its infinite possibilities that is sown in every earth-man, for, "The seed is the word" and "My word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that whereunto I send it," whether of condemnation or of justification.

Another serious error we have fallen into is the notion that men can be compelled to obey so-called Gospel principles by legislative enactments, and so we petition legislators, governors and others in authority to adopt such and such measures of reform, forgetting that the primary object of Christianity is not the reformation of political institutions, nor the regulation of external conduct, but the "reformation of the heart; knowing that all other reformation will follow." "The payment of tribute by our Lord, was accordant with his usual system of avoiding to interfere with the civil or political institutions of the world." (See Dymond, page 543.)

All evils, war included, are fruits of corrupt trees. We cannot destroy a corrupt tree by plucking and destroying its fruit. It will bear more. The axe must be laid unto the root of the corrupt trees. Where shall we find the root of all evil trees, the primary source of all evils? Hear what Jesus says:

"From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness; all these evil things come from within, and defile the man." (Mark vii: 21-23.)

"Where sin is, there must the remedy be applied." (See, "No Cross, No Crown," page 33, by Wm. Penn.)

What, then, is the remedy? Not legislative enactments, not international agreements, whatever utilities these may serve, but the blood of Jesus, which George Fox says "is the life of Jesus," the life and potency of the Divine seed that is sown in every man. The primary service of every Christian worker who will aid the coming and establishment of the Heavenly Kingdom must be to proclaim the giving of this "free gift" to every man, and to call the attention of all men to its potency, this virtue, this power that works in all hearts, in every man's conscience, that they may subject their own wills and come under this blood, this new-life power, this all-available and all-effective remedy applied in the heart, in the conscience, where the evil is first suggested and where it must be rejected in its first inception. Let us, then, allow no deceitful shadow to obscure the clear vision of this primary work of Christianity, which must come first and antedate every true and lasting reform.

All men in Adam are corrupt trees and must be cut down and given to the baptism of fire that all that is of the corrupt nature may be consumed, and that which remains that the fire cannot touch is the Heavenly seed, which supplants the old man and becomes the true heir, even as Jacob supplanted Esau in the birthright.

What useful purpose, then, serveth civil government, hath it no place of utility in the Christian system? It has, like the thorn to the rose, the husk to the ear, the shell to the kernel. But the kernel is a higher form of organization than the husk, and a later and purer product of the same law with its many processes.

O. E. F.

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

Historical records show that nearly all our Indian wars originated in acts of gross injustice or violations of treaties by the United States Government or its duly appointed agents. Helen Hunt Jackson, after examining carefully the numerous treaties made with Indian tribes and investigating the claims made by the Indians regarding their observance by the whites, declared there was not a single treaty that the Indians had been the first to violate. Stirred by the cruel injustice disclosed by her own discoveries, she wrote her famous books, "A Century of Dishonor" and the novel called "Ramona."

Generals in the U. S. army who spent many years in the service, when asked if they knew of any instance where the Indians were the first to break a treaty, have answered emphatically "No." Notwithstanding these indisputable facts, when depredations were committed by the Indians the cry was heard all over the land, "Exterminate the whole race."

Such was the state of affairs when Ulysses S. Grant became President. A company of Friends went to Washington to see him regarding such matters and suggested the advisability of appointing religiously minded men as Indian agents, and likewise as teachers and employees at the agencies. After listening to these suggestions President Grant is said to have replied about as follows:

"Gentlemen, your advice is good. I accept it. If you can make Quakers of the Indians, it will take the fight out of them."

Thus the peace policy with the Indians originated at Washington and was about to be put on trial. Friends were given charge of several agencies. Thomas C. Batty felt it his duty to offer to go among some of the most warlike of the tribes in the Indian Territory (now the State of Oklahoma). In the autumn of 1871 he opened a school among the Caddoes under the supervision of the U. S. agent for this tribe.

Some five months later, according to his memoranda, he awoke one morning with a thought on his mind that affected him profoundly throughout the day. His own account continues as follows:—

It was as though I had heard distinctly the question addressed to me audibly, "What if thou should have to go and sojourn in the Kiowa Camps?" The thought was new to me and, coming as it did, it affected me to tears. I had regarded the Kiowas as the most fierce and desperately blood-thirsty tribe in the Territory, but throughout the day I could not dismiss the subject from my mind for more than a few moments at a time.

The intensity of my feelings was in no way diminished when in the evening, Kicking Bird, an influential chief among the Kiowas, came to me with an interpreter and informed me they had come to ask me to be a father to their little girl. I told him if they would bring her to me and leave her with me I would be a father to her and treat her as I would my own children. They talked a little together, then Kicking Bird said, "We cannot leave her; we have lost five children; we cannot leave her here, but we want you to be father to her as you are to the children here." I said, "Do you want me to come to your camp and live with you that I may be her father?" He replied, "Yes, that would be good. If you will come I will be your friend, and nobody shall do you any harm; my people will be your brothers." I replied to him that I could not leave these children yet, but that I would think about it a great deal. To this he said, "You think, and when you have made up your mind to come, let me know, and my wife and I will come and get you, and you shall live with me in my lodge and be a father to the Kiowa children as you are to the Caddoes." This interview had not the effect to lighten the burden already on my mind; scarcely daring to doubt but it would be my duty, at no distant time, to go among them.

About a week after this I went to the Kiowa Agency (not the camps of the Kiowas) on horse-back, a distance of thirty-five miles, along a lonely, solitary road.

On returning two days later, over the same solitary way, I was refreshed and tendered by the overshadowing presence of Divine Goodness, in which my soul was poured out like water before the Mighty Rock of Ages.

The prospect was afresh opened to my view of yielding to offer myself to go among the wild and roving Kiowas, and I was favored to see that a whole surrender is required; that I had clung with the arm of earthly love to my precious wife and children, but that the time was near in which I must forsake all, that I hold most dear on earth, even to hearing from them with any degree of reliability; as a "whole burnt offering."

My very soul was solemnized within me, and I could but cry,—"O Most High and Holy One, whose right it is to rule and to reign in the hearts of the children of men, enable me to say, in the depths of true and consecrated sincerity,—"Not my will, but thine, be done.""

May these lofty hills, these beautiful valleys, and wide-spreading plains, which have been for ages silent witnesses of atrocious deeds of blood, re-echo with high and living praise to thee, the Almighty Creator and Preserver of all things, and the Redeemer of a fallen race.

May the darkness of superstition, which now hangs as a thick cloud over the inhabitants of this land, be dispelled by the bright-shining rays of the Sun of Righteousness, that these poor deluded creatures may see themselves in the true light, and learn to "know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent," which is indeed life eternal.

My mind continued thus absorbed in a sense of the Divine Presence, until I arrived at the cañon of Cache Creek, about midway between Fort Sill and the agency. On ascending out of the cañon, I saw a couple of men on horse-back, in Indian costume, perhaps a mile away, on an eminence some distance to one side of the trail on which I was traveling. On discovering me they put their horses into a swift run to the trail and then towards me. My pony became impatient and struck into a run to meet them.

They did not whoop as is usual with Indians. The wind occasioned by the speed of my pony blew the skirt of my coat back as we rapidly approached each other, showing me to be unarmed. As we drew near together, they separated, one on each side of the trail, and stopped, each having his hand on his revolver, without withdrawing it from its sheath. My pony slackened not his speed until between them, when he suddenly stopped, and I called out "How," the usual salutation of white men when meeting Indians.

They asked me in unbroken English for money. I replied, "I have none for you."

"What have you in your breast pocket?" "Letters for the Wichita Agency," I replied. "Let me see them." They were handed him.

He examined them by holding them singly between his eye and the sun, and carefully passing each one between his thumb and finger. Finding no money he handed them back to me. After examining the papers in my coat pockets, they put spurs to their horses and departed as rapidly as they had approached, exclaiming—"To-mo-del-cum"—"A crazy fellow," as they probably took me to be for being in that dangerous country unarmed, though had I been armed I might have fared worse.

I did not think but they were Indians until reflecting upon the whole circumstance—the plain, unbroken English, the systematic examination of the letters, showing they understood how to detect money in letters, cast a doubt in my mind as to their being Indians at all.

The remaining part of the journey was more rapidly performed, with thankfulness to Him who protected me, and saved my life from evil men in this hour of imminent danger.

NEWS ITEMS.

We gladly call attention again to Friends' Meetings in Harrisburg. The hour is 3.30 on First-days and the meetings are held in the rooms of the State W. C. T. U., No. 310 Patriot Building. Our informant adds, "The presence of Friends from out of town is most acceptable."

On account of the distance and expense of reaching the Conference at Northfield, Mass., it has been decided to hold a similar Conference at Chambersburg, Pa. (Wilson College). This will be held this summer from Sixth Month 28th to Seventh Month 6th. It is hoped that it will be attended by delegates—women of all ages from Philadelphia vicinity, the near West and South. The lectures are to be the same as those at Northfield. All who are interested and able should attend, as the future continuance will depend upon the success of this summer. The place rivals Northfield for beauty—the train facilities are excellent. Friends should be represented.

For other particulars write to Frances D. Elkinton, Moylan, Pa.

A RECREATION centre, solely for the use of Negro children, has been established in Germantown, Philadelphia, under the direction of the Board of Recreation, this being the first of the kind in the city, says the Record. It is at No. 504 East Haines Street, in the midst of a large Negro population. The Board of Recreation assumed charge of this building in 1915, making it an annex of the Waterview Park Playground. Great improvements have been made the past year at Waterview, the work including the construction of a $100,000 recreation building. Coincident with the completion of the new building, the old Morton Boys' Club Building, nearby, has been set apart for the use of Negro children. W. J. Faulkner will have charge and he is now organizing various activities.

ROBERT L. KELLY has resigned as president of Earlham College, after a service of fourteen years in that capacity. He has accepted a position as executive secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education in the United States, and begins upon his new duties Ninth Month 1. His headquarters will be temporarily established in Chicago, to be removed later to New York.

SOUTH DURHAM, Maine, enjoys a reputation for the longevity of her Quaker residents which has reached even to the Middle West. Within a radius of a few miles of this little village, fourteen Friends, within recent years, lived to an average age of ninety-three years. As queen among her aged members, South Durham Monthly Meeting still enjoys the active interest of "Aunt" Mary Douglas Goddard, who keeps currently informed regarding affairs of the meeting and also of the outside world, though she celebrated her one hundred and seventh birthday this year, as noted in THE FRIEND. She recently sent her testimony to the Monthly Meeting. One of Aunt Mary's neighbors, Esther Jones, is nearly ninety-six years of age and in good health. Another neighbor, who died when Aunt Mary was only fifty-four, was born in 1770.

MOST Friends have been notified of the "School of Internationalism" proposed next week. The program in hand shows lectures and classes at No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, beginning on Second-day, Fourth Month 23rd, and continuing until Seventh-day, Fourth Month 28th. In all thirty lessons and lectures are scheduled. The effort is to train "peacemakers" in effectiveness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SAN JOSÉ, Cal., Fourth Month 9, 1917.

To Our Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting:—

DEAR FRIENDS:—We desire to thank you for the little address of "Kindly Greeting" forwarded to us from the last Yearly Meeting, and signed by two hundred and twenty of our Friends. This expression was most unexpected and deeply touched us. We feel that it represented a general sympathy and affection on the part of our fellow-members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and others. We are cheered and strengthened by it.

This seems the best way for us to respond as we do not know all the addresses of the signers of that paper.

With a message of Christian love, we are,

Your Friends,

WILLIAM C. ALLEN,
ELIZABETH C. B. ALLEN.

WHAT Germany needs is a translation of the best our early Friends have written. Much that the Society has since put its official seal upon is too tame and diluted (in my judgment) to do much good in Germany. I propose a revival of Truth in that country in the twentieth century will be the heart and kernel of Fozian and Penningtonian Quakerism in modern speech. There are thousands in Germany who will respond to such a message and it will give a much-needed rallying-ground for the so-called "left" and "right" tendencies of theological conceptions which have divided Germans so long.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

An explosion in the munition works at Eddystone on the 9th caused the death of one hundred and twenty-seven persons. Official investigators declare the cause may never be known.

Schoolmen's Week at the University of Pennsylvania drew 300 teachers and laymen from Pennsylvania and adjoining States to discuss educational problems last week.

Four city blocks in the heart of the hotel district of Asbury Park, N. J., fronting on the beach, were swept by fire on the 6th.

A prominent weekly says: "The President's proclamation defining the status and privileges of enemy aliens domiciled here, is conceived in a humane spirit and no harsh measures for their restraint should be required, if they conduct themselves without hostility to this country."

A distinct earth-shock was felt for several seconds throughout the St. Louis section on the 9th. A number of windows were broken and several chimneys were knocked down. The after vibrations continued for eight minutes.

Richard Olney, statesman, once Secretary of State, and always a noted student of international affairs, died at his home in the Fenway in the Back Bay District of Boston on the 8th.

The Department of Health, New York City, which has been making a special investigation of the relation between overworking and disease has announced there is no doubt, from the data gathered, that the relationship is close and positive.

Through co-operative efforts of the school officials, manufacture and a representative of the United States Bureau of Education, Newar N. J., is making an exhaustive effort to discover the surest and sane type of vocational education.

With the introduction of the Annual Appropriation Bill and the signing by Governor Whitman of the revised Welsh-Slater bill, it is possible to get some idea of the program for the universal training of boys which is now to be the policy of New York State. These bills provide for compulsory training of all boys sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years old for two or three hours a week during the school year, with voluntary camp work in the summer.

Meetings have been held recently and others will be held in the future in both New York State and Pennsylvania, to agree upon legislation that will allow the sheep industry of the country to return to its former proportions. Production of mutton and wool has fallen amazingly, in the past, especially since 1910.

The Electrical Engineering Department of the State Agricultural College of Manhattan, Kan., is at present engaged in conducting a series of experiments with a view to improving the prevailing methods of generating electricity from windmill power. In the present test the generator is mounted on the head of the mill and geared directly to the source of power, instead of being belted to the mill at its base, as is usually the practice.

American Sunday-schools have been asked to assume financial support of schools in China formerly supported by England's schools, in order that England may re-enforce its own Sunday-school work at once. The Sunday-school strength of the United States is now 23,000,000, and has been growing at the rate of about a million a year.

FOREIGN.—China is going to honor with a monument the memory of John Hay, who proclaimed and really enforced the policy of European non-intervention and the "open door" in that country, and it does well to pay him this tribute. John Hay stemmed the tide of European aggression in Asia, and his policy of the open door, if it is sustained in the future, will mean progress as well as independence for China.

M. Rodzianko, President of the Russian Duma, has promised the women of Russia that the Duma will urge the constituent assembly to declare for equal suffrage. The City Council of Petrograd has unanimously agreed to appoint a certain proportion of women to several of its committees, says a Central News dispatch.

Hermilda Galindo, a woman, who has been elected a deputy from the 5th Electoral District of the Federal District of Mexico, which comprises the capital, Mexico City, is the manager of the Modern Woman, published in Mexico City.

NOTICES.

A MEETING for Divine Worship appointed by Lansdowne Monthly Meeting of Friends will be held in Paiste Hall, Llanerch, Pennsylvania, First-day, Fourth Month 22, 1917, at 3 P. M., to which all are invited.

MEETINGS from Fourth Month 22nd to 28th:

Frankford Monthly Meeting, Fourth-day, Fourth Month 25th, at 7.45 P. M.

Philadelphia, Fourth and Arch Streets, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 26th, at 10.30 A. M.

Germanstown, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 26th, at 10 A. M.

Lansdowne, Fifth-day, Fourth Month 26th, at 7.45 P. M.

BORN.—At Calgary, the twentieth of Third Month, 1917, to Walter and Olive C. D. Kennedy, a son, RONALD DILLY KENNEDY.

DIED.—At his home in Philadelphia, First Month 20, 1917, WILLIAM E. TATUM (formerly of Woodbury, N. J.), in his seventy-first year; a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting for the Western District.

—, near London Grove, Pa., on Third Month 28th, EDITH SHARPLESS, aged sixty-seven years; a minister of London Grove Monthly Meeting.

—, in Guatemala, Fourth Month 5, 1917, EDWARD WISTAR, son of the late Caspar and Raquel Asturias Wistar, aged two years.

Entered as second class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

"We utterly deny all outward wars and strife, and fightings with outward weapons, for any end, or under any pretence whatever; this is our testimony to the whole world. The Spirit of Christ by which we are guided is not changeable, so as once to command us from a thing as evil, and again to move unto it; and we certainly know, and testify to the world, that the Spirit of Christ, which leads us into all truth will never move us to fight and war against any man with outward weapons, neither for the Kingdom of Christ, nor for the kingdoms of this world. 1660. (From a Declaration from the Harmless and Innocent People of God, called Quakers, presented to Charles II.)"

The above re-affirmed later by George Fox as follows:

"Cauterous Reader,

"This was our testimony above twenty years ago; since then we have not been found acting contrary to it, nor ever shall; for the truth, that is our guide, is unchangeable. This is now reprinted to the men of this age, many of whom were then children, and doth stand as our certain testimony against all plotting and fighting with carnal weapons. And if any by departing from the truth should do so, this is our testimony in the truth against them, and will stand over them, and the truth will be clear of them."

YOUNG FRIENDS.

This is the day of young Friends! Sometimes we fear this is said scornfully. We are saying it thankfully, joyfully as the fulfilment of high hopes, as the promise of better things yet to be. No great amount of reflection upon the history of Christianity is required to realize that the greatest tragedy in the record (and sometimes it all seems tragical) is the failure of adult Christians to understand the young. During the first century of the Christian era, despite very meagre records, child life is pictured in the home in notes of noble happiness. Similarly the early annals of new religious movements usually show children in most amiable relationships with their elders and with religious society at large. The severity of Puritanism is softened by some such views, and the bands of Quaker children maintaining meetings when their parents were shut up in goals register a happy understanding between youth and adult age, mostly conspicuous since by its absence.

Is there any reason for this unhappy relationship of misunderstanding between the young and the older? Is the present more promising situation due to the removal of the causes of misunderstanding? In a book entitled "Father and Son," by Edmund Gosse, the whole sad story is put so concretely that it would be difficult to misread the lesson. Altogether unwittingly, but for that reason only the more sorrowfully, one sees a devoted father in the process of fitting mature concepts to the immature life of his precocious child. In the end the child is resplendently arrayed in the perfected habiliments of faith, but in reality is only a conceited prig and an unconscious hypocrite. The tragedy of it all is that this ludicrous figure finally comes to matured consciousness and finds the revulsion of feeling toward organized religion irresistible. Many a parent who might not recognize his own portrait in the Gosse picture could yet wisely heed the moral of this most sad biography.

Unfolding life cannot be imprisoned in any set forms, can not be expressed in dogma and creed. The only safe thing to do with it is to let it grow, to make the way for it to grow healthfully, that is to grow in the light and always toward the light.

Now a new psychology, learned consciously as science, or adopted unconsciously as enlightened instinct, has come to recognize the germs of life as resident in the child. We need not be troubled about the divisions of philosophy in this field. Just how it comes to pass, just why it comes to pass we may not understand, possibly it is not intended that we should understand, but it is clear beyond question that the inside life of the young is separated often by a great gulf from outside conduct. In terms of science there is an inscrutable "protective covering" of carelessness, levity, often of resistance to counsel and teaching that obscures the lofty aspiration and high hope of budding faith. In other words, the expression of youthful life in the face of adult misunderstanding quite belies the background of serious purpose which is after all the great resource of the future life of Christianity.

Now the modern movement, if we understand it, has been almost entirely directed to break up this lack of correspondence in the young between outward conduct and inward life. The method of the movement has been true to the psychology expressed in Froebel's phrase, "We learn by doing." Instead of waiting for undoubted evidence of religious experience in seriousness of demeanor and habits of life, changed from the usual vivacity of youth, a religious background has been assumed and religious activities have been planned, through which the young can naturally express themselves. This has been the basis of the great movement of Christian Endeavor. It has made junior leagues and clubs and classes innumerable. Out of it all has come the demonstration that the most religious element of the churches was pent up in the youthful membership. We can not see the Young Friends' Movement in any other light than as part of this great readjustment of values. It makes active in our meetings and in our communities what has been so largely an unused resource of almost unlimited capital. It is sure to bring with it some extravagances, some missteps. These will be accepted as discipline and as education in progress by the young; they should be regarded patiently and lovingly by the more mature. The day of misunderstanding will pass in proportion as young and old realize that outward expression counts for far less than inward spirit, but that outward expression still counts and will become perfected as inward spirit is chastened by the breath of the Divine Spirit.

Regarding the Young Friends' movement then as part of a great world movement, is there any particular outlook for the Young Friend that opens a vista of special Friendly service in the world? If the brief sketch herewith submitted has any point in it then it must be clear that the whole movement is one of spirit as against form. Instead of fitting creed and symbol and rite to the unfolding life, instead of imposing the authority of canon and ecclesiastic and synod upon the bursting enthusiasm of youth, its effort is to put these things out of the way, and to let the "tender plant of God's right hand planting" grow into comeliness of expression and of power. This unquestionably is the special service of Quakerism. The great world movement for the religious emancipation of youth is at heart Quakerly. It presents the golden opportunity to make our message and mission world-wide.

Nor is it without a special point of value to our own limited circle. Christianity that is thus received at first hand is "new every morning." It disregards distinctions of age. If there is any real barrier between the young and the old in the religious life in all likelihood it is because this renewal power has been inhibited. We plead for it in young and old. Our vision is not of a society with a faction of live young Friends in it. Rather, of a whole body of people made young day by day in the "power of an endless life." It is in the exhilaration of such a vision that we say jubilantly, "This is the day of Young Friends."

SPIRITUAL REINFORCEMENT.

We are continually in need of spiritual reinforcement, and especially so in times of trial and proving, such as we may now be approaching. As "wars and rumors of wars," and preparations for war, are being made on a gigantic scale, which we can but fear may, in their working out, bring hardship and distress to Friends, and other conscientious objectors to war, the mind of the writer has been deeply concerned. May we, who see in war and all military service the transgression of the teaching of Christ, our Redeemer; the annulling of the Golden Rule; the exaltation of selfishness, and the turning backward, if not the overthrow of our civilization, be engaged, day by day, in seeking earnestly for that spiritual strengthening which we constantly need, in order to hold fast our allegiance to Christ, the Prince of Peace. We are concerned that the testimony to the peaceable nature of His Kingdom, which the Society for more than two centuries has upheld, may not be less faithfully guarded by us than it was by our forefathers.

Non-resistance as a vital asset of Christianity is no less important now than when the Master said, "Resist not him that is evil," and His "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you," is still fully in force. Our plea should be, "Lord, increase our faith!" This increase of faith, this spiritual reinforcement, is what I crave for us all, and that our daily lives may be so brought under the love and power of Christ, our Redeemer, that we may in reality become truly Christlike. As this is our happy experience, those with whom we come in contact will be aware of it.

When Moses came down from Mount Sinai with the tables of the testimony in his hands, fresh from his forty days' communion with Jehovah on the mountain, "The skin of his face shone," so that he had to put a veil on his face while he spake to the children of Israel! May it not be, in this, our day, that if we are sufficiently concerned to experience a close relationship with our Divine Master; if day by day we walk with Him in spirit, may it not be, through infinite mercy, that those about us "may take knowledge of us, that we have been with Jesus?"

I have remembered the pathetic prayer of Jesus for His disciples: "I pray for them; I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me, for they are thine." And again, a little further along in the same chapter, the xvii. of John: "I pray not that Thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldst keep them from the evil."

May this be our daily concern and prayer; and if our spirits are thus exercised before the Lord, I have faith to believe the Almighty will not forget His own dependent children, but will make a way for them, and even if that way lead through the fires of persecution, He who, as the "Son of God" walked with the "Hebrew children" in the midst of the fire, and delivered them because of their faithfulness, is as able to deliver His faithful children who cry unto and put their trust in Him, as He was to save Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego, in the super-heated furnace of the king of Babylon.

I am impressed with the belief that the call to faithfulness has never been more imperative than it is to-day when so many are being swept off their feet, by the excitement and madness of the spirit of war! One very noted evangelist is reported as having made the public statement that "If war comes I'll be in it up to the neck!" Another minister, this one, I am sorry to say, from Ohio, said in a recent sermon, "What would Jesus do in this crisis? Jesus was not a spineless pacifist. I believe He would fight and fight hard!"

To one with a reverent appreciation of the immaculate life of Jesus Christ, such statements as these are bare-faced sacrilege!

How can we imagine a man called to the ministry of the Gospel, made an Ambassador of Christ, the Prince of Peace, called to represent Him upon earth; as fallen so low as to declare, that if war came, "He would be in it up to the neck?" Or how can we reconcile the claim that "Jesus would fight, and fight hard," with the Lord's own words, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you," etc., as recorded in Matt. v., 44?

Let us, dear Friends, seek to experience such a deep dwelling in the spirit and power of the Lord Jesus, that our influence may tend to win others to the restraining and constraining love of God through Christ our Redeemer.

DAMASCUS, OHIO, Fourth Month, 1917.

JESSE EDGERTON.

"THE facile hope that the war will all somehow end in good is by itself a delusion and a snare, as is also the view that it is producing a religious revival. All that we can say is that for men and women of good-will there will be an overwhelming opportunity after the war, and that by persistence, and faith, sacrifice and prayer, those who have discernment of the times may be able to wrest good out of the evil."—PRINCIPAL W. B. SELBIE, in his Presidential Address at the Meeting of the National Free Church Council.

"If you would not gather forbidden fruit, then beware how you look on the tree where it grows."

Grant us Thy peace, for Thou alone canst bend
Our faltering purpose to a nobler end;
Thy love alone can teach our hearts to see
The fellowship that binds all lives to Thee.

—J. H. B. MASTERMAN.

HAVE FAITH.

Have faith—though loud the angry cannon roar,
And thick the dead lie on the battle plain;
Though earth is filled with anguish and with pain,
The time will be when war will be no more.
Have faith—though sunken ships pave every sea,
And children's bones lie with the heaping dead,
Though vultures of the air sail overhead,
And blazing ruins stand where homes should be.

Have faith—from this world-wreck new lands shall rise,
Where neither King nor Kaiser may decree
The cannon's boom, the flashing sword set free
To make a weaker nation's place its prize.
Have faith—for Justice still uplifts her scales,
And Right shall win, though for a time it fails.

A DAY WITH OLD MEETING-HOUSES IN BUCKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Not far distant from Buckingham lies the little village of Lahaska, within which we discovered the meeting-house erected by the Orthodox Friends after the Separation; the year, as inscribed upon the date-stone, being 1830. One of our party recalled that here in boyhood days he used to attend Quarterly Meeting with his parents—a duty the performance of which required a drive (often in severe wintry weather) of many miles from their home. The meeting was laid "down" many years ago, and the building, which is rather commodious, is now used as a carriage warehouse. It was therefore with melancholy interest that we entered and viewed the interior, marveling at the changes wrought upon the great anvil of time. Where, a generation ago, sat men, women and children in pious meditation, seeking vehicle of thought, now stood all burned for sale the material vehicles of transportation. Our Father's house had become a house of merchandise literally. Walls that oft had re-echoed prayer and the name of the Most High God, now threw back only the mercenary speech of barter and sale.

Resuming our journey, and continuing still amid pleasing farms and comfortable homesteads, situated amid gently rolling hills and by meadows with meandering brooks, a turn in the road brings into view

"Solebury's meeting,
Sacrosanct with love."

Here the environment is strictly rural; the situation of the house, as usual, being well selected and imposing, while, lower down and across the road to our right, was spread before us that

"God's acre," where Ever more, closely crowding,
In their "narrow cells,"
Lie Solebury's dead.

The house is large, being erected, as the records show, nearly on the model of that at Buckingham. The following minute establishes the date:

"Solebury Preparative Meeting in Bucks County was first established and held in a new commodious house for that purpose, near the centre of Solebury Township, by members of Buckingham Monthly Meeting, and first held 30th of 12th mo., 1806."

Here, as elsewhere, we observed what seems to be a general practice, which is to keep the window shutters open. This adds to the attractiveness of the premises and maintains even throughout the non-meeting days a kindly welcome to the passer-by. Peering within, the usual interior setting already so familiar is again perceived. How quiet and peaceful looked those century-stained benches whereon had sat in the stillness of holy meditation a multitude of men and women, who here repaired,

"Forgetful of the week's routine and trials,
To find fresh consolation and fresh peace."

And those "ministers' galleries," too, wherein were wont to sit those upon whom

The Spirit's influence more finely wrought;
The church's patterns of the Life they taught.

Later, as we strolled amid the graves of some of these, thoughtfully discoursing on the great themes that here pressed upon us—life, death, past, present, days yet to come—the meaning of it all to them, to us, one of our number, speaking in low tones, as is his wont, confided this—his secret—"It was the impression made upon me as a boy, by the faces in the ministers' gallery of our meeting, that inclined my heart towards them and the religion they professed." Our friend as a child had thus perceived what Charles Lamb, who was not a Friend, expressed in his inimitable essay, "A Quakers' Meeting": "I have seen faces in their assemblies, upon which the dove sat visibly brooding." We omit, however, his pointed reference to the evident contrasted condition as manifest in some of the other worshippers.

The neighborhood of Solebury commands a pleasing view of the hills on the Jersey side about Lambertville, which slope down to the majestic Delaware, mostly hidden from view. Pressing onward, we pass through the pretty little village of New Hope, with its high, picturesque bridge spanning the river, in order to "shake hands," as it were, with the opposite town. We abruptly descend to the lower level where the road crosses a canal to our left embowered in leafy umbrage, while our right is commanded by high wooded hills which screen us from the low descending sun. The air is laden with woody odor, while the eye and ear are gladdened by the sight of great waters, ever murmuring and moving onward. Our very souls are stirred as from a new source of quickening impulse. Conversation again becomes sprightly, and we realize that the events of the day have not even yet received their final setting.

On a sudden, we leave again the lowland and strike up a long steep hillside, until, at last, by a succession of ascents, severely testing the power of our machine, the nearly level upland is regained. Soon the familiar sight of another meeting-house shows that we have reached Makefield. It bears the date 1752. As compared with other houses visited, the location seemed disappointing and uninspiring; in a word, though having the unmistakable Friendly face, it lacks impressiveness. This feeling was immediately dispelled, however, when we passed to the rear of the house, and through the encircling wall beheld:

That "silent acre,"
Where lie in the long "family rows,"
Slow mouldering to the primal dust,
The young, the old, the middle-aged,
In strength or beauty, or decline of years,
Erstwhile here amid the worshippers;
Their spirits gone to meet th' eternal day.

The enclosure is a place of quiet, solemnizing beauty, wherein one may well meditate upon the mutability of all that pertains to this changing scene and open wide the windows of the soul to the light of truths Divine. Altogether lovely was the view to the distant western hills, o'er which the shadows of evening were beginning to deepen; an unvoiced call of peace through the closing gates of day reached us from thence as we now turned homeward.

We had now viewed six of the ten ancient meeting-houses that at one time constituted Bucks Quarterly Meeting, the membership of which at the time of the Separation was estimated to be 3,336 persons. As they pass in review before one's memory, it would seem natural to set up a comparison with regard to certain outstanding features which are singularly held in common. For instance, as to date of erection, they may all be referred to that period of remarkable material prosperity and growth in numbers by which the Society was characterized during a term of about fifty years, which set in just prior to the War of the Revolution and continued up to the eve of the Separation; a period, however, characterized by spiritual decline, as will be adverted to later.

Secondly, they were constructed of stone, as were the dwellings of their more influential builders, thus incidentally bespeaking a desire for the substantial. No building erected of wood can ever be really imposing.

Third, they are rectangular in shape, and two-and-a-half-stories in height. Almost without exception we find upon each side in the second story six windows, while the lower story has four and two doors of entrance—one for each sex. The ends have three tiers of windows; in what seems to be the ideal pattern, two windows with a door between in the lower, three in the middle, and two in the gables.

Fourth, all have "youths' galleries" upon three sides of the house (in one case, upon all four), thus greatly increasing the seating capacity for times of Quarterly Meeting and other great occasions.

Fifth, attached to each is a large and exceedingly well-kept burial-ground, giving the impression that the practice of having family or private places of burial was in these parts but slightly if at all followed by Friends; they having from the beginning carried out the exhortation of our great Quaker law-giver, George Fox, who in one of his epistles writes thus:

"Friends, get burial places for your dead, and let them be decently and well fenced, that you may show a good example to the world in all things."

Lastly, it may be remarked in this connection, that all of the seven meeting-houses under review have, since the Separation, been in possession of the Hicksite branch of the Society; it, in the several neighborhoods, having numerically far exceeded the Orthodox body. In fact, in but three of these did the latter succeed in maintaining meetings for any extended period.

PRESENT TENDENCIES IN JAPAN.

The Seinen Kwai are confined to young men. Perhaps next year there will be similar associations for girls. The Home and Educational Ministers speak of encouraging them, not as rivals, but as proper competitors. The most remarkable fact of the present is that no periodical sells so well or has so large a circulation as those having the name Fujin (women), or Joshi (girls). Magazines for women are the most popular. If I lose my job I will start one. I do not subscribe, but two dozen come. The one which has the best circulation is the Fujin Sekai. It is a monthly, and every house has it, the circulation is 200,000. A monthly periodical can just pay if it has a circulation of 2000, and many have about that. The largest of any not a woman's magazine is 80,000. It is estimated that on the average three people read one magazine; this means a half million women and girls reading the Fujin Sekai. No wonder women's magazines of all grades and shades circulate. They will pave the way for associations. Shojo Kwai or Fujin Kwai (Young Women's Association) may be the coming feature of social conditions in the country. They will have the same influence for evil and good as the Seinen Kwai have on young men, especially in arousing and stimulating a taste for higher things, and interest in spiritual and religious questions.

Now from the standpoint of Christianity it is highly important to exert influence through these magazines and associations. Of course, the associations are non-religious; if we preach we are not invited again. The trouble is we cannot get the right kind of lecturers. They say a man is too clearly colored—for example, if he preaches the Gospel. They say, "If we want the Gospel we will go to church; if we want Buddhism we will go to O Tera (temple)." They want religion, not definitely Christian or Buddhist. In the same way they avoid men of decided political color; if a man belongs to one of the political parties the authorities are afraid he may utilize the opportunity to get members. So the lecturers most often sent or invited are jinkaku no hito, persons of character who will not preach their own belief, political or religious. But often a professional teacher will talk of his specialty, and give them an hour of statistics. There is a great demand for men of character who will point out the way, not say, "Come and believe just as I do"; who will be like John pointing some way, not teaching Christ himself. But at the same time pointing toward the right, "Over there you'll find what you want"—even that much will have great influence. They want direction; they don't know where to turn. If they know the direction they will ask where to stop, they will inquire further.

I am glad to hear so little now of any decided objection to Christian influence exerted in the schools and so on. I mean this: some years ago teachers were telling children not to go to Sunday-school. Sometimes this may happen, but it is not to be compared to five years ago. Here is an instance.

I was invited to a feast by the Gun Cho (District Superintendent) and the various Ko Cho (Principals) were invited. The Gun Cho was very stern, a great Chinese scholar, like an old Samurai, dignified and stern. When we came together before the feast a teacher said, "I wish to report about my village. A Christian preacher has come and distributes cards for a Sunday-school, so I considered whether I should forbid the pupils to go." The Gun Cho listened, and said, "Yes, and you forbade them?" "Yes," "Why?" "Because it is against the mandate of His Majesty and the spirit of the Educational Rescript; they will not be loyal subjects." The Gun Cho raised his voice in an angry tone and said, "You are the traitor. You are the disloyal subject. Don't you know that His Majesty has given perfect religious liberty? You are acting against His Majesty's mind." The man bowed low and retired. We hear little of that kind of thing now. We do not know the future; but in the near future I see no probability of any obstacle to Christian propaganda. Only we must be very wise. It is not wise to utilize Seinen Kwai as a field for propaganda. It is all right to say, especially if you see the audience assents to what you have said, "I profess Christianity. It may be a mistake, but I have come to such and such a view because I am a Christian." I have often found this an effective method of arousing attention.

A Morioka school teacher who was left a widow with three children called once and asked questions which I could not answer. She stayed till half-past twelve. I confessed, "I can't answer. I don't think anyone can solve those questions except by religion." They were questions above learning and philosophy, they were religious questions. It was very late when she left. At the genkwan (entrance) I asked, "Have you any religion in your family?" "Yes," she said "We belong to the So-Do-Shu sect." "Have you examined that?" I asked. "No," she said, "it was simply their family religion." "I think you had better study it. Unless you study it merely belonging will not solve your questions. I am a Christian. You must choose your own religion." At five o'clock in the morning she came again. She had sat up all night thinking about it, and she said, "If I study any religion, as they are all new to me, I would rather begin with Christianity." I gave her an introduction to a Christian teacher, and in a year she had read the Testament and other books sent by me and the evangelist. Now she professes Christianity, which none of the teachers like, alone she is holding up her faith and testimony. I saw her last summer, she is firm and solid in her profession. So struck was I with her decision that I thought her a rare woman, and I have asked her to Tokyo to see maturer and better Christians in Tokyo—I do not want her to think me a type. It is rare in such uncongenial surroundings to profess Christianity and be so staunch. But I think she is not the only one. Through all the country men and women are seeking. Give them just a hint—some may heed more, but among my own countrymen all the more intelligent want a hint—if it is preached into us revolt, but with just a hint they begin of themselves to attend and make more solid and lasting followers of Christ.

There is a picture which I am fond of, painted by the greatest living artist, Sebo. When I told him of my favorite poem he was so struck with it that he made the picture on the spot, while I was waiting. The poem means this, "The moon knows not that it shines; neither do the waters of the Hirosawa"—the Hirosawa is a little lake between Kyoto and Arashiyama—"neither do the waters of the Hirokawa know that they reflect the moon." It is a beautiful poem. The moon does not know, but it is true to its own nature, which is to shine; the waters are true to their nature and reflect. They are unconscious; and so we, if we have the spirit of affinity, not knowing why, yet in friendship we join. Among more educated people, if you live your life true to your profession, they say, "Why does that man live that way? I see some difference," and that is the time to explain.

A few months ago the editor of the Joshi Kyoiku called "Well, Dr. Nitobe," he said, "at the coronation the more prominent women educators were decorated, but I think there are many who deserve it, many hidden ones. Don't you know any?" "Many," I replied. The names of several women educators were given. Later the editor came again. He had been to see prominent old educators, Buddhists, strict, rigid in their learning. He also had talked with educators of the Yasui type. What is the difference? The old type we respect, but do not love; we feel they are cold and stiff. With the Yasui type we feel as if we were talking to an old bosom friend. It must be the effect of the new education, my visitor thought. "No," I said, "the New Woman is cold even clammy. The difference is, the one has Christianity, the other has not." He had not thought of that. A teacher who is a Christian will inevitably have warmth because all his personality is changed. The old type is a teaching machine, he keeps up (the appearance of) righteousness by doing nothing. The Christian exercises his influence just as the moon according to her nature does by shining. Influence is exerted most by shining, by being yourself, even without preaching. I would not discourage preaching. I believe in associations and magazines, but there are other channels by which we may reach a very wide field of humanity.

DAFFODILS.

The golden sun looks gladly down
On golden rows of daffodils;
He crowns them with his golden crown,
With golden rays each blossom fills,
And every blighting breeze he stills.

With golden trumpets in their hands,
On pliant stems they lightly swing,
In cheerful, dauntless, gorgeous bands,
Their trumpets to the breeze they fling,
And sound the overture to Spring.

Gone is the winter's dreaded power,
Gone are the cold and weary days,
Now comes the soul-refreshing shower,
Now sheds the sun his brightest rays,
Their golden trumps are tuned to praise.

Praise Him, ye trumpeters of Spring,
Whose mighty love new life distills,
My heart shall with your music ring,
Until your rapture through me thrills,
Ye golden-throated daffodils!

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

SPEAK AND SPEAK AGAIN.

"To sin by silence, when we should protest,
Makes cowards out of men.
The human race has climbed on protest;
Had no voice been raised against injustice, ignorance and lust,
The inquisition yet would serve the law,
And guillotines decide our least disputes.
The few who dare must speak and speak again
To right the wrongs of many."

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

LOCAL Option for Pennsylvania was again defeated in the legislature. The determination of the temperance forces and the strength of the liquor interests are both illustrated by the history of local option bills during the past fourteen years or more. At first there was difficulty in getting such measures out of committee so that the members of the legislature would be obliged to go on record for or against them. Then came a period during which each successive legislature showed a larger number of votes for the bill. Two years ago the contest was very close. But this year the liquor interests succeeded in defeating their opponents by a large majority—127 to 72. The fight was really won by them in the primary election in Fifth Month, 1916. For months previous to that time they had been selecting carefully the kind of men who were popular, but not likely to support local option. The "good man" scheme is a clever method that has many a time led the voters to compass their own defeat.

A STATUTORY PROHIBITION BILL is now before the legislature. What shall become of it, can be easily foreseen. But the line-up will be interesting, and, if the vote has not been taken before this issue of THE FRIEND appears, it would be well for readers to see their Representatives, or write to them, and try to get as many votes for the bill as possible.

But in spite of the grip which the whiskey interest seems to have upon Pennsylvania, the situation is not wholly dissonant of Courts and with aggressive work being done for temperance in all parts of the State, it is hoped that this great commonwealth will not be the last to join in the triumphal procession which is sweeping forward, with increasing momentum, to nation-wide Prohibition.

PHILADELPHIA PHYSICIANS to the number of 527 signed a petition to the legislature at Harrisburg asking that local option be substituted for "high license" in recognition of "the harmful effect of alcoholic beverages upon the physical and economic welfare of the human race."

A PHILADELPHIA WOMAN was recently awarded by the Court the sum of $5000, to be paid by a saloon-keeper of the city as penalty for selling intoxicating drink to her husband, who died from injuries received while under the influence of the liquor.

IN the recent campaign this paper received hundreds of letters from its readers, from Virginia to Oregon and Washington, asking The Weekly Star for information as to the "failure" of prohibition in Kansas. The saloon interests had flooded every State, especially where prohibition was the issue, with literature to prove that Kansas was in a deplorable condition as a result of prohibition.

The answer to the whisky ring is to be found in the election returns from Kansas. Out of the six hundred thousand votes polled, the resubmission candidate received about fifty thousand only. One citizen in every twelve in Kansas voted for resubmission.—Kansas City Star.

ON THE WATER WAGON AGAIN.—Judges Butler and Hause of Chester County, Pa., have once more put Coatesville on the water wagon. Coatesville is a steel town with a population of 11,000 people. Beginning in Fourth Month, 1913, it was dry for one year as a result of proved violations of the law. But the saloons were able to come back in 1914 and have had a three-years' harvest. The temperance forces appeared again in Chester County License Court and demonstrated conclusively that every saloonkeeper in the town was grossly violating the laws; whereupon the judges revoked all licenses and announced that no new ones would be granted. At the same time they put Downingtown on the water wagon for a year and for the same reason. The leading spirit in the anti-liquor war in Coatesville is Charles L. Huston, the head of the Lukens Iron Company.—American Issue.

THE PENROSE BILL.—The fact has just come to light that on Second Month 28 Senator Penrose introduced a bill to permit distillers to take all whiskey in bond and re-distill it into commercial alcohol. Under existing laws, whiskey, as soon as distilled, is placed in government warehouses and can be removed only upon the payment of $1.10 per gallon. There are 67,000,000 gallons of whiskey now stored in Kentucky alone and twice that much in other States.

The distillers are fearful that Prohibition might come suddenly, possibly as a war measure, and they would be caught with the goods in their possession and no chance to make a sale.

NEWS FROM NEW JERSEY.—The Kates Bill proposed to give the towns and cities of New Jersey the right of home rule on all important questions of local welfare. Under the liquor laws of New Jersey it would have been possible for the dry forces to have used this law to stop the granting of licenses if a majority should so vote.

President Wilson's Secretary, Tumulty, who is supposed to be a strong factor in Democratic politics in New Jersey, sent an urgent appeal to the Democrats to get behind the bill. However, they turned a deaf ear to Tumulty and lined up with the wet Republicans, succeeding in throwing this proposed legislation to the scrap heap. The passage of such legislation was one of the pledges of the Republican party, but a large number of its members absolutely refused to be guided by party pledges if those pledges interfered in any way with the rum interests.—American Issue.

A DRY NAVY.—It was not many years ago when certain newspapers and men were wont to refer slightly to the straight-laced, puritanical ideas about total abstinence of our Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels. They even spoke lightly and facetiously of his anti-alcohol regulations for the Navy. To-day when there is in progress a campaign to recruit 25,000 or more young men for the United States fleet, it must be a source of keen satisfaction to every American citizen to know that total abstinence is the rule in the Navy; that not a ship in our fleet carries intoxicating beverages for the use of the men or officers, and that the youths who are enlisting for service will not be permitted to have alcoholic liquors in any form.

But is it not obviously inconsistent to decline to approve a program that has as its object the protection from the same evil of the great army of young men on land?—Union Signal.

PORTO RICO TO VOTE ON PROHIBITION.—The Jones-Shafroth Citizenship Bill for Porto Rico, passed during the last days of the Sixty-fourth Congress, provides that "one year after the approval of the act and thereafter it shall be unlawful to import, manufacture, sell, or give away, or to expose for sale or gift, any intoxicating drink or drug, provided that the legislature may authorize and regulate importation, manufacture and sale of said liquors and drugs for medicinal, sacramental, industrial and scientific uses only, and provided further, that any general election within five years after the approval of this act this provision may upon petition of not less than ten per cent. of the qualified electors of Porto Rico, be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors, and if a majority of the qualified electors voting upon such question shall vote to repeal this provision, it shall thereafter not be in force and effect; otherwise it shall be in full force and effect."

The liquor interests of Porto Rico have initiated an anti-prohibition campaign in Porto Rico. They are exhibiting posters and distributing circulars and literature all over the island and are using other methods to influence the people against prohibition.

Our correspondents write that the labor element, the missionaries and all Christians are in favor of prohibition. The rum and the sugar interests are opposed to it.—Union Signal.

THE LEGISLATURE OF MICHIGAN has passed the Wiley Bill fixing Fifth Month 1, 1918, as the date when prohibition shall go into effect in that State.

NEW HAMPSHIRE FOR PROHIBITION.—The daily press has announced that on Fourth Month 17th the Governor of New Hampshire signed the prohibition bill, which provides that after Fifth Month 1, 1918, that State shall be one of the "bone-dry" variety. This is the twenty-seventh State to outlaw the liquor traffic.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

TO THE CHILDREN WHO DID NOT GET TO YEARLY MEETING.—DEAR CHILDREN.—We missed you and we want now to share with you the wonderful blessings of our Yearly Meeting. Each child, as was said there, is an important part of our Society, each of you in your home meeting by silently seeking to pray to our Father in Heaven helps the rest of us to pray to Him, and thus we all have a good meeting, which means just that we feel in our hearts that God has heard us and will help us to serve Him better.

Before telling you what we did in Yearly Meeting, I want you to know how over and over again the meeting turned in loving thought to you, its children. We longed that you might be true children of our Father, and we rejoiced to realize how helpful you can be. None better than you in your homes can show forth the loving spirit of our Saviour. "A soft answer turneth away wrath." By gentleness and kindness in your words and actions, you can be true Peacemakers, and how sadly the world needs them now! Peacemakers—not just peaceful people, but those who help others to be loving and peaceful. Do not be ashamed when people call you Pacifist and think you are cowardly. Pacifist is only the Latin name for Peacemaker, and what more brave and glorious than to deserve our Saviour's "Blessed are the Peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

Of course, our Yearly Meeting, gathered in the shadow of this great cloud of sin and suffering, caused by the war in Europe, with the serious prospect that we ourselves may join the awful struggle, was an especially solemn one. But both men's and women's meeting opened with the words, "Fear not, little flock," and all the way through every day, we felt and I am sure you would have felt had you been with us, that our Father's blessing was upon this little group of His followers who were trying to love and to serve Him.

Two very interesting letters were read from Friends across the water who are suffering imprisonment and many trials because they can not take up arms and kill their enemies. Our meeting felt great sympathy with them, and trusted that if our turn comes we Friends in America will be as brave and as loyal to the Prince of Peace. "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of," and many times we all united in silent supplication to our Heavenly Father that He would keep our country from the evil of war. Our Peace Committee told us of the many things they have done during the year, and entreated us all to help. Every Friend, older and younger, should be a Peace committee.

All our Queries were read and we were greatly interested in them, as you children will be when you are older and understand them better. It was decided that committees should be appointed to ask the women Friends if they used intoxicants in their cooking. It is dangerous to do this, for it may give some one a taste for liquor and may thus tempt him to use it. One woman told us how she learned a lesson; she had bought some alcohol and put over some fruit to make an extract for cooking; she set the bowl of fruit and alcohol in a window and left it. Coming into her kitchen later she found that her new cook had drunken the alcohol and was intoxicated. The first sensible words the servant said were, "I thought I was coming to a Quaker family where I wouldn't be tempted to drink."

As to amusements, one Friend said that when she was young her dear mother had always one last thing to say to her; this friend was very strong-willed and wanted to go to things which her mother did not approve. Her mother's final argument was always, "My dear, if all is peace within, I have nothing more to say." Another friend, a minister from Brooklyn, told us that when she was young and could not go to places of amusement, she always said that as soon as she was older, she would go as much as she wanted to. She added that before she was of age, however, her dear Saviour came into her heart, and then she didn't want to go; she wanted so much more to do something good and helpful for other people. Life is so short, we should all ask ourselves if we have time for so many amusements, there is so much good to be done!

A dear elderly Friend who has lately been taken home to her Heavenly Father, was referred to as one who was always happy; it was a pleasure to be with her. She did not say much, but her heart seemed so happy. She was so good and our Father's blessing made her always safe and glad.

The best way to have a good day is to start it right; at the family reading each of you has an important part; listen with reverence and in the silence try to lift your hearts to the loving Saviour and He will come into them and bless you all the day long.

There was a very interesting report of Westtown read, and one telling of the splendid work our Friends are doing for the Indians at Tunesassa.

These are not nearly all the things we did and said in Yearly Meeting, but if I told you all of them, word for word, I could not tell you how wonderful it all was, nor how good it was to be there; how it strengthened our hearts and sent us all home filled with an earnest longing to be better people, more loyal to our Father in Heaven, more loving and helpful to our fellow-men.

Help us, dear children, as we desire to help you, and all the world to be good!—E. S. P.

CHILDREN IN WAR TIME.

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, Children's Bureau, Washington.

Thousands of children besides war orphans and refugees have been directly affected by the war, according to reports from belligerent countries which have come to the Children's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor. Juvenile delinquency has increased, more children have been employed under adverse conditions, special measures have been necessary to protect the health of mothers and babies, and home life has been broken up by the increased employment of mothers.

The Bureau believes that the experience of other countries should be carefully considered in order that all possible provision may be made to prevent similar harm to children in the United States. The Bureau has therefore begun a brief review of foreign experience, in so far as it can be understood from available reports, and will shortly publish a series of special articles about children in war time.

A preliminary survey of the foreign material emphasizes the importance of a strict enforcement of all child-labor and school-attendance laws and a generous development of infant-welfare work by public and private agencies. The Children's Bureau suggests that a well-planned Baby Week will be more valuable this year than ever before and will gladly send its bulletin of directions for Baby-week Campaigns to any address.

To those who are especially interested in working children, the Bureau's new report on the Employment-certificate System in New York State will show certain points which are essential if an age-limit for children's work is to be effective.

THE INNOCENT SUFFER.

Extracts from a recent private letter from England, dated Third Month 24th, giving a vivid picture of suffering endured, may be of sufficient interest to share with others.—S. C.

The Trafalgar Street houses and all that block of schools are still full of wounded men. The war has been specially hard on education—men teachers forced to go, the best buildings commandeered, children only having half time, and running wild the rest—there is simply no end to the ramifications of evil that the war brings. It has been a bitterly cold winter, with the most intense frost we have had for many years. For a few days there were signs of Spring, but now there is a bitter east wind with frequent snow showers. It is hard on invalids, and there are so many. It seems as if the war had sapped every one's vitality.

I never thought to lay aside half a large potato for to-morrow's dinner, as I did to-day! They cannot be bought in Brighton and I brought a dozen from my country home. Poor mothers say, "We don't know what to give our children instead." There seem plenty of parsnips and large swedes, but they do not take the place of potatoes, and beans and rice are dearer.

You know where dear, brave H. is. [In prison.] His great friend, W. L., is reported to be "looking radiant" by the Quaker chaplain whose visits are a great solace. My nephew, F., is still in Corsica, in charge of refugees. He wrote of walking about on a huge stranded whale. "It felt like soft rubber." The Corsicans are far too lazy to boil it down for oil.

I am finding war victims nearer home, more than fifty English wives of interned Germans and Austrians. The pitance they get from Government barely pays for food, rents are so high and good stock of clothes of two-and-a-half years ago is worn out. Many mothers have cut down everything, even underclothes, for the bairns till they have hardly any left. Some in illness have pawned their wedding rings. The Friends' Emergency Committee send grants for boots and other pitifully-needed things, and I get a little local help. My little parlor is piled with old clothes, remnants of stuff which I get cheap and even packets of pea flour and bars of soap. The women are so grateful for a little sympathetic kindness, as some of their own relatives will not speak to them because of their German names. I have started a little meeting for those who care to come, once a month. They are curiously ignorant of religious matters. Next week thirty of their children are coming to tea at the Adult School. (A Friend grocer has nobly sold me a whole pound of sugar!)

It seems to me that these young folk who have the blood of two nations ought to be a connecting-link if we can plant some seeds of peace and good-will in their minds.

DEAR FRIEND:— PALO ALTO, California, Fourth Month 5, 1917.

On First-day, Fourth Month 1st, Friends from San José, Palo Alto, San Francisco, Oakland and Berkeley met in Oakland at eleven A. M. for a meeting for worship. Between forty and fifty persons attended. After the morning meeting, luncheon was served in the same building by the Berkeley and Oakland Friends, and a very pleasant social hour it was. The company again gathered in the meeting-room near two o'clock. A paper was read by Edward A. Wright, of Oakland, giving his impression of the present duty of Friends—referring to the basic principles of the Society as applicable to modern conditions.

A very interesting letter was read from a missionary in Turkey, a young woman who formerly attended meeting at College Park. A copy of this letter is inclosed. It seems best to withhold the name.

The minds of all the company were dwelling upon the impending calamity of war. Lively discussion followed the reading of the papers, participated in by Wm. C. Allen, Chas. and Lydia Cox, Augustus T. Murray and others.

The morning meeting was lively and impressive. One man had not been in a Friends' meeting for thirty-five years. Another man and his wife from the University of California spoke with great appreciation of the privilege of attending the meeting. A precious unity of spirit pervaded both meetings and we felt it was good thus to gather together in a common purpose the scattered Friends of this section.

WALTER E. VAIL.

PORTION OF LETTER FROM TURKEY.

There is another thing. I have felt many times as if we had been up to Kadesh-Barnea and turned back in these days. We had talked so much about what this century was to accomplish; we had begun to mention the abolition of poverty and the conquest of disease, and the evangelization of the world. Of course, we didn't really expect to see them, but sometimes it did look as if we were on the road and the track clear. And now we know that we shall never see anything but reconstruction and prevention. Not that they aren't important and difficult; nothing more so. But I have wondered if perhaps our over-confidence previously might lead to faults now. I wonder if we are ready to begin at the foundations. Because—and now listen, for I am about to confess—not a change of mind, but a change of heart; because the foundations are spiritual. Certainly, I knew they were all along. I knew they were, but I didn't always feel it. I had trained so steadily with the crowd that talked about social justice; I had lain awake nights worrying so over the fact that I had enough to eat and I hadn't earned it; had been a "joiner" for every reform on the horizon; I had said so often that there was no sense in preaching to people that were hungry; that on the whole I preferred to ignore the fact that there is less sense yet in filling them up, unless you are going to preach to them afterward, or at least take them to someone who can. Now, don't misunderstand me; it's all of it worth while and worth living and dying for, and it's got to be, but when you have it all, minimum wages and eight hour laws, and child labor reform and prison reform, and farm colonies and Federal employment bureaus and outdoor schools, and municipal recreation grounds, and factory inspection, and adequate fire protection; when you have worried your last bill through your last legislature and filled your last case on your last card, you won't be there. When Christ said, "Whosoever drinketh of this water, shall not thirst again," He did not condemn agitation for a pure and adequate municipal water system, but He stated an incontrovertible fact just the same. Now what is all this leading up to anyway? Just this: We ought to have, we must have, and we must work for a "peace program" that will be practicable and far-reaching, and that we can have adopted, gradually or more largely, at the earliest possible date. But when you have it, and have it established; when you have your leagues, and treaties, your international tribunal, and international police force, you won't have peace on earth. You can have disarmament itself. The human race fought with its bare fists once, and it can do it again.

The trouble comes when people want to fight. What are we going to do? And, then, far off, oh, so tragically far off to-day, across the broken fields of Europe, across the centuries of hate and pain, distant as the smallest star and faint as the lightest whisper, we catch the words, "Love your enemies." "Love your enemies!" The ghastly, nonsensical irony of it in Christendom to-day! But it's the ultimate word just the same. He said that because there's simply nothing else to-day. Because if you love your enemies long enough and sincerely enough, and persistently enough, and unselfishly enough, and humbly enough, the time will come when they will not be your enemies. And there is your solution. My friends, as we turn back, across the hot sands of "that great and terrible wilderness," are we going to be able to teach the children, the little children, to love their enemies? Are we going to teach them to want to understand the other fellow, no matter how "otherish" he may be, to see good in the midst of very much evil, and humbly and thankfully to take it; to know that the good of one must be eternally the good of all, and the harm of one harms everyone; to wait and to forgive, to be generous and unselfish, and sincere? Because, you see, if we can't do this there is another Kadesh-Barnea on ahead. I don't know just how far, but it's there. And how are we going to teach them. Might it possibly be, in part at least, by doing these things ourselves?

And this is all I have to say about the war.

Faithfully yours,

MINUTE OF MEETING FOR SUFFERINGS OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING, HELD THIRD MONTH 30, 1917.

To All Who Bear the Name of Friends in the United States of America:

At our Meeting for Sufferings held to-day at Devonshire House, we have come into deep sympathy with you at this hour of crisis in your country's history. We share in your anxieties and to-day we think of you where remembrance most avails.

We pray that a sound judgment in all things may prevail, and that your faith may remain steadfast and immovable.

We are confident that you will be steadied in the sense of the infinite power and protection of the love of God, and that you will rise in strength to meet the opportunities that may come of witnessing with joyful courage to the unchangeable spirit of peace which is the heritage of the disciples of Jesus.

J. THOMPSON ELIOTT,
Clerk of the Meeting for Sufferings.
ISAAC SHARP,
Recording Clerk.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE REPRESENTATIVE MEETING was in session for about two hours on the 20th. Two epistles addressed by the meetings in China and Japan to the Yearly Meeting were in the hands of the Clerk. They had failed to reach the city in time for the sessions of the Yearly Meeting. In another year they would not have the special service for which they had been written, so they were read in the Representative Meeting and directed to be published. It is expected they will appear in our next issue.

The changes in the Discipline made by the Yearly Meeting were referred to the Book Committee to be incorporated in the Discipline. Some discussion of the call for a new edition of the Discipline at this time resulted in the decision not to undertake it now as the cost of paper and printing is abnormally high.

The meeting was brought into much exercise and expression on account of the problems of principle and service precipitated by the war. Finally a small committee was appointed to prepare an address to the membership at large. The purpose will be to give some concrete help with the problems that are presented to all Friends, but especially to young men.

To no matter did the meeting respond more largely and more deeply than to an appeal of one of the women members that in caring as we should for our own interests we should not fail to realize what we owe of sympathy and help to bleeding hearts at every hand who have believed themselves solemnly called to yield in sacrifice to the country's call those most dear to them.

HEARING ON THE PIERSON BILL.—Toward the close of the late session of the New Jersey Legislature a bill was passed ostensibly to give the State a general system of physical education in the schools. The first four provisions of the act are such as would appeal at once to the best educational intelligence in the State. Section 5 provides for universal "military training" in high schools, if the State Board so decides. Once a decision is reached, the Commissioner of Education and the Adjutant-General of the State become supreme in making and applying the course in military training.

That the bill was actually designed as a military bill is evident from the fact that it was referred to the Committee on Militia. After the adverse report of the Commission of the State appointed to study the whole subject of military training in schools, it seems no slight affront to the intelligence of the Board to put the case to them as this bill does. At a general hearing in Trenton on the 21st this feeling of the Board was apparent. About sixty persons were in the Hall of the Assembly during the three hours of the hearing. A majority of these were school men, all of whom but one were in opposition to the military feature of the Bill. Seven Friends, two of the Race Street connection and five others were also present; five of these were heard briefly before the hearing concluded. Superintendent Henry Snyder, one of the best-known educators of the county, now Superintendent of the Schools of Jersey City, presented a half-hour paper in which the merits of the bill were freely admitted, but its dangers boldly disclosed. He showed that because of its mixed character, part under the educational authority, part under the military, it is probably unconstitutional; that it is a direct blow to the well-recognized functions of a State Board; that it is opposed in principle by the best military experts; that it contravenes the judgment of educational authorities the world over; that it will involve local communities in great additional expense and that it will fail to make soldiers in any appreciable degree if undertaken.

The questions of members of the Board to Assemblyman Pierson were directed to secure from him a definition of military as distinguished from physical training. The whole purpose involved in the bill was then disclosed by a written definition from the Adjutant-General's office, in which trench building and other hideous refinements of modern carnage were recited. Conscientious objectors are exempted from the provisions of this act, but Friends were glad to join their voices as patriotic citizens against such an anomaly as this effort to fasten the soldier ideal upon the unsuspecting public. The schools will be responsible for a very un-American type if the boys must don uniforms and shoulder muskets. So far as one could judge the Board was in sympathy with the opposition.

The following is taken from the Evening Telegraph.

FRIENDS PROTEST AGAINST TENDENCY TO CLASS THEM WITH DISLOYAL PACIFISTS.—American Quakers are pacifists, but not passivists, according to a statement from the Central Office of the Five Years' Meeting of Friends in America, issued by Walter C. Woodward, General Secretary. The Friends may be expected to maintain their historic position against war, he declares, both as a matter of principle and of policy.

They are none the less loyal to the Government and will be found doing their bit in ways consonant with their convictions. Attention is called to the heroic and self-sacrificing service rendered by English Friends in Belgium, France and Russia, as indicative of the practical, constructive service that may be expected of the disciples of George Fox, on this side of the Atlantic. A nation-wide organization of Friends toward this end is projected.

W. C. Woodward's statement follows:—"The Friends in America enter vigorous protest against the tendency in the present crisis to identify pacifism with disloyalty. There may be disloyal pacifists, but we maintain that the history of Quakerism should place its pacifism above suspicion. We Friends are pacifists, but not passivists. We believe all war wrong as a matter of principle and wrong as a matter of policy, and must therefore refrain from bearing arms. We are 'conscientious objectors,' but we are more. We do not propose to stop with objecting. Though against war, Friends are for the nation and humanity, for which they are prepared to suffer and to sacrifice. They are ready to prove their patriotism no less than their pacifism.

"As proof that this has been their record in the past, Friends point to their course through the Civil War. Though they could not as a body enter the military service, they rendered invaluable aid to the Government in other ways and no people were regarded as more loyal. In the present war, the English Friends, through various kinds of constructive relief work, both at home and on the Continent, and financed and manned by themselves, have commanded the respect and commendation of the world. Their loyalty is beyond doubt.

"As a national organization we are already taking steps toward 'Quaker mobilization.' The young men of our colleges are being called upon, some for hospital service and for relief work. Others will serve in the fields of industry and agriculture, yet others in the Young Men's Christian Association at the front. A systematic canvass of the church will be made to secure adequate funds for various phases of war relief, to be carried on both here and abroad. Since with them this work is a matter of conscience, and since they cannot directly or indirectly participate in war, such service as the majority of them render cannot be performed under the auspices of the military branch of the Government.

"The fundamental doctrine of Quakerism is that of the inviolability of the individual conscience. We do not therefore presume to tell our members what they shall do or not do, as individuals, but in the assurance that in the present as in the past, Friends will render their 'full measure of devotion,' we confidently pledge the Friends in America to this, their immediate task."

RICHMOND, Ind., Fourth Month 19th.

"AMERICA'S VIEW OF THE SEQUEL," is the name of a volume of recent publication by Royal J. Davis, of the editorial staff of the New York Evening Post. Obviously, he treats of the aftermath of war from the American point of view.

This is from The Olney Current of Barnesville for Fourth Month:

In the death of James Steer, which occurred Third Month 2, 1917, in his ninetieth year, a vacant place seems to have come to his neighborhood, his meeting and the Boarding School Committee, of which he was an active member for nearly thirty-five years. His lively interest in the work of the school and his appreciative, genial disposition made his frequent visits there occasions of inspiration to both faculty and students. His mind was unusually well stored with long poems and beautiful gems of thought, which he could readily repeat whenever opportunity presented. Many of his favorite poems were memorized during the last few years. The evening before his death he repeated Whittier's last poem, of which these are the closing lines:

"I fain would find beneath thy trees of healing
The life for which I long."

FOURTH MONTH 17, 1917.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FRIEND, Walnut Place, Philadelphia:—

The Committee of the Representative Meeting charged with the forwarding of relief to war sufferers forwarded on the 13th inst. in care of Isaac Sharp, London, contributions as follows:

To the War Victims' Relief Committee.....	$ 180.00
To the Emergency Committee for the Relief of Aliens, etc....	175.00
To the Belgian Relief Committee.....	37.00
To the Relief of Armenians.....	5.00
To the Committee of the London Meeting for Sufferings for Allocation.....	958.89

$1,355.89

This makes the second sum forwarded since our recent Yearly Meeting, a draft representing $1,576.91 having been forwarded on Third Month 23rd.

Very truly,

JOHN WAX.

Those having the care of "The Estaugh," located at Haddonfield, New Jersey, and under a Board of Managers, at present all members of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, appointed by the contributors to its support, desire to call the attention of Friends generally to this work.

After five years of useful service it has proven to those most closely in touch with it that its beginning was a right move. It has filled a decided need and has been signally blessed all along the way. The family at present comprises twelve.

A number of additional regular subscriptions, though of small amounts, would be of great value in assisting to support this much needed service. Donations of fruits and vegetables are very helpful; those prepared for winter use are of more value than persons may perhaps realize. The management of "The Estaugh" is on principles of simplicity and careful economy. We believe the homelike atmosphere is appreciated by the guests. Visitors are always welcome.

The Board of "The Estaugh" would ask Friends to consider seriously what may be their opportunity in aiding a cause which so materially concerns Friends.

Contributions in supplies should be sent directly to "The Estauagh," No. 104 Centre Street, Haddonfield, New Jersey, and contributions in cash to Annie H. Barton, Treasurer, Haddonfield, New Jersey.

ANNUAL MEETING AND CONFERENCE OF FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA.—At Twelfth Street Meeting-house, Sixth-day, Fifth Month 4th:

4.00-4.30—Opening Remarks and Reports from the Schools.

4.30-5.30—Group Conferences.

The Development of Rural Schools.

Mission School Problems.

Are We Doing Our Duty in the Social Order?

How to Make the Bible More Real to Pupils.

Outside Service for Junior Classes.

The Problem of Committee Co-operation.

5.30-6.15—Reports of Group Leaders.

SUPPER.

7.15-7.30—Discussion and Suggestions.

7.30 —Address by Alfred C. Garrett.

Friends who have been undecided whether a Bible Class would assist their meeting will find this conference particularly helpful. It is also the one occasion during the year when those actively engaged in our First-day Schools can discuss together the reasons for their failures and successes. Officers, teachers and committee members are particularly urged to attend.

The following is the latest report from Sidcot Friends' Boarding School.

In connection with an organized effort in Winscombe to supply the deficiencies in agricultural labor, the Service Corps has been enlarged and boys over fifteen-and-a-half years of age are giving up half-holidays to work in the gardens of the district. All "away" matches have been cancelled to facilitate this work. The girls continue to supply a large Council school in London with material for Nature Study. The sixth form now meets once a week as a Study Circle; during the present term it is concerned with the Message of Christianity for Non-Christian peoples.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

John G. Johnson, the widely-known lawyer, died at his home in Philadelphia on the 14th. Death was due to heart disease. A prominent weekly says of him: "An intellectual giant in his line, he lived and died almost unknown to the mass of the people, and it is unlikely that the histories of his time will much more than mention his name."

Henry Ford, at the request of the British Government, has waived all patent rights on his farm tractor and has cabled the specifications to England so Great Britain can manufacture tractors for use in the British Isles and in France. Announcement to this effect was made at the Ford Motor Company in Detroit, Mich. It also was announced that it is hoped to have thousands of tractors ready for use in the United States and Canada by Eighth Month 1st.

In spite of the activities of the New York Mayor's Food Committee, headed by George W. Perkins, to keep down the cost of living, the price of rice, one of the staples specialized in by the Committee, is higher to-day than it has ever been, and according to wholesale dealers it will continue to advance.

Lone teachers in three-room schools are reclaiming the backwoods districts of America, according to Sue C. Cleaton, of the Georgia Department of Rural Education, who spoke before the Conference on Rural Problems at Houston Hall, University of Pennsylvania. She said that 200,000 of the three-room type should be established in the same number of rural districts.

There are plans in New York State for compulsory service of school-boys on the farms based on the new compulsory military training law, which permits the military training commission to send boys 16, 17 and 18 years old to the farms for conserving and developing the State's resources. This work is regarded as an equivalent of military training.

There are 21,600 moving picture theatres in the United States and about $2,000,000,000 invested in the business.

The rise of a new major State University is presaged by the appropriation bills which have just passed in Oklahoma, aggregating $1,346,792 to supply the needs of the University for the next two years. Three new buildings are provided for the campus at Norman, near Oklahoma City—a library, a geology building, and an auditorium.

A despatch from Boston says: "Women wireless operators are to replace men throughout the First Naval District, as far as shore duty goes. This plan is in charge of Lieutenant E. G. Blakester, U. S. N., head of the radio service at the Charlestown Navy Yard, and a committee of young women."

All things being equal, it is expected that the United States and Canada will be able to produce over 1,000,000,000 bushels of grain this season, which would be sufficient to furnish Europe with about 300,000,000 bushels. Consumption of wheat in the United States, unless under stringent limitations, would be expected to continue close to the maximum. By stringent economy, however—which is being practiced more generally already as a result of the war—a saving of 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 bushels might be made. This would at least leave a larger exportable surplus.

The present week is known as "Be Kind to Animals" Week. It was first observed two years ago, and last year the celebrations became so general that nearly every prominent society for the protection of animals throughout the United States took part in the good work.

FOREIGN.—Railway connection between Europe and India through the Hindu Kush, reducing the mail time between London and Delhi to six days, instead of seventeen, as required at present by the sea route by way of the Suez Canal, is being constructed under British and Russian influences as a competitor to the famous Bagdad Railway, projected by the Turkish and German Governments. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce at Washington has received a communication on the subject from Henry D. Baker, United States Consul.

NOTICES.

FIRST-DAY next, the 30th, being the fifth First-day in the month is Friends' Day at the Colored Home, Girard and Belmont Avenues. The meeting hour is 3 P. M.

TO THE YOUNG MEN OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING:—

The Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting has appointed the undersigned as a sub-committee to consider the problems with which you are confronted as a result of the War situation. We hope from time to time to circulate material that will throw light upon these problems and upon their solution. Members of the sub-committee will gladly hold themselves in readiness to confer, either personally or by correspondence, with any who may desire further information.

But is there not yet another (or further) service, often hidden and silent, to which many a one must be called? "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them." The grievous and abnormal conditions now prevalent in so much of the world must bring to sensitive minds a baptism of suffering, somewhat like that great travail of soul which fell upon George Fox in a period of severe persecution, and under which he labored until he felt "an overcoming of the spirits" of that persecution, and the violence of it was abated. If to some now there is appointed in particular, or in extraordinary measure, an inward exercise and intercession, who shall say that this spiritual toil is less fruitful, less availing, than the more conspicuous ministry of action?

NATIONAL SERVICE.

No less an authority with Friends than William Penn is responsible for the declaration that the education of youth is in order for them "to serve their country." Thus it would appear the common twentieth century opinion that "our Quaker theory of individualism" separates us from the "general weal" was at least not anticipated by the first generation of Friends. Nor must we forget that this seventeenth century point of view, so clearly phrased in the words quoted above from one of the Penn charters, comes out of an era of sharp conflict between civil and religious authority. The faithful suffering of that day by hundreds of Friends established the supremacy of conscience but left them free "to serve their country" and to train their children to such a service. Are we to conclude that this principle of "national service" was won as an abstract idea, and that as a people we have since failed to put it into practice?

So far as political service is concerned there can be no question that the first hundred years of our history in America practically concluded the general activity of members of the Society in politics. In the present discussion there would be no point in considering whether this withdrawal from public affairs was justifiable. It may be of some moment to us, however, to inquire whether it resulted in actually separating Friends of that day from activities of the public weal. Whether also as a heredity from them we of this generation are also without part and interest in efforts for the general welfare.

Publicists and historical philosophers of to-day point out two distinct tendencies in the governments of the world. One magnifies the State, makes it supreme, makes the individual wholly subservient to the aims of his country. That with every extreme interpretation possible is the German type. It spells efficiency, the last degree of co-operation, but the last degree also of surrendered will and conscience. The state becomes in their own phrase actually God.

The other type of government recognizes the inalienable rights of the individual, demands service of all not for a cold abstraction as the state, but for the individual and social well-being. This latter type has had much variety of develop-

LET US INQUIRE.

To allow any great catastrophe or any series of solemn events to pass by without our seeking to deduce therefrom some humbling instruction, some lessons of improvement, would be to lay ourselves liable to further chastisements or to unreckonable loss and failure. How far any of us have—negatively, it may often be—contributed to the "occasions of war"; how much we have failed in showing forth the Kingdom of Christ, with its ensign of love and purity and righteousness; to what extent we have been satisfied with being comfortable and respectable, rather than zealous and humble and self-denying—all these considerations belong to the heart-searchings which such times as the present must bring. And "if we will inquire", let us stay for an answer. If we have gone after teachers who (although serviceable in their places) have given us standards lower in some things than those which the Gospel sets for us; if we have followed the way of ease and popularity and worldly success, rather than that of highest rectitude and purest spirituality, let us see now what is the course of recuperation and amendment, and what is our right place in the Lord's witnessing host.

We hear much at this time about alternative or substitutional service, and many are rather anxiously casting about to discover what course is open to them. One may not deny that at such a juncture there is a positive service for the friends of peace to perform, but it may not be just such as authority prescribes or popular sentiment most approves. Whoever can show forth the spirit of love and good-will to mankind at large; whoever can elevate the standards of justice and kindness in all mutual relations; whoever can promote the comfort and well-being of the world, without entering into that which "hurts and destroys"—such are contributing a part which might truly (and in a higher sense than that usually given to the term) be accounted "substitutional." It must belong to the "more excellent way", and derive its strength from that Tree, the leaves of which "are for the healing of the nations."

ment. As we have known it in our own country it has trusted in the main to instinctive voluntary service as opposed to conscript exaction. It has been our way of spelling freedom and there can be no question that as a type it has drawn multitudes of immigrants from every other system of the old world. It is in fact the "New Freedom" which has been put as a trade mark upon everything American. Group responsibility, group privileges, group powers may have been sacrificed upon this altar of freedom. Are the sacrifices to be compared to those made upon the altar of conscript service? Let our great imported population answer this question.

Have we then actually as a government repudiated the idea expressed in William Penn's phrase "to serve their country"? Perhaps we can best decide this by passing in brief review the fundamental institutions through which mankind finds satisfied expression for his ambitions and his hopes. In the final analysis the home as emphasized by the great historian Gibbon is the fundamental institution of society. Our homes under the feudal idea may be our castles in which notions of personal liberty are given the utmost range. They may, on the other hand, be social and socializing agencies developing a high voltage of community power. In a country like Germany the state puts its hand on the home in many particulars—in other words, prescribes how the individual shall serve the state through the home. One recognizes points of advantage and of efficiency gained under such a system, but would we candidly exchange our type for theirs? In the actual progress of the race which do we believe has the advantage for service, voluntary or conscript home development?

The institutions of education follow the home very closely in their service to society. It was the boast of a Minister of Education in France that he could tell at any hour of the day just what lesson any one of the millions of children in school in France was reciting. That is the extreme of nationalized education. It has some fruits which a voluntary system like ours needs to cultivate. It trains a high grade of intelligent expert and then commands him for life service. But it often ignores the endless variety of capacity and opportunity that makes different demands for different children and different environments. The voluntary system of our country that, in addition to a large number of private schools under committees, enlists multiplied thousands of our citizens in an unpaid service as members of school boards may still have many marks of immaturity, but it has already won the attention of Europe. The great army of American schoolmen in this voluntary service represent a resource that even educational bureaucracy cannot command. We might be conscripted for educational service as in Europe, but apparently our country has the balance of advantage in its favor under a voluntary system.

The material support for home and for school must ultimately be supplied by the institutions of business. These are presented in endless variety from the labor of "the horny-handed son of toil" on the land, to those refinements of intellectual achievement that make masters of industry and combine bodies of men into worlds of machines. For a decade past government functions have been reaching out in control of these interests till we have had some opportunity to compare controlled and free industry as instruments of service. Under war conditions in Europe many lines of business have been completely conscripted. In these cases great gains of industry have at times been noted, but from no quarter does one hear that the forced service has the quality developed in notable instances under personal initiative and freedom. With all the ugly excrescences of trust and monopoly chargeable to free business enterprise no great acumen is required to see that much of the best service to mankind is made possible by great business undertakings. It is in fact the glory of our age that business and trade have been made allies of Christian service. All should pursue their business as in fact a vocation, and so "serve their country."

Finally, the reconstructive agencies of society offer alluring opportunities for voluntary service. Hospitals and reformatories, orphanages and missions are at every hand. They demand sacrificing and devoted labor of great numbers of our intelligent citizens. Who can withstand their claims! Who has withstood them! Most of us are heavily loaded with such responsibilities. Surely through them we are able to serve our country, even though our service may be unheralded.

We might pursue this inquiry further and challenge our life processes more in detail. If home and school, if business and philanthropy all have what the scientists call "a service content" without compulsion, we should hardly be induced to change from our system of freedom without a cause. The unnatural demands of war seem to urge such a cause. Indeed, under the stimulus of excitement and the concentration of attention on a single expression of service, all this varied territory in which it is herewith pointed out that we can "serve our country" becomes eclipsed, and we classed as slackers if we withstand a special enlistment. A word of warning at this very moment on this subject comes from no less an authority than Lord Bryce. "Civil and religious liberty in the old sense of the term," he has declared, "have been completely achieved in England only to have liberty now facing a new attack from an unexpected quarter. It lies in the demand that the state shall at once step in to 'take charge of and direct branches of industry and commerce which have hitherto thriven without that direction.'" In other words, the "new attack upon liberty" lies in the extension of the conscription principle from the making of an army to the making of a citizen. In England as in America a free state can only be securely built upon a free service. If as individuals we are failing to give any measure of this free service to the larger units of society it might open our understanding to neglected privileges were we to be conscripted. The most devoted of us might readily recognize that our national service in business, in education, in philanthropy is woefully inefficient from our lack of training. On this account we might seek more definite lines in which to express our patriotism. But not a few of us feel that we love our country too much to be limited in our service to her to a specified term of years in some work that is not actually a vocation for us.

Behind all the service for others possible in the life activities that we must take part in naturally, it is really easy to recognize the principle of conscription after all. We are indeed redeemed from selfishness in proportion as we accept conscription from the Master of Life. But having accepted that conscription we cannot be forced into a double loyalty. Fortunately the situations are rare where we face such an alternative. Our country has so many needs for us so much greater, so much more constant than any seeming military necessity, that we can rest measurably satisfied with the national service that our normal activities contribute, very particularly if these normal activities are under the presidency of Christ. What a surprised discovery it might be for this poor war-weary world to make that governments can best realize what it is to be "safe for democracy" through conscription to the King of Kings!

FROM THE YEARLY MEETING OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN CHINA, HELD IN CHENG TU, SIXTH TO TWELFTH OF FIRST MONTH, 1917.

TO THE YEARLY MEETING OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN PHILADELPHIA, U. S. A.—

Dear Friends.—As we have met in this, the fifteenth year of our Yearly Meeting, we have read, with much interest and thankfulness, epistles sent to us from other Yearly Meetings in various parts of the world, and in replying to them we feel we should like also to send a short greeting to you, to assure you of the hearty welcome given by us to one of your members now here, for although we have no letter from you this year we feel we have in Jane C. Balderston a "living epistle" already "known and loved" amongst us, by the sympathetic Christ-like spirit in which she has entered into the needs and conditions of our life in West China; and we desire that you and we may find we have in her a link in the chain of love and faith which binds us together in one Faith and one Hope.

Also we still remember Joseph Elkinton very well, who came to us from you about two years ago. Although he could not stay long with us, the advantages we received from him are countless; we are still receiving letters from him, so he also is linking us together.

We are still only small in numbers, but there are amongst us old and young, men and women, who, with you, rejoice in the love of God through Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, and we ask your sympathy and prayers that we may grow in grace and in the knowledge of God.

As we hear of the terrible conflict going on in western lands we sympathize with all the tried and the suffering, and we pray that the Spirit of the Prince of Peace may yet prevail to bring "peace on earth and good-will towards all men."

China has also her many troubles, but we rejoice that there is an increasing number amongst us who love our country and want to serve it. We believe the Spirit of the Gospel is our only hope for the future, for it is "righteousness" alone that exalts a nation" really, and so we long to do our part in the true rebuilding of China, and we value all your sympathy and help in this direction.

FROM THE TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF BELIEVERS AND MEMBERS CONNECTED WITH THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN JAPAN, HELD IN TSUCHIURA, IBARAKI PROVINCE FROM THE TWENTY-THIRD TO TWENTY-SIXTH OF ELEVENTH MONTH, 1916.

TO THE YEARLY MEETING OF THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS HELD AT FOURTH AND ARCH STREETS, PHILADELPHIA, PA., U. S. A.—

Your message sent in the love of the Lord was read with interest, sympathy and thankfulness. We with you realize the sadness and pain which is caused to the heart of God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ by the great European war. Standing upon the sure promise that our Saviour Jesus Christ shall become the Prince of Peace to all nations, we work and pray that the all-wise God will in His providence make it true that swords shall be beaten into plowshares and the people shall no more learn war and the light of the righteousness, which is from Christ, may shine into the dark places of the whole world so that the light from within shall shine out till "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea."

Striving by trust in the strength of God we continue to walk in the life-giving light of the Gospel of the Lord. We are engaged in reform work, temperance and various forms of social and religious service trying to save perishing people under Divine guidance. We expect in the near future to have organized after the manner of other countries a Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends here in our own land. We ask your prayers that we may have the guidance and blessing of the Lord on this organization. This letter is sent by the decision of the annual meeting. We pray that the grace of God may rest upon you.

Recording Clerk.

LETTER SENT TO THE MEMBERS OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AND TO PRESIDENT WILSON AND TO SECRETARY OF WAR BAKER.

The President in his last address to Congress declared that America is entering the war not for self-interest, but "for the principle that gave her birth" for "the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and obedience." This is a reassertion of that principle of freedom of conscience which has been not only a controlling ideal but part of the fundamental law of our land. "The people of the United States in order to . . . secure the blessings of liberty" ordained and established the Federal Constitution and as part of that Constitution have decreed that "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." No less a state paper than the Constitution of Pennsylvania declares that "no human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the rights of conscience."

It is with deep concern for these rights of conscience that we view the proposed "Bill to Authorize the President to Increase Temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States." We are for many reasons opposed to the Conscription principle, but that which we have most at heart is liberty of conscience. It is true that the proposed bill recognizes in a limited degree this vital principle when it exempts members "of any well recognized religious sect or organization whose creed forbids its members to participate in war in any form." But we press upon you in all earnestness the conviction that this is not an adequate provision for the present situation. Outside of the membership of these designated religious organizations there are, we believe, thousands of men whose consciences forbid them to participate in war in any form.

These men are in no sense unpatriotic. They are neither cowards nor slackers. Many of them are engaged in constructive work for social progress and are among the nation's most useful citizens. We earnestly request that their liberty of conscience be preserved from the rough hand of compulsion.

The Society of Friends and other religious bodies included within the exemption clause as it now stands sincerely appreciate this provision for their benefit. But the underlying principle on account of which they have in the past sought and been granted immunity requires that the exemption be not limited to the members of a few comparatively small organizations. Conscience is personal and individual. It is too large to be contained in creeds, too variegated to be classified by denominations. Liberty of conscience belongs to all men and the principles of equality, justice, democracy and morality demand that it shall not be made dependent upon adherence to any creed or membership in any religious organization.

We cannot acquiesce in the argument that it is necessary to confine exemption to members of recognized denominations in order to prevent shirkers from abusing the privilege by feigning conscientious objections. We believe that there are comparatively few who would attempt such action or who would be successful if they should. But apart from this, we urge that the principle of free conscience is too sacred to be sacrificed to expediency and that the nation can far better afford to lose a few unprincipled soldiers than to attempt to coerce the consciences of those holding sincere convictions.

In requesting this exemption for all conscientious objectors we are not asking something for which there is no precedent. In adopting conscription during the present war the British Parliament provided for the exemption of all conscientious objectors without regard to denomination or creed. For your information we enclose a copy of the exemption clause contained in the English Act.

We, therefore, respectfully urge that the exemption clause in the present bill be amended so as to read "And nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to require or compel service in any of the forces herein provided for by any person who is conscientiously opposed to engaging in such service."

We also urge that provision be made for the appointment by other than military authority of properly qualified civilian boards to pass upon such exemptions and that appeals be allowed from the decisions of such to the United States District Courts.

Signed on behalf of Friends' National Peace Committee, Fellowship of Reconciliation, American Union Against Militarism.

WAR VICTIMS' RELIEF COMMITTEE OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

104, ETHELBERGA HOUSE, 91, Bishopsgate, E. C.

TO THE AMERICAN FRIENDS' YEARLY MEETINGS:—

Dear Friends:—During these dark and anxious days of war the sympathy of the American people has greatly helped and supported us, and we trust, whatever trials lie before our countries in the future, that the kinship of suffering may only unite us still more closely.

We gratefully acknowledge the generous and practical help which Friends in America have contributed both in money and clothing towards the responsible service which has been laid upon this Committee. Every month adds to the distress and misery of Europe; every month, too, leads to further difficulty in the raising of funds. We are thankful for the privilege of sending help to some of these homeless and suffering civilian victims, the men and women and children who, through the cruelty of the war, have been robbed of home and all that life has given them. Many of us have heard from the lips of these sufferers their tale of wrong and sorrow. We long not only to help them but to try to stem the tide of misery in other places farther afield where the need seems even greater. But the question arises whether, with all we have in hand, we are justified in taking on fresh work, even when help is so urgently needed.

We venture, therefore, to lay our case before you afresh and to ask you to co-operate with us still further in our great task. The work is widely extended and of many descriptions. In France, where, with the support and assistance of the authorities we have been working since Eleventh Month 1914, our men workers have erected between 400 and 500 wooden houses for peasants in destroyed villages, who would otherwise have had to continue to live in cellars and wretched hovels, or else to leave the neighborhood and let their farms go out of cultivation. By the distribution or loan of agricultural machines and working with the farmers in different villages and giving seeds, tools, poultry, rabbits, etc., to many distressed families, they have done much to restore the self-respect of many who felt helpless and hopeless and encourage them to face alone the gathering in of the harvest and the cultivation of their weed-covered fields.

Clothing, beds, furniture and other household goods have been systematically and carefully distributed, and in addition to this definite relief-giving, our women workers have started work-rooms for the women where many are employed—to their great delight—and they have also undertaken the management of convalescent homes, a small general hospital, and a maternity hospital. In the latter over 400 babies have been born since our work was started.

In Holland, thousands of Belgians poured into the country after the beginning of the war. In the refugee camps the idle life, with few pleasures or duties, has a most deleterious effect, especially on the young, and to help these people many wooden houses have been constructed by Belgian workmen under our supervision. In these houses something like home life is possible, and they are so constructed that they can be removed to Belgium if and when the time comes for this to be practicable. Many industries have been organized, recreation rooms have been opened and entertainments planned.

At the request of the Foreign Office we also care for released English civilians on their journey to England after internment in Germany, conducting them from the Dutch frontier to England.

But the most appalling distress of all lies in the east of Europe. In that region, where armies have passed and re-passed, whole cities have been depopulated and the people have been harried from village to village, leaving one smoking and ruined to find the next in the hands of the enemy. There will probably be no more awful record in history than that of the suffering of this people. No wonder that thousands have lost their lives in the retreat over the snow and that the roads were strewn with their dead bodies and the pitiful wrecks of household goods left behind in their flight.

Thousands or even millions have fled, however, into the eastern provinces of Russia, and in the province of Samara we have a party of workers who, with assistance from the local authorities (who have provided buildings for the purpose), have established centres for medical and general relief. In one place 100 to 150 refugees, many of them children who have lost all knowledge of their parents, are being housed and cared for by our friends. In two other small hospitals are established, and besides this work-rooms have been organized where women can come and spin and weave and so add to the bare pittance allowed them by the Government.

The medical work is as interesting and important as any. One of our doctors writes: "There is absolutely no other medical aid available in a radius varying from thirty-five to a hundred miles. The first day after my arrival I found myself confronted by a large crowd of out-patients, very noisy and clamoring to be seen. By the end of the day we had attended to 117 separate people and many were turned away. Perhaps this might be easy at home and in one's own language, but here on one's first day, and without an interpreter, it was certainly not the easiest work. The crowds have kept up since. We have gained experience and can work more quickly."

We need hardly labor the point that for all these demands we urgently need more money, more clothing, more help of every kind. Neither is it necessary for us to state our case too urgently to those who have already sent us such generous and timely aid. We hear with much encouragement that the Young Friends' Movement hope to send us helpers from among their own members, which is a form of co-operation we shall gladly welcome.

We are consulting a friend in America as to the possibility of forming a small committee in your country to co-ordinate our various helpers and to keep in touch with us here, receiving and distributing literature according to the different local needs.

May we ask you to consider whether you could form such a nucleus of help, appointing some member to deal with the literature, receive and forward money, and, pending the establishment of an American Committee, correspond with us for any information required? Another valuable help would be to form working parties for clothes for the poor refugees. Some of our best gifts of clothing have come from your country, and we are exceedingly grateful for these, and we count confidently on receiving such continued proofs of your sympathy and interest.

We can not blind ourselves to the fact that your country has its own and crying needs in this time of universal suffering, but we still venture to send our appeal for a service which we know is one that has already found its place in your hearts—service, albeit a small one in the face of such enormous need, to bind up the broken in heart and to rebuild the waste places, to comfort those that mourn and to prepare the way for the longed-for peace.

We remain, with love, your friends,

(Signed on behalf of the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee.)

THIRD MONTH 28, 1917.

FREE SPEECH AND FREE PRESS.

Twenty well-known Americans have signed a round-robin to President Wilson urging him to give out a statement reminding the country that the historic rights of free speech, free press and rights of assemblage should not be jeopardized at this time through the too zealous spread of bureaucratic laws and of official activities.

The text of the letter, in full, was as follows:

"We are deeply concerned lest America, having declared a state of war, should sacrifice certain safeguards fundamental to the life of her democracy.

"Several bills are now before Congress, or may come before it, seeking to punish those who designedly use military information for the benefit of foreign governments.

"With this purpose we, of course, are entirely sympathetic, but the administration of such laws, purposely made comprehensive so as to include a wide range of possible offenders, may easily lend itself to the suppression of free speech, free assemblage, popular discussion and criticism.

"We believe that you would deem it essential, perhaps more at this time than at any other, that the truth should not be withheld or concealed from the American people whose interests after all are the most vital consideration.

"Even by this time, we have seen evidence of the breaking down of immemorial rights and privileges. Halls have been refused for public discussion; meetings have been broken up; speakers have been arrested and censorship exercised not to prevent the transmission of information to enemy countries, but to prevent the free discussion by American citizens of our own problems and policies. As we go on, the inevitable psychology of war will manifest itself with increasing danger, not only to individuals but to our cherished institutions. It is possible that the moral damage to our democracy in this war may become more serious than the physical or national losses incurred.

"What we ask of you, Mr. President, whose utterances at this time must command the earnest attention of the country, is to make an impressive statement that will reach, not only the officials of the Federal Government scattered throughout the Union, but the officials of the several states and of the cities, towns and villages of the country, reminding them of the peculiar obligation devolving upon all Americans in this war to uphold in every way our constitutional rights and liberties. This will give assurance that in attempting to administer war-time laws, the spirit of democracy will not be broken. Such a statement sent throughout the country would reinforce your declaration that this is a war for democracy and liberty. We are sure that you will believe that only because this matter seems of paramount public importance do we venture to bring it to you at this time for your attention."

MAKE yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts, bright fancies, satisfied memories, faithful sayings, treasure houses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb, nor pain make gloomy—houses built without hands for our souls to live in.—RUSKIN.

BARTIMEUS.

Lord, that we might again receive our sight:

That we may touch Thy garments in the press—
And know the healing of Thy graciousness
To save us from our woe and dreadful night—
Wherein Thy lost Creation gropes and dies
Of blasting griefs and nameless agonies:

Speak as of old: Of pebbles on the shore—

And lilies of the field, and birds o'erhead;
Of little children and our daily bread;
Oh, we will listen, Lord, as ne'er before;
Behold Thy fisher-folk of Galilee—
The humble hearts that have no faith but Thee.

Never was Resurrection-hour in ages gone

Like unto this, the new-dawn Eastertide,
If Thou wilt ease our monstrous stone aside—
And come, Oh Risen Master, to Thine own:
Such terrors trouble yet our sleepless eyes—
Such curdling fears assail our memories:

Such phantoms as shall haunt our days and years—

Vile travesties of all fair life we know;
Bear with us yet: To-day—as long ago—
Shed o'er Jerusalem Thy yearning tears;
The pebbles, Lord, the leaves, the lilies white:
Hope of the World—once more restore our sight:

Lift us unto the Light, else we despair:

Forsake us not—who have forsaken Thee:
Grant that we may Thy Radiant Presence see—
And from our tomb Thy miracle may share:
Oh, Lord of Hosts, stretch o'er our stricken land
The silent blessing of Thy pierced Hand.

"FRIENDS BEYOND SEAS."*

"So if any be moved to the contributing and for helping them beyond seas, cheerfully do it, and every one to the ministry yourselves which is [unto] the seed of Christ, for England is as a family of prophets, which must spread over all nations."

The above quotation from the Epistle of Skipton General Meeting, 1660, appears in the title page of a significant little volume which has reached us from England during the past few weeks. Our friend, Henry T. Hodgkin, whose work is too well known to need introduction to the readers of THE FRIEND, has traced for us the history of the Foreign Missionary Movement among Friends in England. This has been done in a way that not only gives definite information historically, but inspires and even thrills the reader with the possibilities of the work in store for the Society of Friends the more it realizes the great part it has to play in demonstrating to the world the universality of the Christian religion. The application of this principle by the early Friends is seen in the lives of George Fox and others when following out their individual concerns as they traveled to carry the Quaker message and in the church in its "corporate capacity" when taking up collections for service beyond the seas.

Through this little volume we are reminded of the great enthusiasm for the truth found among the early Friends, the willingness to endure untold sacrifices, suffering, imprisonment, even torture, for the sake of placing their message in the hearts of men. Quotations are made which clearly demonstrate their conviction that Quakerism was not for England alone. This period of Friends' Foreign Missionary work is probably better known than any other, although not under the name. After paying tribute to the noble men and women who in those early days when travel was so difficult and hazardous, braved grave dangers in their effort to reach the people of all nations, our author traces the period of decline of the Society, both in numbers and life. He shows us the result of decay which is sure to follow when an organization commences to spend its time and substance chiefly on its own concerns. "It became engrossed in minor matters, paying great attention to the precise kind of dress and form of speech suitable for its members, to small points of discipline, and generally to the care of the inner life and outward behavior of its own members rather than to the promulgation of the truths which had been delivered to them." The author gives honor to those who did uphold the standard, however, even in the darkest days, and shows how it may be held that these Friends—namely, John Woolman, Stephen Grellet and others "maintained the succession."

Not until the year 1827 was there a successful beginning to bring the matter of Friends' responsibility towards the non-Christian world to the attention of the Society. This was done through the Friends' Monthly Magazine and through pamphlets issued by individuals who had worked in the mission field. The subject was brought before the Yearly Meeting through a minute from West Somerset Monthly Meeting in 1830, but resulted at that time only in a minute recording "the judgment that the subject is deserving of further and closer attention." With this "sanction" a few faithful ones pursued the matter from time to time, but were not able to stir the Society as such to its full responsibility, although a good deal of active service on the part of individuals is recorded. The chief objection to undertaking or supporting regular missionary work is that Friends might in so doing compromise their views in relation to the freedom of the Christian ministry. The discussion continued from time to time with varying degrees of interest and excuses until 1868, when the formation of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association took place. Dr. Hodgkin shows how there was about this time a general awakening in all matters concerning a "larger liberty" as shown in the discontinuance of disownment for "marrying out," and less attention to the minor matters of language, dress, etc. It is a matter of intense interest to study the author's account of these critical years, and to observe how step by step "various influences working independently were converging to produce one result and how the faithfulness of one here and another there . . . was the means of leading at last to the establishment of Christian communities in various lands."

Another quotation will give an idea of some of the results of the work: "The cramped mind of the girl-wife is being enlarged, the ex-slave is being uplifted, the worn body is being set free from pain and disease, the child is being led out into new worlds of knowledge, the sin-bound soul is being redeemed."

The usual objections to the missionary movement are convincingly answered by Dr. Hodgkin, and ample reasons given as to why Friends with their simplicity of life and worship are peculiarly fitted to bear the Christian message to the "utmost parts of the earth." The author holds that when this thought was fully recognized, the whole Society became stirred with new life and vision, and has since worked with such power and devotion that "there is scarcely any section of the Christian Church which in proportion to its size gives more largely in men and money to the work of world evangelization."

Such facts may well make the Society of Friends on this side of the Atlantic ponder deeply when we realize that we have not shown great interest in this world movement. Our position is a questionable one, in contrast to that of the English Friends of to-day, because it can not be said that we are doing such a big work along other lines that we have no time or energy for interest in foreign lands. As a matter of fact, the English Friends have been the more active along all lines of service the more they have undertaken "beyond the seas."

It is not the purpose of this brief review to do more than call the attention of Friends to the volume itself. As an historical sketch it should be read by all Friends, and as a text-book for classes of young people no more useful book could be found. It inspires one with enthusiasm for what Friends have endured and undertaken for their faith and with heroic endeavor to take up the tasks which are peculiarly ours for to-day.

The author's reasons for publishing the volume in this world crisis are given in the preface, but the most important one may well serve as the leading argument why we as Friends should take a special interest in the subject of Foreign Mission at this particular hour. "The Society of Friends as the guardians of the ideal of the 'inviolable peace' has a distinctive place in helping to solve the problem of meeting and mixing races." If this be so, now is the time of all others when we should direct attention to the subjects discussed in this volume.

HANNAH CLOTHIER HULL.

REPORT OF THE FRIENDS' NATIONAL PEACE COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLICATION OF THE PEACE MESSAGE.

The Peace Message was published in at least one newspaper of the following forty-three cities, and in more than one where the figures after the name of the city appear:

Portland, Me.; Burlington, Vt.; Boston, Mass.; Worcester, Springfield (2); Providence, New Haven; New York (4, 1 in Yiddish); Rochester; Buffalo; Trenton (2); Philadelphia (3); Pittsburgh; Wilmington; Baltimore; Washington; Richmond; Charlotte, N. C.; Raleigh, N. C.; Charleston, S. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Birmingham, Ala.; Nashville, Tenn.; Memphis; Louisville, Ky.; Cincinnati, O.; Cleveland, O.; Indianapolis (2); Detroit, Mich.; Chicago; Duluth, Minn.; St. Louis; Dallas; Minneapolis; Sioux Falls, S. D.; Salt Lake City; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Portland, Oregon; Seattle; Albuquerque, N. M.; Wichita, Kan.; Omaha, Neb.

It was also published in the ten following weeklies:

The Masses; The Independent; The Nation; The New Republic; The Outlook; The Survey; The Public; Friends' Intelligencer; American Friend; THE FRIEND.

In addition, it was published on Third Month 31, the day of the patriotic jubilee, in each of the eight daily Philadelphia papers by the Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting at a cost of about $1100. We know of some other publications in smaller local papers and there probably have been some of which we have not heard. The Message was sent with a circular letter to the editors of about 900 religious papers throughout the country, asking them to publish it; it was also sent with a different circular letter to about 675 Friends in Monthly Meetings throughout the country, asking that it be published in some local paper. We do not know what returns there were on either of these two efforts, although there were some results.

The publication of the Message has attracted a certain amount of editorial comment in newspapers and magazines, most of it favorable, and has brought us some very enthusiastic letters in regard to it, mostly with small contributions, from Friends and others. It is the feeling of the Committee that the carrying out of the concern was decidedly worth while, and a valuable and constructive piece of Christian work.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Sixty-four contributions, as follows: 3 of $1,000; 3 of about $500; 1 of $250; 10 of $100; 6 of $50; 1 of $40; 7 of $25; 34 of $10 or less. In all, $5,417.49.

Daily Newspaper Advertising	$4,485.00
Weekly Advertising	847.00
Postage, Printing, Addressing, &c.	85.47

$5,417.49

The total average circulation of the newspapers in which the Message was published was 4,341,000; and of the Weeklies, was 271,000.

"Nothing is intolerable that is necessary."

DOUGLAS R. BISHOP, whose letter from an English prison was quoted in The Friend, enclosed the following verses written on the text "The blind receive their sight . . . and the deaf hear."

"Yes, some of us, O Lord, are blind,
We fail to see the way of Life,
And o'er our path we oftimes find
The clouds of doubt, of fear and strife.
Oh, open, Lord, our eyes that we May see the Light—and follow Thee.

"And some of us are deaf to hear
Thy gentle knock, Thy pleading call
The din of life, forever near,
Keeps from our ears Thy voice withal.
Oh, open, Lord, our ears that we May heed Thy voice—and follow Thee.

"Still more of us are dumb to tell
The glorious message of Thy love;
We seek the praise of men too well
To sing the praise of God above.
Oh, open, Lord, our lips that we May speak to others more of Thee.

"And some of us, O Lord, are dead
To all the promptings of the soul;
With careless step life's road we tread,
With selfish ease we seek the goal.
O raise us, Lord, to life, that we May live for evermore with Thee.

"And all of us are pressed with cares,
We are perplexed and weak and worn,
Thy golden seed is mixed with tares
That grow more thickly than the corn.
Oh give us, Lord, Thy strength, that we May, throughout life, be strong for Thee."

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

TIMELY WORDS.—The following letter, written with no idea of its publication, by a good aunt to her young niece, may be helpful to others:

My Dear E—:

I thank thee for thy letter which interested me so much that I felt like replying at once, because I had something to say. I have not felt so depressed by the U. S. entering the war (though it was a great disappointment and seemed also a great blunder), because . . . I consider it something in which I have no part at all; because also, in my peaceful home, nothing but the newspapers indicate disturbance. I wanted to tell thee that it seems to me the world's great need spiritually is to have a leaven of trusting Christians, keeping calm and cheerful and loving toward all men—keeping free from suspicion as well as resentment—and ready to help.

And the world's great physical need is food. Now you should help to give both.

You have a Christian home, full of comfort and beauty, to rest your spirits. And you have land to raise food on, and a good domestic training to teach you how to conserve it.

If you keep quietly happy in your beautiful home life, kindly and helpful to your neighbors, and, in addition, do all the drying, canning, preserving and pickling of your products, that you can without overwork to feed people next winter, I believe you will help more than by emergency training.

I had great unity with something I read, nearly like this, "If you know how to cook, don't wait to learn to run a motor-car; if you can milk don't study aviation; for cooking and dairying are needed now."

Thee sees there is a real need at once of the work of hands, with so many men taken off for drilling and munitions; while the probability of having wounded men to care for here is remote, and there are multitudes of women just eager for the glory and excitement of such work. It is the common, every-day things that are in danger of neglect. . . .

M—

"Surely Thou hast some work for me to do! Oh, open Thou mine eyes, to see how Thou wouldst choose to have it done, and where it lies."—ELIZABETH PRENTISS.

Now that the nations of the world are piling up debts in billions the following calculations kindly furnished by an interested subscriber seem much in place.—[Eds.]

When one looks at the sun it certainly does not seem to be very far off, perhaps a hundred miles or so. Its real distance was illustrated by a lecturer who said: "Suppose an express train traveling at the rate of forty miles an hour, were to start for the sun when some one was an infant, he would be eighty years old, long ere the supposed train reached the sun. Then suppose a second infant started where the first one left off. When he was eighty years old the journey would have been yet far from completed. Does it seem possible that a third infant would have reached the advanced age of eighty years and a fourth one reach his manhood, ere the journey was completed?" Astronomers assure us that such is the case.

Have you any definite idea of how large a sum a billion is? Supposing you were to count steadily for twelve hours, and in that time had counted 142,000. At the same rate in a week's time you would have counted nearly one million. To count a billion, at the same rate of progress, would require one thousand weeks or over nineteen years.

BORDERLAND.

Our Friend, Amy Brockbank, has sent us the following. She has had a liberal part in the relief work that has centred at Saint Stephen's House. Our readers will remember that the contributions sent from Friends have been distributed in good part by these workers. The report of John Way in this number indicates that.—[Eds.]

It is a desolate country, that Borderland, between the positive and the negative, the last remnant of hope and the first stab of despair. You do not necessarily recognize its dwellers by the colorless skin and the wasted cheek. Even a person attacked by some insidious disease does not inevitably show it. But the people of the Borderland look at you, they have the haunted eyes.

It begins when yesterday's ashes are left under the grate; when the window panes, spattered by yesterday's rain, are allowed to remain uncleaned. There comes the morning when the limbs leave the bed reluctantly; when it does not matter what the weather is doing. Yesterday it mattered. Yesterday the ashes did not lie, and the windows could have been cleaned. There was something in the arms which wanted to rub. To-day the arms are listless. It is an effort to move. Yet nothing has happened—nothing except that potatoes are up again, and the grocer has sold out of sugar. And when you go down-stairs, the linoleum is the same lifeless thing underfoot; with the pattern trodden out in patches; and there is the same faint smell of gas in the passage. Only somehow or other, the linoleum is both very close to you, and a hundred miles away. It does not matter. Nothing matters except that the children should be got off to school. And this is only because you want the house to yourself, so that you may sit down. And so you sit and sit, watching the unwashed breakfast things on the table, and the angle at which the knife rests on the saucer of margarine. It is the way of the Borderland. In the Borderland you do not, except by a supreme effort, wash what is dirty. You look at it vacantly instead, as if it belonged to another life.

So it does. It belongs to yesterday. Yesterday you were part of a living world, where you washed things with a sense that it was good to have them clean. To-day the world still goes on, but you have shrunk away from it a foot or two. You are in the Borderland, over the invisible line.

Philanthropic institutions are legion. They relieve, by food, by money, or by advice, thousands of needy folk. We, at Saint Stephen's House, belong to the same category. The yoke of philanthropy lies heavy about our necks. In spite of this, we struggle against our fate, striving that the iron of official philanthropy shall not enter into our souls. And this is, perhaps, partly owing to our intimacy with the Borderland which has not as yet received official recognition. Sometimes, as a last resource, they come to us, the folk who are of the Border, or write short pathetic letters, in which, between the lapses of grammar, you may read the graver lapse of hope. It is the old story, or rather that terrible new one which has come to us with the war, but does not make sufficiently dramatic reading for Fleet Street. The German husband interned, the Government allowance too slender to cover the cost of bare necessities, after the rent is paid; one of the older children sick; the baby ill-nourished. In addition, the indifference or actual unkindness of neighbors, or former friends, because of the German married name which they seemed to take so slightly before the war. There are dwellers in the Borderland who tell you this story almost apathetically as if it were happening to someone else. To state these things in a voice that does not break is one of the signs of the Borderland. It is a sign that what was once abnormal and incredible is now normal and only too credible, because of its daily and hourly iteration.

We have so often heard that every cloud has a silver lining, which is as good as saying that every capitalist has his cheque-book. A little facile optimism goes so well with a bank account which is not overdrawn! And have we not met those who appear only capable of realizing intense suffering, or complete freedom from it? Either you are so well off that only a shortage of petrol prevents you from using your car, or you are so poor that you have to pawn your blankets to buy food! Yet we must not forget that poverty, like wealth, is relative, and that there are infinite grades of poverty, as there are infinite degrees of wealth. And on the mental plane, as on the physical, there is the Borderland in which the potential germ has not declared itself as recognized disease.

At Saint Stephen's House we have a wholesome fear of that Borderland and its possibilities. It is while the poor souls are there, while they are, as it were, in the marches of misery, that we hasten to succour them before they have reached that darker outland from which often there is no return. Shall we not endeavor to help them now, while disillusionment and shattered hope have not yet reached despair? A little help now, a little encouragement, and they may yet be drawn back into the happier country where it is still possible to hope.

They have been so brave, these "alien" British women, in the earlier days of the war. They have struggled so courageously against an overwhelming fate. But one cannot struggle forever. There comes a time when the long-strained nerves give way, and the overtaxed system breaks. Will you not help them now? Next week, next month, it may be too late. It is to-day that they are drifting across the border towards the darker land.

OLAF BAKER.

We know not when, we know not where,

We know not what that world will be;

But this we know: it will be fair

To see.

With heart athirst and thirsty face,

We know and know not what shall be:

Christ Jesus bring us of His grace

To see.

Christ Jesus bring us of His grace,

Beyond all prayers our hope can pray,

One day to see Him face to Face,

One day.

YOUNG FRIENDS AND THE WAR.

LEON P. DONCHIAN, Editor-in-Chief, '17.

America has entered the great war. Whether, as some say, we could have avoided it by saner legislation, or whether, as others say, it was inevitable, is of small importance now. This is distinctly not the time to philosophize over the past. The question to be considered is—What shall our attitude as young Friends be in this grave crisis? What is our duty now?

We may feel ourselves too young to discuss this question, but in too short a time this matter will confront us and we must have so strengthened ourselves that we will not be "stampeded into a wrong course of action but will have the stability to remain faithful to our ideals and true to our principles."

War, of course, is, in itself, abhorrent to us. We cannot, under any consideration, take part in the destruction of our fellow-men. We are only human and we wish the world to know that we have instilled in us a deep and true loyalty to our nation. To constructive work, to the furtherance of our democratic institutions, we pledge ourselves, but when even our nation asks us to slaughter our fellow-men and become false to our conscience we must refuse. We can take no part in destruction, but we cannot and we will not stand idly aside and allow our share of suffering to slip from our shoulders. We, as young Friends, just beginning to face this grave crisis, feel a clear and concrete call to perform some duty. We cannot desert our nation in this hour of need and we, therefore, offer ourselves, whole-heartedly, to be used for constructive work. Many of us feel that there are ways in which we can conscientiously take up our part in this suffering. To some ambulance work has an especial appeal. To others this course of action seems to have too much of the military about it, and to them is open agricultural pursuits, the raising of crops, which will tend to alleviate the suffering that of necessity follows in the wake of war. However, there are some of us who feel that all of these methods will tend to increase to too large an extent the military efficiency of the United States, and they cannot help in any way whatsoever. For these, indeed, the future looms up darkly, but these men, as all of us, who can only act as their conscience directs, will gladly suffer for freedom of conscience, the corner-stone of the Society of Friends.

However, in the last analysis, each one must answer the question for himself, and each one must obey his true feelings and remain firm when once he has decided upon his course of action. —Editorial in The Brown and White, Westtown.

OUR LITERARY TREASURES IN THE RECORD ROOM.

MAX I. REICH.

1.

Friends generally are not aware what a treasure trove of early Quaker literature is lying in the Record Room of the Library on Sixteenth Street, waiting to be brought to light by such as love to keep alive the memorial of the righteous and hand on their testimony to generations yet unborn. The rise of the Quakers was accompanied by a remarkable outburst of propagandist enthusiasm which contrasts strangely with the quiescence of many of our modern meetings. This spirit of out-going love expressed itself in literature as well as in glowing speech. Every phase of religious literature was covered: the expository, the hortatory, the controversial, the apologetic, the epistolary. The biographical came much later, as a matter of course. Where did those young men, some of them in their teens, more used to handle the plough, the hammer and the shuttle, learn the facile use of the pen? And where did they find the time amidst their constant labors, travels and frequent imprisonments in Britain's then loathsome dungeons to write some of the bulky volumes now on our shelves?

But many of their writings were only small tracts intended for broadcast distribution. It would be worth while to take the trouble to become acquainted with their now faded pages and to feel the still unspent heat of the hidden fire that burns in every line. For the soul of the writer imparts its own tincture to his writing as well as to his speech. The early Friends had come up "out of a wilderness" of spiritual hunger and thirst "into a land of brooks and fountains where they did eat bread without scarceness," and they felt it to be their mission to invite others into the goodly portion they had found. Power from on high had gripped them, and that power became a driving force in their lives. I am persuaded that not a few of their written messages will rise again out of the dust of oblivion, and live and reign with Christ—if we may adopt the mystical language of the Apocalypse—who knows—"for a thousand years" to come. For such a glorious restitution after generations of neglect has often been granted to faithful witnesses whom their persecuting age had "beheaded" and buried in the tomb of forgetfulness. Thus the Pope of Rome wrote of the Reformers: "The Bohemian John Huss whom I burned at the stake is alive again in the German Luther and Melancthon." Let us have no misgivings about the matter, the early Quakers have not yet finished their testimony.

We have in the Record Room at the Library a great number of different authors represented. Beside George Fox there are Richard Farnworth, William Dewsbury, Francis Howgill, John Burnyeat, Edward Burrough, Richard Hubbertorne, Josiah Coale, George Fox, "the younger" (in conviction, not in years, and a valiant man in Israel), James Nayler, the silver-tongued, Samuel Fisher, with his consecrated learning, James Parnell, who burned out his innocent young life in Colchester jail, Rigge Ambrose, the two valiant Whitehead brothers, George and John, Solomon Eccles (whose direct descendants I know personally), John Lawson, and later, Robert Barclay of immortal memory, Isaac Pennington, the mystic John of the young Society, William Penn, statesman, teacher and prophet, Stephen Crisp, apostle to the Netherlands, John Crook, Thomas Ellwood, editor of George Fox's Journal, Joseph Nicholson, James Parke, etc., etc. From early days there was room for a teaching ministry as well as for the prophetic; the first, setting forth the balance and harmony of Truth in its various parts, able to confute gainsayers and establish sincere enquirers; the second, articulating in glowing, incisive speech the "openings" which insight and intuition had become aware of in "the light that never was on sea or land."

And there were notable women also among the early Friends, and we have some of their writings in the Record Room. We might speak of Margaret Fell, the nursing mother of the tender plant newly arisen in England, Priscilla Cotton, Mary Cole, Anne Gargill and others.

The controversial writings of the first sixty years of Quaker history are of exceeding value to those who desire to know what our early Friends really stood for. Two things we observe clearly in them: the vehement manner in which they repudiated the interpretation which their adversaries put on their central message—namely, that the inward Light was a merely natural light. It was nothing less than Christ Jesus by His living Spirit in His inward appearing. Secondly, the pains they took to make it clear that they had not the slightest notion of denying the worth and efficacy of what Christ had done for man through His Incarnation, Sacrifice and Resurrection. The now glorified Christ and His light within are one. What He did for man He now makes good in man, where there is obedience to His blessed Spirit. The vagaries of the unbalanced John Perrot, the more serious separation led by Wilkinson and Story, because they regarded the "Discipline" as an encroachment on individual guidance, the fierce denunciations of Francis Bugg after his defection, the miserable story of the Keithian controversy, and other minor troubles, gave Friends an opportunity of putting on record what their real views, practices and aims were. They stood for a revival of the pure Christian Faith only partially recovered at the Reformation. And that which to them had its root in "immediate Divine revelation" could well stand the triple test of the Scriptures of Truth, right reason, and the consensus of normal Christian experience.

NEWS ITEMS.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING will be held in regular course on the seventh and eighth of Fifth Month; the meeting of Ministers and Elders on Second-day, the 7th, at 2.30 P. M., and the regular meeting on Third-day, at 10.30 A. M.

ALEXANDER C. WOOD has kindly furnished us with information of the intended omission of the annual conference at Lake Mohonk on International Arbitration. The Secretary of the Conference has been at no little trouble to ascertain the sentiment of those concerned. He makes this statement of the outcome of his effort:

"A considerable majority favor postponement of the Conference, particularly as the United States has entered the war. Practically all agree that in principle the holding of a Conference would be open to no well-informed criticism; but a large proportion, even of those who favor holding the Conference, state that the times will not permit them to leave home or business to attend."

Daniel Smiley and wife express "much regret at the postponement to later dates of which the earliest possible notice will be sent."

WE ARE in receipt of the 1916 report of the Lebanon Hospital (for Mental Diseases). Owing to unsettled conditions it could not be issued at the regular time. The following paragraphs will give interesting information:

An eventful year has passed since our last report was issued and we are indeed deeply thankful to our Heavenly Father Who has carefully guarded and preserved the institution thus far. Information at present is difficult to obtain, but we recently learned that the hospital was still open with an increasing number of patients and that one of the buildings which had been closed for economy's sake had to be reopened, so that the entire institution is now filled with patients.

We do indeed praise God for the many evidences of His watchfulness and care during the past year in providing funds for the operating expense and in supplying provisions. Through the kindness and liberality of our friends the Committee was enabled to forward funds from time to time throughout the year. The total amount remitted was $4,165.00, enabling those in charge to carry on the work, though often under most trying conditions.

This amount was very much greater than we have ever before raised in this country for the expense account, but we earnestly ask all our friends not to slacken their efforts during the coming year; it would add untold suffering to these poor mentally afflicted people if the hospital had to be closed and they be turned adrift without food or shelter or any place to go.

For the future we trust and pray for the continued blessing of our Lord—the Lord of Hosts—upon this work.

In the Chrétien Libre, Léon Revoyre's monthly, published in France, Henry van Etten, who was recently received into membership with Friends, describes how he came to understand the principles of Quakerism through his knowledge of Esperanto. "It was," he says, "through reading 'Quaker Strongholds' by Caroline Stephen in Esperanto that I came to know the truth. Its style is so compact, forcible and old-fashioned almost, in spite of my knowledge of English, I should have found it almost impossible to read it in that language. But Esperanto suits the original so well that it has succeeded in producing a translation that is superior. The feeling of brotherhood which obtains among Esperantists," he continues, "is so strong that I am sure that an Esperantist of a foreign land could hardly be an enemy. He speaks the same tongue, he is engaged on the same work, as I. This means a great deal. . . ."

"We agree," adds the editor "an international language would be a barrier against war."—The Friend [London].

The first and second numbers of The Rational Patriot are before us. Although amongst the youngest of peace organs it shows a clearness and courage of conviction sure to win a hearing. The first issue explains, "We are a number of Oberlin men [Oberlin College, Ohio] who believe that Peace is worth working for." Friends generally will want to respond with encouragement to this effort. The publisher, J. Howard Branson, is a member of the meeting at Lansdowne.

The number of Friends' Fellowship Papers for Third Month contains most timely reading, especially for young Friends. It is the organ of the Young Friends' Association, is printed in England and has not we fear the wide circulation on this side the Atlantic it deserves. For uncompromising testimony combined with rare sanity and a sweet Christian spirit the articles of this month can hardly be excelled. Before any one of us makes decisions in the present crisis as to what course we shall pursue it would be well for us to know better what young English Friends are doing and how they are doing it.

LANSDOWNE MONTHLY MEETING granted a minute Fourth Month 26th to Samuel W. Jones, liberating him to appoint a meeting for Divine Worship, to be held in Carversville Christian Church, Bucks Co., Pa., First-day, Fifth Month 6, 1917, at 3 P. M.

If the atmosphere of spiritual worship could always descend, from our meetings for worship to our business meetings, the element of discernment which it conveys would enable us to arrive at conclusions, according to the mind of truth, without failure.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Arthur J. Balfour, Great Britain's Foreign Secretary, and the British High Commission, sent to confer with American officials at Washington, arrived safely on the 22nd. They and Marshal Joffre and other military members will indicate to the American officials with whom they are to confer, several important military reasons which they consider renders the sending of a force to Europe advisable.

Judged by the Third Month imports from abroad at the port of New York, the German submarine blockade seems a much overrated menace. Those imports from Europe were ahead of the previous month's imports by $12,000,000, and, compared with those of 1916, they fell off only $126,000.

Success in obtaining a 20 per cent. increase in wages quickly resulted from the demands of the 225,000 bituminous coal miners of the United States and it is expected that a similar increase will soon be granted to the anthracite miners.

President Wilson at Washington sent a letter to Representative Helvering of Kansas last week, explaining and strongly supporting the administration's army bill with its selective conscription plan. The letter indicated the purpose of the administration to insist upon enactment of the measure vigorously.

Speaking against compulsory service, Professor Edward Cheyney, of the University of Pennsylvania, is quoted as saying: "The history of compulsory military service is not fine history. Canada has not accepted it, nor has any other of the colonies."

It is said, "Although the high cost of material was a contributing factor in the decision of the Lynn shoe manufacturers to close their factories, the principal reason for their action was their trouble with the labor unions in that city."

Delegates from various Travelers' Aid Societies throughout the country attended a National Travelers' Aid Conference in New York City last week, and organized a National Travelers' Aid Society.

Half a million dollars to aid in the reconstruction of homes in the devastated portions of France, Belgium, Serbia and Russia, was appropriated by the Board of Trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. The appropriation will be expended as speedily as possible under plans to be worked out by the Trustees.

Hotels, clubs and restaurants of the more expensive kind are beginning to confess themselves guilty in the matter of wasting food. Managers of hotels and restaurants in Boston are proceeding through a committee to consider the problem of cutting down the waste. Leading hotels in New York City have already taken such action.

Six hundred persons from over the country—delegates and alternates—were expected for the Ninth Annual American Bahai Congress in New York City on the 29th. Bahai, it is stated, includes Jews, Christian Mohammedans, Buddhists and people of all other religions, for it has a hierarchy, and its revelation and message, its tenets and principles, are so broad that everybody can accept them and still hold his own form of belief and worship. They are the principles and tenets that underlie all religions, and the greatest insistence of Abdul Baha, the prophet, on the oneness and brotherhood of all mankind. Indeed, all his revelations may be reduced to that assertion, and its corollary of love and service to one another.

FOREIGN.—Nova Scotia is the sixth province of Canada to enfranchise its women, and the victory there is counted as the eighth equal suffrage has gained on this continent since the beginning of 1917. Canada is not waiting until after the war is over to learn and apply the lessons inculcated into the British body politic by women's war service.

A Berlin despatch says that a Danish physician has offered 1,000,000 kroner to the Berlin Municipal Council, with which to send about 10,000 Berlin children to Denmark. The children would be kept in the northern kingdom for the duration of the war and six months thereafter. The offer was accepted.

"To be anxious for souls, and yet not impatient; to be patient, and yet not indifferent; to bear the infirmities of the weak, without fostering them; to testify against sin and unfaithfulness and the low standard of spiritual life, and yet to keep the stream of love free and full and open; to have the mind of a faithful, loving shepherd, a hopeful physician, a tender nurse, a skilful teacher, requires the continual renewal of the Lord's grace."

304 ARCH STREET, PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 27, 1917.

TO OUR FELLOW-MEMBERS OF PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING:—

DEAR FRIENDS:—

The Representative Meeting has given consideration to problems now confronting us because of the war. Our sympathy went out especially to our isolated members and to our younger Friends. The prevailing currents of world-thought tend to draw us away from positions which we have held by tradition and education and in varying measure of individual conviction. The pressure of public opinion is urging men and women to join militaristic movements. We, Friends, are loyal citizens imbued with a love of our country. We wish to keep our hands clean of the blood of our fellow-men, and we are eager to serve our nation and to help the world.

Our testimony against war is not a negation, but a positive attitude. We are not only protesting against war, but are pre-eminently endeavoring to call ourselves and others to the life of loving service to all men, enemies and friends alike, lived by Jesus Christ.

We recognize that we have not done this in its fullness, but in common with our fellow-men we have looked upon "the things of self" and in our selfishness have sinned against God, whose loving spirit would fain have found expression through us. We must therefore lay aside all feelings of complacency.

Furthermore, our earnest endeavor must be to enter into sympathy with our nation. The fact that much which has been said and done in the furtherance of this war seems to us wrong and a denial of the spirit of Christ, must not blind us to the other fact that multitudes of our Christian fellow-citizens have entered into it from what they regard as the highest motives, believing that only so could they bring democracy and peace to the world. The burdens of labor and of suffering they are assuming are greater than any Friends are likely to bear even under oppressive laws. Let us keep constantly before us the thought that their motives may be as sincere as ours and that the difference between us is not one of aim, but of method. They believe that by using physical violence now, they will ultimately further the Kingdom of God. Our belief is that Jesus Christ made a deliberate choice between the world's method of compulsion by physical violence and God's method of using the infinite power of love and of service and of self-sacrifice.

Since the seeds of war are in our social order and the simplest acts of our daily lives are entangled in it, we need to devote ourselves increasingly to prayer and also to the closest study possible to each one of us as to our individual duty in the trying days to come. Never in the history of the world has there been greater need of personal sacrifice and service for humanity.

Let the members of our meetings draw close together that each may learn from all and that there may be the fullest sympathy and understanding. We would remind Elders and Overseers of their duty of shepherding the flock and would urge those who need advice to seek it from their concerned Friends. Let nothing be done hastily or under impulse which may later be regretted and from which it may be difficult to withdraw. May all seek Divine counsel and dwell quietly under such an exercise. We know that our Heavenly Father is ever willing to give the Holy Spirit to those who seek for it, and that this Spirit will guide us into all truth. By going apart and listening for the still, small voice, our faith in God is strengthened and we learn "in hours of faith the truth to flesh and sense unknown"; then according to the measure of truth we have received let us walk by that rule.

A great opportunity has come to us to contribute to the coming of the Kingdom of God. May the spirit of complete consecration to this service come upon all of us in order that God may work through us for the healing of the nations.

The war with its legacies of bloodshed, of material, moral and spiritual loss, must pass. May our prayers to Almighty God be fervent that the men to whom will be entrusted the reconstruction of a large part of the world be endued with wisdom from on High, that the peace for which we long may be a lasting peace, that the day may be hastened in which Christ's Kingdom may be fully established on the earth.

On behalf of the Representative Meeting,

WILLIAM B. HARVEY,

Clerk.

THE CROOKED FOOTPATH.

Ah, here it is! the sliding rail
That marks the old remembered spot,
The gap that struck our schoolboy trail,
The crooked path across the lot.

It left the road by school and church,
A penciled shadow, nothing more,
That parted from the silver birch
And ended at the farmhouse door.

No line or compass traced its plan;
With frequent bends to left or right,
In aimless, wayward curves it ran,
But always kept the door in sight.

The gabled porch, with woodbine green,
The broken millstone at the sill,
Through many a rood might stretch between,
The truant child could see them still.

No rocks across the pathway lie,
No fallen trunk is o'er it thrown,
And yet it winds, we know not why,
And turns as if for tree or stone.

Perhaps some lover trod the way
With shaking knees and leaping heart,
And so it often runs astray
With sinuous sweep or sudden start.

Or one, perchance, with clouded brain
From some unholy banquet reeled,
And since, our devious steps maintain
His track across the trodden field.

Nay, deem not thus—no earthborn will
Could ever trace a faultless line;
Our truest steps are human still,
To walk unswerving were Divine!

Truants from love, we dream of wrath;
Oh, rather let us trust the more!
Through all the wanderings of the path
We still can see our Father's door!

—OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In the watch over our own hearts, so much needed in this time of stress and excitement, help may be found in a sincere effort to absorb the spirit of the petition taught by our Divine Master to His first disciples.

When we say Our Father, let us remember that He hath made of one blood all nations of the earth, and that all are the children of His tender care. Let us consider whether we do aim to hallow His Name in all that we say and do, and whether we desire the coming of His Kingdom in the hearts of all men, quite beyond the stability of any human institution or government.

And as we long for the ending of this terrible world-war, let us not choose the result in any victory of arms, but earnestly wish and pray that Our Father's will may be done on earth, and His purposes of love fulfilled—though we cannot see how.

While being diligent in what our hands find to do, may we trust Him who careth for us for daily bread for body and soul, and protection.

After this comes what is perhaps the closest test. Do we realize as we say, Forgive as we forgive, the awful depth of meaning in that little word as? Is it sufficient for us, to receive forgiveness in such kind and measure as we give to all men?

In the petition "Lead us not into temptation," let us not think only of self, but rather of the young men among us who are so sorely tempted just now by the popular clamor for defense of one's country, to lose the higher allegiance to the Heavenly Captain. So may we be delivered from evil.

"For Thine is the Power."

M. H. G.

CHRISTIAN SYMPATHY.

Sympathy means letting one's spirit flow out to meet another's spirit before critical appraisal or reasoning judgment have time to act. There may be obstacles in the way of complete unity of spirit between two who meet but the sympathetic attitude alone will at least draw forth from the other the highest response of which he is capable. There will then be no possibility of arousing that spirit of antagonism which is ready to spring up in the breast at the least suspicion of condescension or of assumption of superiority in the manner of another. "The great secret, Eliza," confides one of the characters in a work of Bernard Shaw's, "is not having bad manners or good manners or any other particular kind of manners, but having the same manner for all human souls."

Since the heart of the Christian message is good-will toward men we should expect to find the highest manifestation of sympathy in the bearer of that message. And we are not disappointed. The Fourth Gospel witnesses to the remarkable insight into character which Jesus possessed when it says: "He needed not that any should bear witness concerning man for He Himself knew what was in man."

One of the greatest evidences of the Divine inspiration of the Gospel narrative is that it never once mars the impression of Jesus' perfect simplicity and singleness of heart. The admonitions against undue honor to the rich, the parable of the rich man's compulsory guests, the teaching that the last shall be first and the first last, and the greatest shall be the minister of all, are not essential to complete the impression of that profound spiritual understanding which looked on the rich young man and loved him, exalted the widow's mite above the largest contributions, and said to the accusers of the sinning woman, "Let him that is without sin among you first cast a stone."

The most vivid teaching of Jesus' life is the exercise of a sympathy which took no account of the individual's outward circumstances. It is strange that so many of his professed followers fail to make this a goal of spiritual attainment.

Condescension and service are utterly antagonistic terms. Yet the majority of us through lack of sympathy and insight are unable to perceive how irreconcilable they are. A letter written by a Chinese to an American minister after the latter's visit to China contains this passage: "Our preachers often preach upon the love of God and the great influence it has over our life; but before I met you I had never realized how great this influence can be. To you racial barriers are nothing; all men are equal in your love. But in China we are very far from this ideal. I have never met a single minister in our mission who does not regard his Chinese congregation with condescension, for though all men are equal in the sight of God they are decidedly not equal in the sight of His human ministers."

This may be an unduly severe arraignment, but its lesson is obvious. Sympathy rooted in a spiritual humility which recognizes the essential likeness of human souls and human experience is indispensable to one who would bring others to a knowledge of that Love whose only appreciable channel is the spirit of man. And he who wills to extend to others true Christian sympathy may have begotten within him a measure of that grace which made the multitudes eager to touch Jesus because "power came forth from Him and healed them all."

One of the most insidious causes of lack of sympathy is zeal for a particular system of theology. Let us remember that revolt against dogmatic statements of religion does not necessarily mean revolt against religion; that rejection of portions of Christian theology does not often mean rejection of Christ, but only of inadequate interpretations of His life and teachings. "It is not Bradlaugh's atheism which they hate, but his unconscious Christianity," wrote John Bright of the attitude of church members toward his free-thinking contemporary. And the history of religion shows that many who gave to the world clearer conceptions of the relations between religion and goodness were those whom the followers of tradition most condemned.

So should it not be among us. Christ's insight into men's needs, His desire for their repentance and His love for their souls should be for us the means by which others shall be turned to the Way, the Truth and the Life. Conversion by sympathy is far more probable than by logic or censure.

"Why do your guests leave you with their faces shining?" a great Eastern teacher was asked. "I cannot tell you," he said, "but this I know, in all upon whom I look I see only my Father's face."

OUR LITERARY TREASURES IN THE RECORD ROOM.

MAX I. REICH.

II.

There are some two hundred specimens of Foxian writings on the shelves of the Record Room. The earliest I can put my hand on is an eight-page tract in good preservation entitled: "The Unmasking and Discovering of Anti-Christ, with All the False Prophecies, by the True Light Which Comes from Christ." It was published at London in 1653, only some four years after George Fox had begun his itinerating ministry in the north of England. Under date of 1654, we have "Saul's Errand to Damascus," where George Fox's name appears as joint author with James Nayler and John Lawson. It contains some thirty-seven pages. And as persecution early sought to crush the life out of the young movement, as early as 1656 we have thirty-three pages, entitled: "Cry of the Oppressed from under their Oppressions, . . . some of the sufferings of the . . . Quakers." From the very beginning Friends felt they had a world-wide testimony. Under date of 1657 we have a twenty-page communication: "An Epistle to All People on the Earth." Early Friends, like the living creatures seen by John the revelator, had eyes without as well as within. They saw a world that needed turning upside down; commercial life that needed to become honest; political life that needed to be built up anew on the teaching of the Light; law-courts that needed the breath of the Divine; not to speak of the religious profession of the seventeenth century that required to be purged of pretence and mere letter-worship. Thus we find George Fox writing "an Epistle to all professors in New England, Germany, also to the Jews and Turks;" "an Epistle to all the Christian magistrates and powers in the whole Christendom"; a treatise on "Gospel family order, being a short discourse concerning the ordering of families, both of whites, blacks and Indians."

Speaking of Jews, their spiritual condition rested as a real burden on George Fox, through the greater part of his life. England had just re-opened its doors to the "nation scattered and peeled," after a prolonged exclusion, ever since the edict of expulsion in Plantagenet days, and that in spite of the fact that Jews had settled in Britain before the Anglo-Saxon and Norman conquests, coming in the wake of the Roman armies as merchants, bankers, physicians, jewelers, etc.* A colony of Spanish Jews under the leadership of the learned Manasseh ben Israel came to England at the invitation of Oliver Cromwell. They hailed from Holland, whither their fathers had fled from the Spanish Inquisition, Holland being the only asylum in Europe at that time for men of an alien faith. It was reasonable then to insist on toleration and religious liberty.

*NOTE.—There is evidence that in spite of the rigid anti-Jewish immigration laws in force for several centuries, Italian Jews succeeded in getting into England under the guise of Lombards, and laid the foundation of England's financial prosperity. Hence Lombard Street, where the Bank of England is situated.

George Fox took the trouble to learn Hebrew in order to explain the Scripture prophecies concerning the Messiah in the original to these Jewish immigrants. Besides he wrote several tracts for their benefit in England. We have a thirty-six page booklet under date of 1656, entitled: "Visitation to the Jewes, from them whom the Lord hath visited from on high"; also an undated book with the heading: "Answer to the arguments of the Jewes in which they go about to prove that the Messiah is not come." It is a book of some fifty-two pages, but unfortunately the title-page is missing. Under date of 1661, he wrote: "A Declaration to the Jewes for them to read over, in which they may see that the Messiah is come." (Calvert was the early London publisher of Quaker productions, but this last was published by one White of the same city. Our copy is incomplete, only twelve pages are left to us.) Later on George Fox took up this work again; as late as 1674 he brought out a considerable book of seventy-eight pages entitled: "A Looking-glass for the Jewes: where they may clearly see that the Messiah is come." And to show that he was not alone in his concern for the homeless children of Abraham, the last sixteen pages of this book were written by George Whitehead and entitled: "For the Jewes who assemble in Bevers Marks, London." Bevers (now Beirs) Marks is the name of the oldest British synagogue, where Jews of the Sephardic (i. e., Spanish) branch still worship. It is of interest that it was built by a Quaker, who, to show his fellow-feeling, as a member of a despised sect, with a suffering people, refused to make any gain out of the undertaking, and the grateful congregation put up a tablet commemorating this fact.

And here it might be well to add that evidently George Fox's concern took hold on other Friends beside George Whitehead. Thus Margaret Fell evinced a spiritual and intelligent interest in the welfare of the Jewish colony. She is said to have become quite a proficient Hebrew scholar. Anyway, the Record Room contains several English books from her pen, written for Jews. One under date of 1656, comprising some twenty-one pages, bears the title: "For Manasseh ben Israel. The call of the Jewes out of Babylon." Another, but without date: "Loving salutation, To the seed of Abraham among the Jewes; where ever they are scattered." It contains thirty-seven pages. The Record Room, besides the above-mentioned by George Fox, George Whitehead and Margaret Fell, preserves also tracts written for the benefit of the Jewes by Isaac Penington. Thus under date of 1660, we have: "Some considerations propounded to the Jewes," and under 1663: "Some questions and answers of deep concernment to the Jewes," and again under 1677: "To the Jewes natural and to the Jewes spiritual." Were the labors of these concerned Friends a mere beating of the air, or did some Jewes respond to a truer and more gracious presentation of the Christian Faith than they had met with in Catholic Spain and in Calvinistic Holland? There is interesting work for a genealogist, which lies outside my proper sphere. But I might ask, where did the Abrahams and Jacobs among Friends get their decidedly Jewish surnames from?

THE BRETHREN AND MENNONITES FOR PEACE.

Some members of the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee have been in communication with a representative from the Brethren, Galen B. Royer and one from the Mennonites, J. J. Engbrecht, in regard to the right attitude to take in this perilous national crisis. Both denominations are opposed to war. They have had representatives at Washington who have strenuously endeavored to have the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs so changed "as to exempt non-resistant peoples from any form of military training." They are working in unison and are very anxious that Friends should cooperate.

The representative of the Brethren writes: "What will be the attitude of your organization on the point? (i. e. non-combatant service). Will you look upon quartermaster service, hospital or kitchen service as participating in the war and violating principles of our faith?" He adds: "Our brethren in Denmark viewed it as a part of war and accepted imprisonment instead." The Mennonite representative quotes from their official organ: "Binding up wounds, carrying helpless ones out of danger, helping innocent sufferers are Christ-like duties which should appeal to every able-bodied man among us. To respond to them well will do more toward bringing to the notice of the world (the reasonableness) of our testimony against war than all literature against war produced during the past one hundred years."

The strength of unity of action of all non-resistant denominations against this so-called "fight for freedom" is forcibly presented. "That word (freedom)," says Galen Royer, "sounds splendid. Stirs the best in human nature. I feel high regard for the ones who feel called to fight for freedom. But Paul in 1 Cor., second chapter, would term that all 'false wisdom.' It is of this world. It is based on a good end and says that any wrong way of getting the right is justified by the end. In what contrast it is with the heavenly wisdom that concerns itself not so much for the end as the way being right. Indeed, our Master so much saw the need of this heavenly view that He declares Himself as the Way and He did so when His disciples' hearts were troubled much like ours are to-day. The way is not one of end, save as the end is in Christ, but it is the step of faith, day by day. And so I tonic my heart each morning with the hope of keeping in the way."

In expressing gladness that there can be a spirit of unity between peace-loving Christians, Galen Royer continues: "It is Christ-like. How strongly He prayed 'That they may be one.' The war in Europe with all its awful ills is being blessed with good, for our Father can turn the wrath of men to his final glory when He chooses. The war is breaking down denominationalism and men of different folds are shaking hands with each other even if they are doing it over the slain bodies of their brothers. Shall we who love peace, be pledged to peace in addition to the demands our Lord makes upon all for peace, be slow in uniting our forces for peace? Whatever we may do to stem the tide of war that has swept our land like a mighty deluge, whatever we may do to save the members of our folds from participating in war, be this at least one fruitage of this crisis, that out of it we come closer together because through these trying times we stand hand in hand and bear each other's burden of stress and distress. And somehow, brethren, I have for a long time felt that many of us, if we counted our real differences and then recounted our similarities and set them down on the other side, perhaps we should be almost ashamed of ourselves that we have stayed apart so long. . . . Brethren, the whole realm of faith, good works, love and hope are common ground of the richest fruitage. Praise God for all this."

The response from J. J. Engbrecht is as cordial: "May God help us to serve Him and our dear country rightly and may we help to hasten a unison or oneness of His children."

Surely there is much in these letters with which Friends can gladly unite. There is abundant cause to be thankful for such whole-hearted and large-hearted champions of peace who labor in the spirit of the Master which teaches us both to love our enemies and to acknowledge the sincerity of motive of those who differ from us.

"REMEMBER PRISONERS!"

"Remember prisoners, as if you were in prison with them; and remember those suffering ill-treatment, for you yourselves also are still in the body. . . . Remember your former leaders—it was they who brought you God's message. . . . Jesus, in order by His own blood, to set the people free from sin, suffered outside the gate. Therefore let us go to Him outside the camp sharing the insults directed against Him. For we have no permanent city here, but we are longing for the city which is soon to be ours."

Rowntree Gillett read these words from Weymouth's translation of Hebrews xiii at a recent Quarterly Meeting at Devonshire House, and reminded us by name of some of our London members who are suffering imprisonment. The last few weeks have seen the arrest in various parts of England of a number of those to whom we have been accustomed to look for leadership, some who hold important posts in our Society, and who have been prominent in the Young Friends' Movement. It is like a page from a seventeenth century record to read of the clerk and assistant clerk of Warwickshire North Monthly Meeting—Hugh Gibbins and Wilfrid Littlebooy—being arrested at the same time and taken to the guard-room at Warwick. Here they joined Basil Burton, clerk to Hertford Preparative Meeting, and Arthur J. Sharp, the late editor of the Bombay Guardian, and son of Isaac Sharp.

Robert O. Menzell, Roderic K. Clark and Corder Catchpool have now been called to "the front." Their friends will rejoice with them that after all the splendid service they have done in the past, they have been given the honor of witnessing for their faith; no matter what the cost to themselves. Other stalwarts whose turn has come during the last month or so are Charles Knight, Richard Evans, Bernard Priestman, Theodore Pumphrey, H. Lyn Harris and Maurice Rowntree. These and many more have been called to go "outside the camp" with their Master, and "share the insults directed against Him." Actual brutality in guard-rooms is now of rare occurrence, but there is plenty of hardship arising from cold, sleeplessness, over-crowding, short commons, foul language, and insults, as well as the separation from those dear to them. Our friends take it all with the utmost cheerfulness, realizing that their lot in many respects is less hard than that of the men in the trenches. Many write of an abounding joy and sense of freedom such as they have never before known. It will be of interest to put on record the experiences of some of them, mostly in their own words.

Those who were present at the court-martial of Robert O. Menzell at Kingston—and there were more than twenty-five Friends—described it as a very wonderful time, "almost like a Friends' meeting." The officers concerned behaved with great consideration and restraint, and evidently felt a distaste for what they had to do. Robert Menzell wrote a short time before, "I can't tell you what inexpressible happiness I have known during the last few days here. I begin to feel that I know something of what those dear old early Quakers wrote about. Anyway it has been something more uplifting and glorious than words can convey." It may be mentioned that R. O. Menzell was taken handcuffed through the streets of Croydon on being handed over to the military.

G. A. Sutherland, who is serving his second sentence, a year's hard labor in Dublin, said at his court martial: "I have spent four months in prison, and I know that while you may order my body to be confined, you cannot confine my soul. . . . I count it an honor to-day to be allowed to take a part in the building of that city where there is neither English nor German, bond nor free, for all are one in Christ Jesus." An Irish Friend writing to Christine Sutherland said: "he did not look like a man who was to undergo hardships—there was the light of conquest in his face."

At Woodbrooke, while the students were at lunch, two military officers and three detectives appeared and cross questioned all the men present. Seven were arrested, among them Corder Catchpool who had been leading the "International" group of students. It will be remembered that he served for eighteen months during the strenuous early days of the Friends' Ambulance Unit, and was made Adjutant of the Unit, a post which he resigned in order to take up more definite Peace work at home. When brought before the magistrates he said: "I count no man on earth my enemy, because God is the Father of all men, and we are all brothers. The life and teaching of Jesus Christ gives me an unshakable faith in the redeeming power of love."

After a week-end in the cells at Birmingham, which he describes as a time of "unprecedented inspiration," the little group was moved from guard-room to guard-room all about the country, finally returning to Worcester for their court-martial. Their travels under the escort of a kindly but flustered old sergeant brought them into touch with large numbers of officers and men, and gave much opportunity for talks and for the exercise of unconquerable good-will. In one guard-room "a corporal, on hearing we were C. O.'s, took it upon himself to make extremely offensive remarks in foul language and a loud voice for the benefit of the whole room, ending by telling the company that the O. C. had ordered us to be ironed and put in the cells for the night—which, evidently, feeling he had not quite made the most of his opportunity, he immediately amended to 'chained out on the common all night,' which rather gave the show away. We felt rather sorry for him, and concluded that his remarks were probably being addressed, not to us, but to the rest of the room, which was full of conscripts. Immediately he had disappeared another came up quietly to our table, and began chatting in a most friendly way, very obviously meaning to be kind, and soothe the feelings he thought must have been hurt. He started on the weather, dear man, and ended in a stage whisper that we mustn't take any notice of what the other man said? We learned we were the first C. O.'s they had had at this depot." At another place, "where no C. O. had ever set foot before," they were interviewed by the Captain, "a kindly man of the country squire type, followed about everywhere by a fine dog. He said he did not know what on earth to do with us. 'Where do you chaps come from? What on earth did they want to bring you into the army for?' We told him we were students from a college in Birmingham, and again said we had no wish to cause trouble. 'Better have left you there. All I'm sorry for is to see such a fine lot of chaps as you in trouble.' We told him our prospective pathway through the Scrubs, at which he commented: 'I'd rather have a bullet in France than that!' Finally before he left us, he said: 'Now, boys, you've got a long wait. Do you smoke? Make yourselves comfortable.'" At another halting place "we had more opportunities of talk with Tommies. 'What unit are you drafted into?' 'We're C. O.'s.' 'Good luck to you. I've had nineteen months of it, and they'll never get me to enlist in another war.'" . . . At Worcester, they were kept for about a fortnight in an underground cellar, which they named the dug-out. Here "an N. C. O. and three men live, move and have their being with us, being changed every twenty-four hours. It might hurt one's feelings to be so suspect, if one did not know that by the men themselves we are not the least bit suspect. They are constantly apologizing for the old machine which alone actuates their movements. We have had wonderful experiences with our guards. They come in frigid and a trifle suspicious, and leave in twenty-four hours, the very best of friends. Incurable good-will, songs, recitations, etc., have done their work. The C. O. attitude appears perfectly natural to them—in their own way many of them even understand it. Foul-mouthed as practically everyone in the army is, they have as kind hearts at bottom as you could wish. Each evening we have asked the corporal, 'Have you any objection to our having a little meeting?' 'Do just whatever you like.' And as we read a few verses, sang a hymn or two, and had some words of prayer, the foul talk stopped, absolute quiet reigned, and the soldiers' heads were bowed. . . . My conviction of the basic kindness of human nature has been happily strengthened by acquaintance with soldiers inside the barracks at home, just as it was by contact with them outside at the front. It is comforting to go to prison with this confirmation; for my hopes depend on it. . . . I got hold of a Daily News, and at the spectacle of two of the greatest and most civilized nations of the world straining every nerve to starve tens of millions of each others' women and children, and blow to pieces a great proportion of each others' manhood, I was not dissatisfied to be a prisoner for my faith, though for it I have as yet suffered hardly even discomfort. Women revile a little sometimes as we go through the streets, and if there be any ordeal in our position it is outside the army, not inside. 'There's not one in a thousand has the courage to stand by his conscience,' said a soldier to me yesterday. I have food for thought when I contrast this attitude of the men themselves with civilians I have met, men and women who have thrown themselves into a passion of rage when I have handed them a picture of Christ on the cross, with the words 'In Christ's name—Peace,—and torn it up under my eyes.

"The Scrubs is still ahead, an unknown quantity, and if the war lasts long (which God forbid, for others' sakes) the trial may be very severe. But I face the future with a glad calm and peace of mind, with a great confidence that there is a better way of adjusting what is wrong with the world."

On a dark and snowy evening, a number of Friends were able to meet the ten prisoners from Worcester, and spend a quiet half-hour with them in a tea-shop at Paddington, before they were marched away through the snow to Wormwood Scrubs.

Richard Evans of Pontefract, who was one of the "International" group at Woodbrooke last term writes, "On the fifth of [First Month] my sentence was read out—two years hard labor, and I expect to serve the same at Wormwood Scrubs. I can't say that I am hilariously happy at the prospect, but . . . I am content to be in the suffering ranks of our army of peace, if no longer in the fighting ranks. And I hope the experience will strengthen me, and make me less of a coward than I have been. I felt deep down that I should go through, but I was very fearful of many things."

The following extracts are taken from a letter to his wife written by Stephen Hobhouse in Wormwood Scrubs. "On the 8th I went before the Central Tribunal. I said, 'I can't take work imposed under a Conscription Act.' They said, 'That will save us trouble, you have had time to think it over.' All over in half a minute. . . . We absolutists must be prepared for prison or guard-room until the end of the war is in sight, it seems. Well, God will sustain us, and you too outside. . . . Christmas Day was like every other day here except that we had no chapels and no work, but it was very nice to be allowed to have for twenty-four hours your card and the one sent by the Emergency Committee to the other prisoners. . . . Looking back, I feel sure that God has brought me here, past all the loopholes of escape, which seemed too large last summer, for a great purpose, that He may carry further for me our life ambition to be bond servants for Christ and humanity, bond servants for Love's sake, that we may help Christ to break the bonds. As I rather expected, being cut off from the signs of war, I have not had laid much upon me the special burdens of militarism—that I can feel outside, and I don't think much is lost. It is rather of the industrial bondage of our normal city poverty that God has, through the conditions here, given me a keen sense. I have experienced something at any rate of the bitterness of that poverty which borders on destitution in a way which it would be difficult for a man such as I am to do outside prison. We have had many glimpses, have we not? into the toiling misery of many of our neighbors. Into the weary sorrow of such lives I feel I have entered just a little. Sometimes when I feel tired and ill, I long for some little homely comfort such as a glass of hot water, or some tea and dry toast, but I know it is impossible. . . . (here a bracketed portion is censored heavily, the only words that can be made out are "salt and dry bread" "breakfast and supper") "and I can share in the privations of others far braver than I am by saying to myself, 'No, you must keep that last penny for gas to cook the children's porridge, and manage with that or nothing at all.' And I do manage with it, cheerfully, God helping me. Especially the first week or two it was very bitter, there seemed no love anywhere. (I have found some since) and I felt cruelly the restrictions of what seemed the most elementary needs. I did not think my body with its weak points would stand it for long, but, praise God, He has sustained it beyond expectation, though the struggle is often intense. . . . There is really no need for self-pity; we are far better off here than many of our fellow-citizens. Food and shelter are assured, our sheets do not find their way out of dire need to the pawn shop; we have clean rooms, quiet surroundings, and pure air. . . . I do not mind the silence, as many here clearly do. But then I have been taught something of prayer and of the companionship of Christ. So that as yet you have only half of the picture; the other half of my life is full to overflowing with joy and thankfulness. Without exaggeration I can say that I cannot remember ever having enjoyed meals so much as I have enjoyed some of mine here when I am feeling fairly well. And things like the weekly bath or change of laundry make one so happy! Prison life has its own special temptations—to selfish introspection and the like, but I believe I am being given grace to guard against them, and I could calmly face the possibility of many years of this life, in faith that they would bring increase of mind control, in love and nearness to God. I can understand a little how saints can train themselves to a life of silence, fasting and prayer. . . . Though I shall rejoice to get back again into the active world.”

An attender who had served 112 days, wrote while awaiting his second sentence: “We have reformed the guard-room branch of the N. C. F., and had two really good meetings. . . . I believe every man took part in the discussion, and it augurs well for our cause that the fires of enthusiasm are burning hotter than ever in the hearts of the men who have already suffered imprisonment for their conscience. . . . Physically, I believe my incarceration has been a blessing in disguise. Spiritually, I know that the rest from the cares and strife of the outer world has brought me, in the silence, to realize a little more of the ever-present Christ and the unity of the universe in God. I have not found it necessary to fill time with reading. It was such a joy to find in the silence that peace in which all doubts and fears and conflicts were stilled. Believe me, I look forward with joy to a return to prison. . . . From the youngest to the oldest, our men seem determined to see this struggle through to its proper conclusion. Liberty is with us a passion, but it must be a liberty not of the body only, but spirit, soul and body, which are His.”—E. F. H., in Friends' Fellowship Papers.

THE EASTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The following information has been gleaned from a report by a reliable visitor among these Indians who live on the Eastern Cherokee Reservation, which is situated in the mountain region of western North Carolina. The Agency headquarters are located about sixty miles west of Asheville, at Cherokee, the terminus of the Appalachian Railway.

These Indians are the descendants of those who refused to leave North Carolina when the United States Government moved the tribe to Oklahoma. There are located on this reservation 1205 males, 1055 females; of these 1207 are minors, 1348 are full-bloods, 365 half-breeds and 547 are less than half-bloods.

These Cherokees have attained a high degree of civilization. As a rule they are self-respecting, “courteous, intelligent and industrious.” They mostly speak English and none dress after the Indian mode. The children are “well-nourished, bright, active and friendly.”

The Reservation contains 63,211 acres. Of this 20,000 acres are available for agricultural purposes and 5500 acres are now under cultivation. Less than 8000 acres, experts say, can be farmed with modern implements. The country is rough, much of it is steep hillside and plowing is very difficult. Cultivation is done with the hoe. Yet the best Indian farmers claim that they can raise corn of as good quality and at as small expense as they can in the naturally more fertile valleys. They have a kind of corn that is said to be grown by no one except the Cherokees of North Carolina and Oklahoma. It is white and soft and when ground makes a fine flour which is called corn flour. Of the 536 able-bodied males, 350 or 65 per cent. are farmers and of these 450 raise stock. White corn is the staple crop, wheat is also grown. As the Reservation is situated in a region with a pleasant winter climate, the products of their orchard, garden and poultry yards find a ready sale at the hotels and cottages frequented by visitors.

The last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shows that there are on the Reservation 861 children eligible and 14 ineligible for schools. Of this number 253 are in the Reservation boarding school, 105 are in the four day schools on the Reservation. About 200 children of the so-called “White Indians” attend the white public schools, although the law of the State prohibits that privilege to Indians. There are no mission or contract schools on the Reservation and it appears that there are 200 children for whom no school facilities have been provided. As the country is rough, the roads poor and many Indians live in mountain caves or rather inaccessible valleys, the enlargement of the Reservation boarding school would best meet the educational need.

The Reservation Superintendent says: “Few of these Cherokees are really lazy and worthless. They are not, however, progressive and are content, many times, to raise barley enough to live on. Our strong efforts have been directed to get them out of this state of lethargy.” Among the “130 returning students,” he continues, “are found the most progressive Indians on the Reservation, nine of them are employed at the Cherokee Boarding School and are for the most part earnest, faithful workers. While a few of the returned students are worthless, the majority are good citizens. Many times the appearance of these people gives no evidence of their training, but the vision they have had of the world outside has brought something to their lives which cannot be lost.” This is “shown most clearly in their children and in the attitude of their children. In the past two years these returned students have helped me greatly in my work on the Reservation. They have stood by me in the organization of farmers’ clubs, in the holding of Indian Fairs and in my efforts to improve home conditions.”

While some of the Eastern Cherokees live in frame houses, they mostly have log cabins, some of which have no windows and but one door. Although rough on the exterior, the dwellings are often neat and comfortable within. These Indians are highly respected by their white neighbors and are as law-abiding as they. The Superintendent reports that he has little trouble in keeping order among them, their morals are good and those who are guilty of misconduct are brought into the State courts. There are ten places of worship on the Reservation, nine Baptist and one Methodist. All of the ministers are Indians. For more than twenty years there have been no white missionaries. North Carolina is a prohibition state and the local law prohibits the delivery of intoxicating liquors into the county (Swain).

These Cherokees are recognized citizens of North Carolina. They can vote, but few manifest interest in public matters. They pay taxes and are subject to the laws of the State and in many ways they are reported as superior to their white mountain neighbors. There is close similarity between the Eastern Cherokees and the New York Indians, because in New York and in North Carolina the Federal and State Governments claim jurisdiction on the Reservation, yet neither government seems to want to exercise its claims.

The land is owned in fee by a corporation of these Cherokees. The Government does not own the land or hold it in trust for the Indians but exercises practically the same jurisdiction it does over Reservations where the land is owned or held in trust by the Government. “The individual moneys of the members of the tribe are handled by the Superintendent and the tribal fund is deposited in banks, where it can be checked out only on his signature.” The Indians live “on their lands as tenants in common,” the title is in the Indian corporation. “Each tribe member may sell to another tribe member only the improvements he owns on any particular tract of tribal land.” A tribe member owns his land while he lives on it or makes some improvement on it. “There is a strong agitation for bringing about some arrangement to allot the land so each Indian will get his title in fee, actually own his land, free from tribal or governmental control or supervision. While the Cherokees are anxious to have their land allotted they wish to have that result accomplished with as little connection with the Government as possible."

HAMMER AND ANVIL.

"Hammer away, ye hostile hands;
Your hammers break, God's anvil stands."

Look forth and tell me what they do
On Life's broad field. Oh still they fight
The False forever with the True,
The Wrong forever with the Right.
And still God's faithful ones, as men
Who hold a fortress strong and high,
Cry out in confidence again,
And find a comfort in the cry:
"Hammer away, ye hostile hands,
Your hammers break, God's anvil stands."

Older than pyramid or sphinx,
Old as the stars themselves, the road
Whereby, when other courage sinks
The courage born of Heaven is stirred.
For, when God made the world, and knew
That good and evil could not blend,
He planned, however men might do,
What should be, would be in the end.
And though as thick as ocean sands
They rain their blows, the anvil stands

Oh, many a time has this vain world
Essayed to thwart the mighty plun;
Its fleets and armies have been hurled
Against the common rights of man.
But wrecked Armadas, Waterloos,
Empires abandoned to decay,
Proclaim the truth they did not choose—
What broken hammers strew the way!
Though all the world together hands,
To smite it, still the anvil stands.

Thou knowest that thy cause is just?
Then rest in that; thy cause is sure.
Thy word is true? Oh, then it must,
In spite of slanderous tongues, endure.
As toward the crag the billow rides,
Then falls back shattered to its place,
As fags the breeze the mountain sides,
Nor fans the mountain from its base,—
So in all times, and in all lands,
Men's hammers break, God's anvil stands.

A CHINESE SAINT.

The most encouraging aspect of Gospel work in China is the splendid type of Christian continually to be met with among the converts. The following sketch of Siao Chikshan, an evangelist at Mei-hien-hu, an out-station of Chang-teh, in the province of Hu-nan, who passed away ten years ago, is abridged from an account kindly sent us by the China Inland Mission for insertion in THE FRIEND.

The grace of God was marvelously exhibited in this man; a more saintly character it would be difficult to find in China. His quest after truth spread over a generation. When comparatively a young man, the intolerable craving for heart-rest compelled him to forsake his home and wife, and children. In bidding farewell to all he held dear, his little boy clung to his gown, pathetically calling, "Daddy, stay! Daddy, stay!" He had reserved a small ingot of silver to help him on his unknown path, but overcome by his feelings he gave it to the child and told him to run in and give it to his mother; then alone and empty-handed he set forth, not knowing whither he went.

Years of hardship, disappointment, and suffering lay before him. He went on a pilgrimage to a far-famed Taoist resort, but was greatly shocked at the avariciousness of the priests of Tao. Money seemed all they cared about. He tried to think it was zeal for their gods which made them act so, and finding that a casual attendance at the shrine brought him no relief he renounced the world and was received into the brotherhood. Luther's disappointment amongst the monks was not more bitter than Siao's amongst the Taoists; they stood revealed in their true colors: avaricious, earthly, sensual, devilish. To get away was his sole desire, and we next find him nearly a thousand miles away in a sequestered spot on the summit of the Sun Mountains, twelve miles from Chang-teh, in a Taoist temple there. The solitude of the hills calmed his tried spirit and hope revived. He practiced the most strenuous austerities with regard to food and dress, often living in a cave, or kneeling all night under the great bell to blend his prayers with the minute toll.

It was here that the first gleam of light was brought to this seeking soul. Some missionaries came to the hills to look for a cool resort, among them one of Hu-nan's martyrs for the faith, Bruce of the China Inland Mission. Making a halt at the temple, he talked to Siao, the priest, on spiritual things, and gave him a gospel. But the great change did not come till one day a paper-collector brought a basket of paper to be burnt ceremonially on the altar. Sorting it, the priest came on a mutilated New Testament, for which he gave the man eight cash, about a farthing. His interest was so roused that he read it all night, and in the morning presented the astonished paper-collector with twenty-five cash more, saying, "Last night I did not know what the book was, but now I perceive it is Heaven's Book, and I give you twenty-five cash more to make up the thirty-three, which is in our religion the symbolic number of Perfect Heaven." Then he exclaimed: "The thirty-third Heaven is opened." This exclamation seems indeed to have been the birth-cry of a soul into the Kingdom of Heaven, leading him, after four decades of his life in darkness, into a last decade of the greatest devotion and sanctity. Thus did it please God to satisfy the longings He had Himself created.

For a time Siao continued to live at the temple, but used to hurry down the mountain to attend one Christian service after another in the city. Now came the great test. Plainly if he was to be a true follower of Jesus, he must renounce his present calling, for "what communion hath light with darkness?" and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols?"

He dreaded leaving the brotherhood and being cast adrift, but believing he must, at all costs, cut away from his old life, he put away all the symbols of his profession, and donned an ordinary costume. His trust was in God, and God graciously provided friends who ministered to the needs of their new comrade. He never after forgot their generosity and would take a garment off his own back to supply a poorer brother.

Early in 1902 Siao was made door-keeper at Chang-teh. His growth in the Divine life was marvelous; he lived in an atmosphere of prayer and praise and acquired a remarkable knowledge of the Bible. He did the work of an evangelist at least two years before he was set apart for that office in 1905 and sent to one of the out-stations. There he most faithfully performed his work, preaching, teaching, visiting, comforting, advising. Old and young alike looked upon him as a friend. He would take your hands and press them in his own, and his countenance would be radiant with smiles of greeting, as, brimming over with joy, he would tell of the souls he had been helping into the Kingdom. Night and day he labored in prayer for the little flock committed to his charge.

In the court-yard of his out-station grew a solitary peach-tree. As the fruit began to get ripe, little presents of peaches would find their way to the houses of several Church members, and when the whole tree was blushing with the luscious fruit he sent round invitations to the "household of Faith" to a "peach" worship. This, he explained to the missionary, was a tempting device to call the flock to praise and prayer to the beneficent Giver for all His care and love, and afterwards he regaled them with peaches in syrup.

His mind ever seemed on heavenly things, and Christ was ever his most intimate companion. Though he had set times of devotion, there was never a conscious hour of his whole five years of Christian experience without its ejaculations of prayer and praise or silent moments of communion. One snowy morning, when the wind was whistling through the rickety old building that served as an out-station, the missionary, who was sleeping there, heard him get up and dress. Praise was of course the first thing on his lips: "Lord! how kind Thou art; look at this fine-sheep-skin gown I have, how cheap it was, and how warm I am. Oh! I praise Thee, I adore Thy great unmerited grace."

Everybody loved Evangelist Siao, and he held a unique position in the estimation of the whole Church. When he was taken ill he was brought to the hospital at Chang-teh, where he endeared himself to all. It being apparent that he had not long to live, he expressed a wish to die in the C. I. M. Compound and was removed there, where he lingered for about two days in perfect consciousness and peace. "Jesus is with me; my heart is extraordinarily peaceful," he said amid his great sufferings, and when easier would pour forth beautiful passages of Scripture. "God is my God and I am His son, and I have eternal life. My name is written in the Lamb's Book of Life. I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever; yes! forever." The promises never seemed more beautiful than when being thus quoted on the Borderland.

FROM A LETTER FROM MARGARET HALLOWELL RIGGS, DATED SECOND MONTH 11, 1917.

ON THE YELLOW SEA, near Shanghai,

S. S. Venezuela.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S AUXILIARY:—

My Dear Friends.—To tell you of a most enjoyable visit I had with our dear friend Esther Balderston at the Friends' Mission in Tokio, I am sending this.

I had never had the good fortune to meet Esther Balderston before, so it did not occur to me to let her know I was coming, though I hoped to be able to go over to the Mission. It was so good of some one of you to write her of my arrival.

When the ship got to Yokohama harbor I found waiting for me a most cordial letter, and on the dock Esther herself. I knew her at once from her description and also because she looked just as I hoped she would—radiant with health and the joy of service in her face.

After a short stay in Yokohama meeting some other missionary friends of hers from the Russia, we went over to Tokio. I was, you can well imagine, fascinated with the narrow streets, the gay signs, and especially the people, about whom Esther knew so much. She speaks Japanese fluently and it was wonderful to me to listen to her.

We had a most enjoyable time taking dinner at Horace Coleman's and breakfast with G. and M. P. Bowles. It was good to meet so many of those who are working at the Mission, and I truly feel the group is a very strong one, ably meeting all the problems and difficulties of the work in Japan.

The Mission itself is most interesting. I had heard of course much of it at home, but was in no way fully prepared for its size and splendid work.

The meeting-house and fine school building, the dormitories, the domestic science building, the Bowles' home, the main teachers' house, the playground, etc., are all admirably planned and built and are very impressive.

I was sorry not to be able to see the school in session or to see any of the work of Gilbert Bowles or Herbert Nicholson with the boys, but I did see some of the girls in Alice Lewis' room and I liked them immensely. They have fine, intelligent faces and make you feel that work with them is so much worth while. One of the girls especially had a happy face, and I learned later from Esther that she had only a few days before become a Christian.

Japan and China stand to-day as the man stood in Paul's vision and said: "Come over into Macedonia and help us."

Truly the Friends' Mission there at Tokio is answering the call and is worthy of our deep interest, support and earnest prayers.

DOCTOR HODGKIN'S MIRROR.

Do you remember long years ago when we were not such proper children as we are now, how we loved to catch a sun-beam in a tiny round mirror (which had been sent as an advertisement) and send it dancing across the room into some unsuspecting face? And after all, what a marvelous performance it was to light up some distant object by reflecting these light-waves upon it!

Last year Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin carried back to London Yearly Meeting a whole treasure house of large and stimulating experience from his American trip. He had spent several weeks in this country closely scheduled with lectures and meetings, in the pursuance of his commission, on behalf of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. But in the midst of his report he turned his mirror upon this little school far away in Ohio, while London Yearly Meeting listened.

He spoke of his visit to this school being perhaps his most striking experience among Friends. In the quiet of this place he had been "conscious that there was a very deep spiritual influence at work." He left the meeting with "the heartfelt desire that these Friends might have their influence extended."

Such a guest as Dr. Hodgkin throws new light upon our situation. While his mirror is upon us, let us see what it reveals. Two points stand out: the deep spiritual contact, and the hope for the broad human contact.

Perhaps there isn't one of us who doesn't wish profoundly at times to make his life count toward the real progress of the world. There are two steps: first, to be connected with the reservoir of power Himself; secondly, to be connected with the need of the world.

Imagine a reservoir of pure cold water far up in a cleft of the mountains and fed by everlasting springs. Away down in the valley lives a people dying of typhoid and malaria, and thirsting for the higher things. One day some inspired mechanic discovers the reservoir and, knowing well the need of his people, lays pipes to connect the city with the living waters of the mountains.

You are conscious of a desperate need in your own life, or in the lives of those around you. Already, perhaps, your consciousness of need is growing to include people beyond your immediate circle, to spare the suffering of the martyrs of the faith, now in prison, of the heroes of relief near the battlefields; of the stricken families of Europe; of the fighting soldiers; of the struggles toward light in Asia and Africa and South America, and our own "enlightened" United States.

The weight of this universal need is enough to shatter a superficial optimism. One is almost tempted to throw down the gauntlet in despair, or to grow indifferent and shut one's eyes to the misery of fact. When lo! one day, alone, wandering in the mountains, the light flashes back from the surface of the lake. Here at the source, power and purity and love; there, hate and hunger, love unsatisfied, the Divine in chains! Having discovered this unexhausted source, could we do less than ask to become a channel through which the power might flow?

The spiritual contact and the grip of the world situation—these from Dr. Hodgkin's mirror.—EDITH STRATTON, in the Olney Current. (Barnesville School, Ohio.)

EMERGENCY SERVICE COMMITTEE.

At a time of universal suffering and sacrifice like the present, many Friends feel a deeper call than ever before to service for their fellow-countrymen and for humanity. In response to this feeling, the Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting has appointed an Emergency Service Committee to investigate and make practical plans for all forms of emergency service. The direction of agricultural work to increase the food supply has already been entrusted to William H. Richie, who will organize young men and boys wishing to undertake such service. Efforts have been made to get in touch both with the young men and the farmers; and definite plans are now being made.

The following possible lines of work have been suggested:

1. Trucking and farming for men under organized direction. Some community camps and houses may be established.
2. Co-operating with the Y. M. C. A. farm camps in supplying them with leaders and possibly doing the same for the Vacant Lots Cultivation Association.

3. Co-operating with Westtown authorities in work which may be started there.

Organization of the young women will be carried on through the office at 304 Arch Street under the direction of the Secretary, Anne G. Walton. This work, having been undertaken even more recently than that for the young men, is still in a very elementary state. The following lines of work have, however, been tentatively suggested:

1. Sewing and knitting.
2. District visiting and various forms of social service to supply places of workers on war service.
3. Teaching English to foreigners.
4. Instruction in canning.

In addition to the possible forms of Emergency Service outlined above, our committee hopes to co-operate with the various forms of work under the charge of English Friends. An urgent letter of appeal from the War Victims' Relief Committee has been received, asking for money, volunteer workers and contributions of clothing. Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have been sending money and clothing for some time, and much praise for earnest work done should be given those communities who have so contributed. The continuance of the war calls, however, for even greater efforts on our part. The resources of English Friends are becoming exhausted and destitution is increasing. The Emergency Service Committee, co-operating wherever possible with existing local organizations, hopes to co-ordinate and strengthen our work for English Friends as a Yearly Meeting. The movement, however, has gone beyond the limits of Philadelphia and become national in scope. A committee of fifteen persons representing all American Friends has been appointed which expects to establish a central office in Philadelphia and to act as a clearing-house to enable Friends to work harmoniously. If American workers are to be sent out to help rebuild and develop the desolated districts of France and Russia, it will be necessary for a responsible central committee to pass on the merits of applicants and to supply adequate funds for the maintenance of volunteers sent from this country.

Secretary.

A BASKET Picnic and Supper of the "Council of Westtown Mothers," has been arranged at the school for Seventh-day, Fifth Month 19th. Parents of all children now at the school, and of those children who expect to attend next year, are cordially invited. All those expecting to attend will kindly notify Charles W. Palmer, Westtown School, in advance, stating the number in their party, and which train they would like to have met; also please send a list of the scholars they wish to have as their guests at supper.

Trains leave Philadelphia, Broad Street, at 2.48 and 3.35 p. m. Returning leave Westtown at 6.50 and 9.37 p. m.

BENJAMIN S. DECOU has a minute of Chester Monthly Meeting to hold the meetings of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, and to hold appointed meetings in meeting-houses and in homes as Truth may direct.

THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—The annual meeting of the Society will be held on the 14th, at 8 o'clock, p. m. Albert Cook Myers will speak on "Some Researches and Experiences in Preparing an Edition of the Complete Works of William Penn." (Illustrated with about 100 lantern slides.) Friends are invited to be present.

BIRD LECTURES AT FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.—A cordial invitation is extended to all interested to hear F. Schuyler Mathews, of Cambridge, Mass., lecture on "Wild Birds and Their Music."

A lecture especially for children will be given on Fifth-day afternoon, the 17th inst., at 12.45, and another lecture on the same general subject under the auspices of the Alumni Association on Sixth-day evening, the 18th inst., at eight o'clock.

F. Schuyler Mathews is well known as an artist and naturalist and as the author of a number of popular and valuable books, including the "Field Book of American Wild Flowers," and a "Field Book of Wild Birds and Their Music."

A BIBLE brought across the ocean with William Penn on the Welcome has recently been deposited with the Bucks County Historical Society. The book belonged to William Hayhurst, and has been given by his great-great-great-granddaughter, Margaret Wiggins.

FROM Fourth Month 23rd to 28th a "Peace School" was held at Twelfth Street Meeting-house in Philadelphia. Classes were held and lectures given three times a day, as before noted in THE FRIEND. At the closing meeting it was announced that the aggregate attendance had been over one thousand, many of them not Friends. There was a deep interest felt, and if it had been possible to advertise the school more widely, the attendance would no doubt have been much larger; but there was little if any report of it in the newspapers, which seem to have adopted a policy of silence regarding news of such movements.

The object of the school was to enable believers in pacifism to clearly define their views, to understand the moral, economic, and religious grounds on which they were based, and to study methods of presenting these views publicly. As is generally recognized, one of the chief grounds for opposition to the pacifist is that his real function as a peacemaker is not understood. Henry J. Cadbury's clear definition should do much to gain the favor of the non-pacifist. "A pacifist is one who wishes to serve his country by peace. A pacifist is a peacemaker. The Latin verb facio is what puts the fist in pacifist."

THE Board of Trustees of Oakwood Seminary, at Union Springs, in New York Yearly Meeting, have decided to move the school to the vicinity of Poughkeepsie, New York, and to proceed at once to raise the sum of $150,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection and equipment of new buildings.

In the Indiana oratorical peace contest, participated in by thirteen educational institutions of the State, Marianna Dickinson, of Earlam, won first place, with her oration, "The Enemy of the Race." She is the Bryn Mawr scholar-elect. Of the nine peace contests that have been held, Earlam has won five.

BIBLICAL WORK IN COLLEGES.—At a meeting of the National Religious Education Association, held in Boston early in Third Month, the colleges of the United States were classified with reference to their Biblical work. The basis on which this classification was made was, first, the equipment of the Biblical department which included the number and character of books in the college library which relate to Biblical subjects; the further equipment in the way of maps, charts, etc. Second, the course of study with respect to the amount of work offered and the character of the work given. Third, the teaching force—the preparation of the professors and the amount of time devoted to distinctively Biblical subjects.

The institutions were graded by letters—A, B, C, D' and E. As a result of this standardizing work of the National Religious Education Association it was found that only sixty-four colleges are eligible to be placed in Class A, thirty in B, seventy-four in C, forty-four in D and twenty-six in E, where no Bible work at all was offered.

A study of the sixty-four institutions placed in Class A shows that the following Friends' Colleges are in this division: Bryn Mawr, Haverford, Earlham, Penn., Wilmington.

DR. EDWARD TOBEY TUCKER, prominent for a great many years as a physician and as a leading Friend of New Bedford, Massachusetts, died Fourth Month 10, at the age of sixty-seven years. Aside from important offices he had held in the meeting, he was active in many kinds of philanthropic and educational work and was closely associated with the historical interests of his State.

DR. ERASTUS TEST, oldest living Earlham graduate and known as the "grand old man" of Purdue University, died at his home at Lafayette, Indiana, Fourth Month 21, at the age of eighty-one years. Though for many years he had been connected with Purdue, in earlier life he was prominent in Friends' education, having been a member of the Earlham faculty and one of the founders of Central Academy, Plainfield, Indiana.

WM. C. BRAITHWAITE, author of "The Beginnings of Quakerism" and of other works pertaining to the Quaker message, has been elected the first president of the National Adult School Union of England.

The twentieth of this month has been designated as Peace Day by the Peace Association of Friends in America.

THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.—The annual meeting of this committee is called for 2 P. M. on Third Day, the 15th of Fifth Month, with its sessions to continue during the 16th at Friends' Institute, No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. Delegates from the several Yearly Meetings are requested to be in attendance and to kindly announce to the Clerk their expected arrival, or if of necessity, their inability to attend.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The Independent has this comment: With a readiness that surprised every one opposed to compulsory military service and nearly everyone in favor of it, Congress agreed to President Wilson's military recommendations. The vote in the Senate was a foregone conclusion, but the collapse of the opposition to the administration program in the House of Representatives was quite unexpected.

The University of Pennsylvania is planning to furnish students for work in the harvest fields of the West and on farms in this section during the summer months. The details are being worked out by Dr. J. Russell Smith, professor of industry in the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, under the direction of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Religious meetings of many kinds will be interfered with this summer because of the war. The Christian Endeavor Convention, in which thousands are interested, and which was set for New York City Seventh Month 4-9, has been abandoned by action of both the United Society and the New York committee. In England last year almost all of the summer conferences were given up, the famous Keswick among them, and this summer all are called off.

The spot price for wheat No. 2 red was $3.04 a bushel one day last week. This is a new high record for modern times, and surpasses the high mark established shortly after the Civil War. The record of that period was $2.85 in 1867. During the Civil War itself, wheat sold as high as $2.26 in 1864.

Peter Cooper, who established Cooper Union in New York City in 1854, was probably reaching further into the future than he realized; and when Charles Sprague-Smith held the first Forum meeting in 1897—a beginning in applied democracy was made which was to gain momentum until, to-day, over two hundred Open Forums throughout the United States and Canada are in active existence, with prospects of a national movement of unrealized scope and influence.

Forty thousand words, New York's usual daily cable quota, passed Commander Arthur Bainbridge Hoff and his staff of naval censors without a single deletion in the first day's working of the cable censorship. Several oddly worded messages were held up for a short time, but were sent on their way promptly when the senders rephrased them.

The constructive work of the Women's Peace Party in Boston is reported as follows: A call has been sent to all members of the Massachusetts Branch for volunteer service in civilian relief. Supervised groups are at work every day at headquarters, 421 Boylston Street, from 9.30 to 1. Conservation of life will be the first duty of the society and for this reason it is specially interested in the District Nursing Association, whose attention is largely given to maternity cases and the care of little children.

FOREIGN.—Influential Jews are urging that it would be a logical step for the United States to issue a pronouncement in favor of an independent republic of Palestine.

Nineteen articles of food, selected as typical of the most general use by consumers, have advanced in price, according to the London Statist, 118 per cent. since the war began.

Reports of an investigation conducted by the Department of Agriculture at Paris indicate that the forthcoming crops will be much less satisfactory than last year. Insufficient preparation of the soil, lack of fertilizer and unusually heavy rains are named as contributory factors.

American relief work for Armenians and Syrians in Turkey will continue notwithstanding the severance of diplomatic relations with that country, according to a statement given out at Boston by Dr. James L. Barton, Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Although communications may be hindered for a time, says the statement, "we think there will be funds in Turkey to carry on the relief work for some weeks."

Following the break between Turkey and the United States comes the report from Constantinople that Roberts College founded, supported and chiefly taught by Americans, must be closed, together with its Bible House, headquarters for American missions in Turkey and the Balkans

NOTICES.

A MEETING for Divine Worship is appointed to be held at Friends' Old Meeting-house, Greenwich, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Fifth Month 27, 1917, at 3.30 P. M. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

By order of a Committee appointed by Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting.

FRIENDS' EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION will hold its annual meeting Seventh-day, Fifth Month 12, 1917, at Haverford College, afternoon and evening. General subject, "Our Schools, the Present Conditions and the Outlook in the Future."

MEETINGS from Fifth Month 13th to 19th:

Concord Quarterly Meeting, at Media, Third-day, Fifth Month 15th, at 10.30 A. M.

Caln Quarterly Meeting, at Coatesville, Sixth-day, Fifth Month 18th, at 10 A. M.

Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, Western District, Twelfth Street, below Market, Fourth-day, Fifth Month 16th, at 5 P. M. Business session at 7 P. M.

THE ONLY WAY.

A Treaty torn to shreds by Tyrant hand—
Murder and outrage, fire and crime and sword
A people driven from their Fatherland—
A nation ruined at a Monarch's word;
What could we do? Was England, free and great,
To leave the weak and helpless to their fate?

What could we do? At once the answer sped
Throughout our land as the devouring flame
Roars through the forest—windswept, fierce and red;
From North and South the cry for vengeance came;
"England to arms! there is no other way
Such foes to face, or such wrongs to repay!"

No other way? And yet to-day we see
Where that way leads—the wide world drenched in blood—
Great nations ruined—England, once so free,
Forging the chains of her own servitude,
And, rising from the heart of friend and foe
A wail of deep unutterable woe.

No other way? One way was still untrod,
A way no nation yet has dared to tread,
The way He trod, alone, with wounded side,
With nail-pierced hands and feet and thorn-crowned head;
Who, for His children, lost in sin and strife
Offered Himself and died to give them life.

O England, once more thou hast fully poured
Thy wealth and blood before His Throne above,
And once again with thy avenging sword
Essayed to follow in Christ's Way of Love—
And once more thou hast found, alas, too late,
That War's wild music changes Love to Hate.

The past is dark, the present black as night—
Thine is the future—Thine to mar or make.
The world is longing for the morning light,
Watching and waiting for the dawn to break.
Lo, o'er thy hills the sun of Peace may rise
To chase the night forever from the skies.

Disarm, O England! strong in His great Name,
Who stilled the storm and bade the tempest cease:
Thou, who art risking all in war's sad game,
Dare now to stake thy life for Christ and Peace.
The world will follow joyfully thy lead,
And unborn peoples hail thee great indeed.

OSWALD CLARK.

(Written in Wornwood Scrubs Prison, 1917.)

WHAT SHALL WE DO?

The writer knows of brave men and women in this country who have recently been misunderstood, condemned, abused, insulted, because of their adherence to the principles of peace. Most of them are not Friends.

Will members of the Society of Friends who have a heritage of peace, who love the Prince of Peace, who know the awful agony of the world, who see human needs, now go back on their splendid traditions, forsake a crucified world, falter, now play the coward?

If George Fox, William Penn or their contemporaries, had yielded to specious expediency or compromise how momentous would have been the loss to their successors and the world. Are we living in a time wherein to display negative attributes? When has Christ's cause won victories through surrendering to a spirit of expediency or compromise?

Do we understand the magnificence of our trusteeship for God? Shall we not loyally administer it for humanity and the crucified One?

It will be better for us, for human liberty, for the glorious Christ and His Kingdom if, because of dislike of us, our schools and colleges be temporarily closed, our business affairs upset, our homes invaded by illegal procedure and our bodies imprisoned, rather than that we weakly yield to the excitement and intolerance of the moment, or forsake fundamentals that were precious in the halcyon days of peace.

Loss of principle, apology for the Christ-reproved use of the sword, failure to confess our profession, profits in munition stocks, easy complacency with the demands of the hour, will induce the outward approbation and silent contempt of the world and will involve losses that can never be replaced.

If we surrender our all, our schools and colleges, our rights under the Constitution of the United States, our personal liberty, our money, our profits, but continue to hold intact the spiritual freedom of our heritage, it will be well with us. Material assets may go for a season, but God will see to it that they come back with added blessing.

What shall we do?

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE RUSSIAN PEASANT.*

I feel somewhat at a loss to describe the Russian peasant whom we came out to treat; it is always so much easier for a person with a temperament like mine to grasp organization than individuals, and to describe method than people.

*This is furnished by the War Victims' Relief Committee, London.

The difficulty is, of course, increased by the fact that there is no common language, and that they are more interested at being in the presence of a solitary foreigner than I am to be in a foreign country. Their mental confusion is not unlike a child's who speaks to and gets a reply from a Barnum & Bailey's native; the meaning of the remarks is lost in a cloud of wonder at the person who is speaking, his foreignness, the great wonder at the strange life the person must live, whether that was a typical remark, does he ever say anything else, can he speak naturally, etc.

Now you will not wonder, when a person comes up with a dyspeptic look giving a history (in great measure explained by gesture, which is natural to their speech) of dyspepsia, how amazed the peasant is at the English doctor who says: "Take this medicine three times a day before food, in tablespoonful doses." He answers, "Me?" "Yes." "In tablespoonful doses?" "Yes." "Three times?" "Yes." "Three times a day?" "Yes." "Me?" "Yes." You may say that this is love of accuracy in the peasant, a precision of mind not manifested in any other phase of their life. That may be so; it may also be explained by the curiosity of the person to get more out of the strange foreigner. Some ask what are called supplementary questions in the house; this is very annoying, because the question is seldom important, it deals with smaller issues and the graver ones have already been attended to; thirty people are waiting, and there are more coming.

I do not like to go in for generalisations, but there are a few touching on the Russian peasant I cannot help making.

I have noticed, in conversation with people who speak his language properly, as well as in my own floundering, that the Russian peasant has instinctive attention rather than a mental attention governed principally by the will. When talking they do not seem to be all attention; they are distracted by the sight of anyone walking through the room; their mind seems to go after the person, hover awhile and then flit back again.

Whether this is the cause or the effect of their great powers of endurance I do not know, but one is struck by that, too. I cannot give feats of endurance in terms of hours or degrees of cold, or privation or fasting, partly because such things are of no value in another country and condition, and have little value at any time. In the day and in the year the Russian does about one-half to one-fifth of the work of an Englishman of good capacity and ambition, but endures very much greater hardship and is faced with greater difficulty. On a well-managed mixed farm in England there are no slack months; on farms in this part of Russia there are five or six. The weather prevents agriculture and encourages laziness; the natural response is a lowering of the general output throughout the year. In the winter, when it is very cold, it is a whole time occupation to keep alive and warm; in the summer, a full time job to keep at peace with the flies. With such a climate to encourage him he becomes slow in movement and mind, his keenness of intellect becomes dulled, he loses sharp definition in sensation, some say he has little of either.

Another factor comes into play, but of its value I do not profess to judge. The diet of the people is a monotonous one; the staple is black bread and salt, cabbage soup and potatoes; as extras, not eaten daily by any means, meat, milk and vegetables other than cabbage and potatoes. Fats are supplied by sunflower seed oil, taken in soup and by eating the seeds, a habit accompanied by a husky untidiness, and the fats of pig and beef; mutton is not so common as in Sussex or Wales, varies in the locality. The better peasants eat a fair amount of poultry; in some regions they catch fish, which for the most part is small and coarse; in the big rivers, and especially the Volga, huge fish are caught, though the finest river in Europe is now polluted—the fish are dying off in the Volga owing to the oil-boat traffic.

Chorney deb, the black, damp, acid bread of the peasants, is rich in husk, water and carbohydrates, has about three-fifths of the protein content of whole meal bread, and requires digesting. Salt is eaten with it freely, indeed, this is necessary; if eaten without salt for long as a staple without meat there is a salt craving. I mention these points to show how much the peasant by his poverty is compelled to live on the margin of life, while we appear to live right across the page.

At every turn one comes across what appear to be fresh limitations that seem to confine the Russian peasant in. His food is monotonous and dull, rather meatless, and needs much chewing; his climate compels long periods of idleness; he has no education; he cannot do anything between periods of work except look at things and sleep. While we travel thirty miles to London we turn our minds, or think we do, to the innumerable events of the time as shown in the newspapers, or our correspondence, carried in cushioned comfort, warmed and protected. The peasant, traveling to his market, goes on his goods in a sledge; the thermometer may be fifty degrees F. below freezing, he cannot read during his drive, and he carries in his head no news of moment to consider; he has had no course of study, nothing which leads to sustained mental attention, and his mind floats from thing to thing. The cold rather makes for slow thought; the monotony, the steady jolting and sliding movement beating in the brain replaces thought by tranquil feeling, in which objects and topics no longer require to be dealt with but only dreamed about. In the order of things the results are fairly good, and no one cares for God is good.

What wonder, then, that he should find his chief outlet for his energy in his relations with his fellow-men. We in England turn so much of our time to the soil, to books, to trash and business, we have comparatively little experience of social relationship; to expedite our meetings we have a system of convenient common manners which are at least demanded; the more of politeness added the better; if they take up time the person is called effusive, French, gushing; we regulate our social meeting to a polite schedule. But here the slow tide of the seasons has produced a smoother people, less hasty, less concentrated in their social responsiveness; if they meet it is to spend the time together pleasantly—that may be from three to six P. M., or three to eleven P. M. It is so obvious there is plenty to talk about because they are interested in each other. I don't believe we understand what it is to be interested in people as these Russian peasants are interested. The issue is not confused by problems of social barriers, similar characters in novels, the perpetual false atmosphere of towns, "by having to meet the people again," which restrains one in England, and gives such possibilities to the traveler abroad; here one always meets, and secrets grow less.

But, in addition, they dwell in each other's minds; the crops are cared for by the kind God, the earth is half its time under snow, the work in the fields is done, only the cattle food has to be carried to the stall from the next shed, only the water drawn from the well; but the neighbors are constantly present, always in their minds, and when that goes on for a time there is no room for malice or suspicion. There is an absence of complexity in their lives because there is inward harmony and an equal emphasis laid upon things from mental, material and spiritual aspects.

The Russian, I believe, seldom goes raving mad; he often drifts into imbecility; the former is uneven balance, the latter mere want. I speak of the village peasant. When a driven factory hand, living in a slum, has to endure the Russian climate and fight for existence on the English standard of living, when, as a relief from monotony, he has only a garret, heated without ventilation, instead of the magnificent repetition of the open steppe, one finds, I believe, the usual standard of raving madness we produce by our system in part payment for comfortable traveling on the path of progress.

I hardly think it possible that anyone can want to return to the life of living in a town, and living the town life, after staying in the country—right in the country—for any length of time. In the town, where people are massed together, they do not get to know each other; they are indifferent to one another; they do not dwell in each other's minds; there is room for malice and suspicion, for the things which separate men from each other and do not draw men to God. In the town men appear to be gay, but they are not happy; in the country one sees the signs of a great deal of sorrow, but of little misery; the people are poor in materials but rich in friendship, and they have leisure to cultivate the knowledge of God.

JOHN RICKMAN.

TONIC FOR PINEAPPLES.

It is common knowledge that volcanic soils are apt to be very fertile. In a recent number of the National Geographic Magazine the luxuriance of vegetation on Kodiak Island, Alaska, growing on recently-deposited "ash" is described in terms which may well be called amazing. The slopes of Vesuvius, often devastated by eruptions, are always again planted in vineyards and gardens because of the great productivity of the soil formed by the matter ejected from the volcano.

The Vesuvian ash is classed as acid because it contains an excess of silica, like our granites, schists and other familiar rocks. The soil of large parts of Eastern Pennsylvania owe much of their fertility to potash released by very gradual decay from the feldspar of its underlying rocks. The Vesuvian ash is so finely divided that potash and other valuable constituents become available much more rapidly than is the case where the materials are held in massive rocks.

In some parts of the world the lava thrown out by volcanoes is not basic, but acidic. That is, all the silica is combined with metallic bases, and there is an excess of metallic oxides. This is the case in the Hawaiian Islands. The elements needed for plant growth are all there, also, and the decay of the lava results in rich soils. These are, in general, very dark colored, due to the large percentage of oxides of iron and manganese.

Iron is necessary to the growth of many plants, and the very small quantity needed is rendered soluble by the acids of the soil and taken up by the plant. One of the plants which requires iron is the pineapple. In many parts of the Hawaiian Islands this fruit grows luxuriantly. In some places, however, while it starts well, it loses its color and vigor before the fruit is fully developed, and the crop is small in size and deficient in flavor.

It was found that these soils on which the pineapple did not flourish were those containing a higher percentage of manganese than the average. The next problem was to find out why the manganese hindered the pineapples from perfecting. The chemists of the Government experiment station discovered that the plants which had grown on manganese soil were deficient in iron. This deficiency seemed remarkable, since the soil contained a great deal of iron. It was presently discovered that the presence of manganese beyond a small percentage prevented the iron from going into solution.

The proof of the correctness of this explanation was completed by injecting a minute quantity of a solution of sulphate of iron into pineapple plants growing on manganese soil. The plants so treated kept their color, and the fruit was perfect. It was not deemed practicable to use the hypodermic syringe on each plant in a field of many acres, so other methods were tried. The one which seems likely to be satisfactory involves spraying the plants with a solution of sulphate of iron, since the very small quantity of iron needed is absorbed through the surface tissues.

It does not do to spread soluble iron salts on the fields, unless the amount so used should be very large, since small quantities are attacked chemically by the manganese and the iron is rendered insoluble again.

WAR.

A CRY FROM ABROAD.

The world's at war—and marching
Men follow life and drum,
With banners overreaching
This strange and solemn marching
Heeds the insistent "Come!"

Across the sea, and under,
From earth and peaceful skies,
Shudders the muffled thunder,
And men begin to wonder
Where any safety lies.

And swiftly Death takes fearful tolls,
As closer crowds the fight,
And still the cannon fiercer rolls,
And still a countless throng of souls
Pass out into the night.

Oh, God of power prevailing,
Spare us, as oft before,
For human hearts are failing
And weep in bitter wailing—
The whole wide world's at war.

THE IDEALS AND AIMS OF THE FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION.

ANNA COPE EVANS.

As many of you know, the Fellowship of Reconciliation was started in England shortly after the war broke out. It met with a spontaneous response from all over the British Isles, and grew rapidly to a membership of several thousand. About a year later, in the autumn of 1915, Henry T. Hodgkin came to America, and the response to the Fellowship message was such that he called a conference at Garden City, at which it was decided to start an American branch. The Fellowship is rather a spiritual movement than a society of the ordinary type, as there is little organization and no campaigning for either members or money. It is entirely un denominational and welcomes as members all who are in substantial agreement with its principles. These principles were printed in a small leaflet, with a membership blank at the end which anyone wishing to join can sign and send to the Secretary. This is all that is required.

And now what are these principles. Some of you may have thought of the Fellowship as another Peace Society. It is that, but it is a great deal more, for it recognizes that war is only one symptom—a very terrible one—of the disease from which our whole civilization is suffering, that "this war is not simply proclaiming the violation of Christian principles between nations," but "is laying bare the heart of twentieth century civilization," and we are discovering how un-Christian that civilization is. The Fellowship is convinced that "no negative reformations of any kind are sufficient to cure our social diseases or eradicate war." Its message is, therefore, a very positive one—to put it briefly, it is this:

"That Love, as revealed and interpreted in the life, teaching and death of Jesus Christ, is not only the fundamental basis of a true human society, but is the effective power for overcoming evil" here and now; that it must be trusted to the uttermost, and be made the basis and ruling principle of action, not only in international affairs, but in national, industrial, social and personal life, with all that this implies. The Fellowship does not claim to have discovered yet all that it does imply. It believes that one of our chief tasks is to discover by prayer and study—individually and in groups—just what this tremendous thing does mean for each one of us and for society as a whole. On one point the Fellowship is clear—that "war inevitably involves a violation of the principles of Love," and that, therefore, it is not the right or effective way of combatting evil—in short, that we cannot use the method of war in fighting evil. The Fellowship believes that the Love that was in Jesus Christ “profoundly reverences personality, and strives to create an order of society which suffers no individual to be exploited for the profit or pleasure of another, but assures to each the means of development for his highest usefulness.” This Love, therefore, is concerned with “the ordering of daily life, of land and houses, of money, food and clothing, of commerce and industry, of recreation and education,” so that every man, woman and child may have adequate opportunity for the full development of body, mind and soul.

Finally, the Fellowship points out, that as these purposes must be fulfilled through men and women, it is for us to apply unwaveringly in our own lives Christ’s revolutionary principle of Love, and to take the risks involved in doing so in a world that does not yet accept it. In other words, if we desire the victory of Love in national and international life, we must each yield to it absolutely and trust it to the uttermost in every relationship of our lives no matter what the cost to us and ours. And the cost may be great. Calvary teaches us that. Calvary was the price—our Lord paid for His victory of Love. To conquer evil with love calls for the highest heroism, the most daring faith in God and man. And here again the Fellowship helps us by reminding us, that “the power, wisdom and love of God reach far beyond the limits of our present experience, and that He is ever waiting to break forth into human life in new and larger ways.” What if we don’t feel equal to this great task? Surely the little band of disciples must have felt unequal to the task that faced them after our Lord had left them. What if they had not attempted it? Perhaps we are waiting for God to make it all seem more possible—but let us remember the story of the Children of Israel when they were caught between the Egyptians and the Red Sea. Moses had told them “to stand still and see the salvation of the Lord.” “And the Lord said unto Moses, ‘Wherefore criest thou unto Me? Speak unto the Children of Israel that they go forward.’” To quote again from the Fellowship, “So long as we are afraid of the things that seem impossible, so long does God not get His chance to prove that He can and will carry us through.” To-day in Europe thousands of men and women are laying down their lives that good as they see it may triumph over evil. To us it seems that they have made a tragic mistake in the method they have chosen—that they are trying to cast out evil with evil—but how many of us are giving our lives to conquer evil in the way we do think is right. Just think, Friends, what it would mean if our Yearly Meeting at its meetings really got under the weight of this thing—really felt it as John Woolman felt much the same thing years ago. If we as a Yearly Meeting should come out boldly and say, “We cannot fight to overcome evil, but we will give our time, our possessions—all that we have and are—our very lives and the lives of our nearest and dearest, if necessary, to conquer evil with love, to create and establish an order of society founded on love.”

A message to Friends, issued by one of the committees of London Yearly Meeting, after outlining these principles of love and brotherhood as applied to the social order, closes with these words:

“If these are true principles for all the individual members of the human family, it is the duty of the Society of Friends to proclaim them, and to seek with humility, but with courage and persistent study, to work them out in practice, finding scope for all its members to give their best service to their fellows.”

Henry T. Hodgkin and others have urged the appointment of a Quaker commission. To quote their own words, “We believe that a small number of men and women Friends of clear vision, wide outlook and good judgment should be set apart, who, at the call of the Society and under a sense of concern, will arrange to devote practically the whole of their time and energy, for such period as may be found necessary, to considering what part the Society of Friends can take in the present-day application of the principles of the Kingdom of God.”

Is it not well that our Yearly Meeting has taken similar action? A wonderful opportunity lies before us at this time. The world is waiting for light and leadership along these lines. The Church as a whole has largely failed to give much of either. The people are as sheep without a shepherd, and we with our wonderful heritage—with the message of John Woolman still ringing in our ears—dare we fail them? If, as a Society, we do fail through timidity or indifference to catch the vision, if we shrink back or are not willing to pay the price of leadership, the opportunity will pass to others who are more worthy of it. But, if with the sin and agony of the world pressing on our hearts, we are willing to go forward, to take up our cross and follow Christ—to attempt all, to dare all for Him, who knows what wonderful things He may accomplish through us—through this Yearly Meeting.

“Can we not rise to this great height of glory?
Shall this vast sorrow spend itself in vain?
Shall future ages tell the woful story,
Christ by His own was crucified again?”

THE FIRST STEP IN A NATIONAL FRIENDS' PROGRAM FOR EXPRESSING ORGANIZED GOOD-WILL.

In the midst of a national crisis, which is of a peculiar concern to Friends, it is unthinkable that the Society of Friends as a body should be inarticulate and passive. It can be presumed that Friends individually will feel a response in spirit to the impelling problems of the situation. It is also true that groups, either in colleges, local meetings, or even Yearly Meetings will endeavor to meet in an organized capacity the needs of humanity newly created at such a time. However, just as the problem is nation and world-wide, so our responsibilities are nation and world-wide. Only by the greatest co-operation and the fullest expression of the national group consciousness can we be obedient to the calls of this hour.

English Friends have united in a magnificent expression of the leaven of good-will. Broad-minded leaders in all countries have paid high tribute to their spirit and work, and despite the misunderstanding of the “crowd,” this leaven is spreading throughout the world in its transforming power.

A co-ordination of work is more difficult here, owing to our wide separation geographically and our diversity of problems. However, we need to join hands across the seas with English Friends to meet the world-wide problems, as we need also a great unity of purpose and effort to meet the problems peculiar to our own country.

The first essential step in this program has been taken. On Fourth Month 30th there met in Philadelphia a Committee representing Friends of all sections. The Committee now comprises fifteen members, but will be enlarged to make it more representative. Those who have been appointed are as follows: T. Janney Brown, Arabella Carter, William C. Cocks, Henry W. Comfort, Allen D. Hole, Jesse Holmes, Lucy Biddle Lewis, Homer L. Morris, Vincent D. Nicholson, Charles J. Rhoads, Alfred Scattergood, Willard Swift, Anne G. Walton, L. Hollingsworth Wood and Stanley R. Yarnall.

The purpose of this Committee is to co-ordinate all the work of various groups of Friends throughout the country in connection with the present crisis. Many yearly meetings have taken steps towards some organized efforts. We have reports of scores of smaller groups that are doing the same.

The need for a national central committee in which the work of all these groups can focus is imperative. The reasons are obvious. There is, first, the gain in efficiency which always comes with centralization and co-operation. The loss of duplication of effort will be avoided, as each group will be advised of the work other groups are doing. Such a clearing-house of information and ideas will give to all of our work the combined strength of all Friends the country over. Just as important is the more intangible value of the mutual encouragement and sympathy that can flow from group to group through this bond of union.

The greatest need for such a committee is the simple fact that, for a peculiarly national task is needed a distinctively national effort. Only as Friends are organized to think of the problem in terms of national and even world-wide plans can we adequately meet the situation. The committee can not only serve as a clearing-house, but can itself initiate plans to be recommended to the various groups.

All of the essential dealings we may have with the government officials can only be carried on to advantage through such a central committee. It can also serve as the representative of Friends in the increasing points of contact we will have with English Friends and other bodies. The Menonites and Dunkards who share our particular problems and are also within the exemption clause of the conscription bill, are anxious to co-operate and looking to us for leadership.

It was decided by the Committee immediately to open headquarters in Philadelphia, and to employ a secretary and office help as soon as the person and the money can be secured.

The call rings with the challenge for Friends to seek earnestly the path of duty. We have as individuals and a body held certain strong convictions with regard to the meaning of Christian discipleship. We are now called upon to validate and verify those convictions in the crucible of experience. The uncompromising allegiance which we have felt we owe to the claims of the Kingdom of God, has in no sense made us indifferent to other loyalties. Rather has it intensified our patriotism, using the term in its high and proper sense of desire to serve and save our country, in so far as such service is a necessary part of our duty to the Kingdom of God. For many of us (even those of military age) this means no radical readjustment of our affairs, if we find the path of duty in attempting to express the gospel of good-will in our previous occupations and relationships.

All Friends, young or old, can earnestly apply themselves to a search for Truth in connection with the political and social problems of this sadly disarranged world. We can save what we can from the wreckage of the storm, and lay the basis for the constructive work to follow the war. The opposition to our convictions we have always had to face is the allegation that they are up in the clouds, far in the future, unrelated to the stuff of work-a-day life. We now have an unusual opportunity to translate these ideals which all hold for the future into some part of the practical present. The thinking of the country is in a mobile, fluid state. The hard crust of custom and precedent has been broken up. On all sides is the appeal to the heroic. If we wait until the thought and practices of society have crystallized once more our opportunity will have passed. The writer hopes he is free from any delusions as to the scope of our possible influence. The scope of our duty, however, is exactly coincident with the scope of our opportunity as it is revealed—be it large or small. The fulfillment of duty will be found in the attempt to hold fast to whatever convictions we have and may attain.

For the Committee,
VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

NEW YORK CITY.

IMPROVEMENTS FOR TUNESASSA.

In 1915 the school building was painted and a much-needed heating plant was installed.

About six months ago friends of the School subscribed $1500 for an electric light plant. This has been much appreciated.

After careful consideration the Committee has decided to proceed with the following additional improvements:

1. The erection of a small cottage near the school building for the occupancy of our friends, Henry B. and Eliza Foster Leeds.
2. The erection of a wagon shed. At present the wagons are without a house. This is poor economy and a bad example to the Indians.

3. Plumbing, the erection of a hog house, incidental repairs and improvements. These are necessary for the proper maintenance of the property.

While the efforts of Friends have recently mainly centered in the School, there has ever been a concern for the general welfare of the Indians on the Reservation.

This concern has found expression in the desire of Henry B. Leeds and his wife to live on the Reservation and devote themselves to the material and spiritual help of the Indians. During the past year they have lived in a house at Steamburg, the nearest available home, about four miles from the School. As their duties take them frequently to the School, the inconvenience of this arrangement will be readily seen.

The school building is fully occupied by the staff of workers and scholars, and it is now proposed to erect on the school grounds a small, neat house for these Friends.

The Committee feels that such a building will to some extent serve as a model for the Indians in the building of their own houses, that the example of a Christian home will be a benefit to the neighborhood, that it will afford occasional opportunities for home life for the teachers and scholars, and that it will be a helpful factor in the religious and educational work which the Yearly Meeting has undertaken and carried on so long and faithfully in this needy field.

The opportunity for service is large and the prospects are very encouraging.

Estimates show the approximate cost of these improvements to be:

Cottage	$3,000
Wagon-house	500
Plumbing, hog-house and incidental repairs	1,500
Total	$5,000

The comparatively small amount of income from the funds belonging to the School is all needed for its maintenance and an earnest appeal is made for money for these useful and necessary improvements.

Remittances should be made to the Treasurer, William Bacon Evans, Westtown, Penna., or to any of the Committee:

FOURTH MONTH 16, 1917. Collecting Committee.

Encouraging progress has been made towards completing the funds referred to in this notice. About $2,400 are now in the hands of the Treasurer and subscriptions will be gladly received from all interested Friends whether or not they have previously received this appeal.

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

At the time of the "call" of Thomas C. Bately to sojourn in the Kiowa camps, as heretofore related, they were a wild and depredating tribe, resisting all attempts to bring them into friendly relations with the Government, or to a knowledge of civilized life, committing depredations upon the white settlements, stealing horses and mules, murdering men and women, and carrying children into captivity. The succeeding summer, that of 1872, the Kiowas, with parties from other tribes that they could induce to join them, still continued their raiding.

The Superintendent and General Agent of Indian Affairs approved of the proposition of Thomas C. Bately, to go into their camps, but under the existing circumstances, they felt discouraged and the agent wrote him that he did not think it prudent for him to go among them the coming winter. Notwithstanding these discouragements, he still felt secretly drawn to the Kiowas. He says—accordingly, on the first day of Tenth Month, 1872, I started on my journey, traveling by cars as far as Wichita, Kan., this being as far as I could go by rail.

There being no ox or mule team going on for some time, I joined two young men who were going across the plains on horse-back, leaving my trunk to come later. We started on our journey of two hundred and forty miles, on the eighth of the month, arriving at the Wichita Agency on the 15th. Proceeding to the school-house, I opened the door without knocking, stepped in and stood in front of the school. The room instantly rang with joyful exclamations, shouting my name over and over again. It was pleasant to see these wild, but really affectionate children once more.

The next day I proceeded to the Kiowa Agency, where I remained until first of Twelfth Month, 1872. Kicking Bird being here I set out with him for his camp. At eight o'clock p. m. we arrived at an Apache camp, making our way to Pacer's lodge, head chief of the tribe, escorted by hundreds of dogs, whose vocal powers filled the air with the most horrid din of snaps, snarls, yelps, growls and howls I ever heard.

In due time supper was announced, which consisted of boiled mutton, coffee and very good biscuit baked in a bake kettle or Dutch oven.

During the evening the lodge was filled with the almost unbearable fragrance of tobacco and kinnikinnick. At the signal for retiring we went to where our ponies and mule were secured, spread our blankets and lay down to sleep on the ground, amid the joint serenade of dogs and wolves, one of the latter coming so near I could hear his footsteps on the dry grass.

Next morning we proceeded on our way, reaching Kicking Bird's camp in the afternoon, where we were met by a host of children who came out to stare at the "white man."

We repaired to the lodge of Zebaddle, Kicking Bird's brother, where he explained the cause of the presence of the white man. After supper we retired to the lodge of Topen, Kicking Bird's daughter and only living child, a fine looking little girl.

After remaining in camp three days, endeavoring to render myself familiar with all, and writing down many Kiowa words to memorize, I returned to the Agency, feeling I had received the greatest attention and kindness from all, but no doubt many of the Indians looked upon my being among them with distrust.

In a few days I returned to camp again, spending the night near the Apache camp. I spread my blanket on the ground and enjoyed a good night's sleep, though surrounded by hundreds of Indians who a few months ago would have rejoiced at such a chance for securing a white man's scalp.

While riding along next day my mind became unusually overshadowed with Divine Goodness, with a precious feeling of calmness, in which I was favored to approach the Throne of Mercy, with an unusual sense of nearness thereto, which continued while we traveled many miles.

In the evening, Stumbling Bear, a Kiowa chief, informed me of a war in which he had killed and scalped five men and Kicking Bird, seven. I suppose it would be difficult to find in the whole tribe a man, over whose head twenty years have passed, whose hands have not been imbrued in blood.

During my five days spent in camp I have endeavored to become more and more familiar with the children, mingling with them as much as possible out of doors, and when opportunity offered, showing them my charts. Several have learned their letters, and some young men form very well-shaped Roman letters with a pencil. Day by day they are becoming more familiar and I think some of the prejudices of the older ones are giving way, so that when the time comes for me to erect my tent in their camp many of their children will enter it with some degree of confidence who could not have been prevailed on to do so in the beginning of my acquaintance with them.

On one occasion the lodge in which I was sojourning was taken down and the man and his wife left for some other place, leaving me not knowing where to go, as Kicking Bird was away and I could talk with no one in the camp: when Zebaddle came to me and by signs bade me enter his lodge, where I felt quite at home.

I am making some progress in learning the Kiowa language. On returning to the Agency I found a box of books, charts, slates, etc., had arrived during my absence. So I trust I shall soon be in readiness to open a school in camp. I soon returned and a son of the agent and two employees accompanied me to assist in setting up my tent, etc.

On the morning of the twenty-third of First Month, 1873, I opened my school of twenty-two pupils in the presence of most of the chiefs, several women and a number of young men. It being the first attempt at anything of the kind ever undertaken among them, it is quite a novelty to them.

After the withdrawal of the chiefs and elderly people, the children were squatted on the ground, busily engaged with slates and pencils, endeavoring to copy the picture of a buffalo I had drawn on the blackboard. I was on the ground with them, showing them the way to hold the pencils and how to commence the picture, when suddenly slates and pencils were thrown aside and with apparent fright all commenced a tumultuous scramble for the entrance of the tent. One little girl caught my arm, wildly shaking it, and with a look of unutterable horror pointed upward and was gone. I raised up, turning round as I did so, when to my horror, I beheld a fierce-looking Kiowa warrior, with an uplifted hand axe, was standing over me, his face hideously painted with black lines expressive of intense anger, with a most horrid oath in broken English, and suiting his action to his words, he was in appearance in the attitude of trying the thickness of my skull with the edge of his weapon. I seized his uplifted arm and giving him a vigorous swing, turned his back towards me, seized the other arm above the elbow and commenced marching him towards the entrance of my tent, at the same time telling him: "I should permit no such talk or action in my tent."

On arriving at the entrance he made some resistance about going out, whereupon I put my foot against him and gave him so forcible a shove that losing his balance he landed on his face some distance from the tent. Picking himself up and gathering his blanket over his head he started away. Suddenly a wild whoop from behind me, inside the tent, announced the presence of other guests. On turning, what was my surprise to find a half dozen braves inside, whooping to the full extent of their ability, but upon my looking at them they quietly withdrew leaving me in peaceable possession of my tent.

The children did not return until I rang the bell after dinner, when they came in as demurely as though nothing unusual had occurred.

I had no thought of fear until after closing the session for the forenoon, when thinking it over, I was somewhat unnerved. I think it very probable that there may be several young, middle-aged or even old men, who may view this movement as an aggression upon their ancient customs, and conceive the idea of frightening me from the field, without manifesting any open opposition to it, but meeting prompt action, I think it will not be repeated, though some other form of interrupting the school may be resorted to.

His belief that this was an attempt to frighten him was confirmed by seeing the other Indians quite hilarious over the affair, and catching the expressions: "Thomys, not afraid," "Thomys, brave," "Thomys, put him out,"—showing they were pleased with the result. By this they realized that the gentleness and kindness he had shown them was accompanied by firmness and resolution; that they could not intimidate him, which raised him in their estimation, as they admire bravery.

Some three weeks after this occurrence, early one morning, a little girl entered the lodge where I was making my camp home, bringing an invitation for Kicking Bird and myself to take breakfast out. I knew not where. With the little girl for guide we soon arrived at a lodge of not very prepossessing appearance. On entering and casting a glance in the direction of the place usually occupied by the host, I saw that my new friend was the warrior I had so forcibly ejected from my tent. Stepping to him and offering my hand, I gave the usual Kiowa salutation, "My Brother." Looking up in apparent surprise, he asked, "You know me?" "Yes," was my reply. "Where you see me?" (with a merry twinkle in his eye, usual to him when amused). "I saw you leave my tent one day." "Ugh! all right?" "All right," I replied, whereupon he gave me his hand and seated me by his side, and I partook of his proffered meal. He having tested my bravery to his satisfaction, we were ever afterwards warm friends.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE MARNE AND MEUSE.—Written by a son of a late cabinet minister in England for Young Friends.

Jean Comenil had always had a happy, comfortable life in his little village in the Meuse. He was thirteen years old, and the eldest of a family, containing besides himself two girls and a boy. He lived in a farm-house with his father and mother and his old grandmother. His brother and sisters were still at school, but he had just left and worked on his fields with his father and mother, helping with the ploughing and the harvest and the threshing, also with the gathering of the beet-root, which, during the season, began at three o'clock in the morning and continued all day long—very hard work for a boy. But Jean never complained. Indeed, he was very happy. He had plenty to eat and drink and a comfortable bed to lie on. He was strong and healthy. He was always interested in his parents' fields and the home, which would one day be his. Then he would marry and have children and look after the crops, as his father and his grandfather had done before him. The Meuse was a pleasant part of the world and Jean did not wish to be anywhere else.

Sitting under the fire in the evening his grandfather would talk of the great war of 1870, when the Prussians had occupied the village for a year, and when the husband had had to go and be a soldier. It had been a bad time, and they had all been very unhappy. But then the Prussians weren't so very bad; and grandfather, who had been captured at Sedan, had come safely back when peace was declared; and though the French had apparently been so terribly defeated, it didn't seem to have made very much difference to anybody, except to the Emperor Napoleon III, who, after all, was not a very important person. Grandfather and grandmother had never seen him, and so they did not pretend to miss him. As long as President Thiers did not go to war, they were quite willing he should govern them if he wished.

To Jean 1870 was a pleasant history, like Charlemagne and the four sons of Egmont and Jeanne d'Arc, the Revolution of 1789, and the victories of the Great Napoleon, which were all very interesting, but not really important like the price of wheat or the health of the horses. Then, suddenly, came the new war, and his father in his turn went away to be a soldier. It was all very horrid. But he remembered how his grandfather had been captured at Sedan and come back quite comfortably, and how the Prussians had not been so very disagreeable. In a short time it would be all right again. But they never had more than one postcard from his father. Then there was complete silence, and it can only be supposed that he died at the very beginning of the war.

This was much worse than 1870, and seemed more like the Revolution and the great Napoleon, which had sounded so interesting from a distance. Then it was heard that the Germans were coming just as they had come in 1870. A number of the villagers immediately fled south. But grandmother had not done this in 1870. The Germans had been there for a year, and on the whole had made themselves rather pleasant. So why not stay? Perhaps the Germans would bring a little money into the place. At four o'clock in the morning the Germans came. They cleared everybody they could out of the houses and removed as much corn as was convenient for their purpose; then they threw combustible pellets into the windows and burned everything to the ground.

Jean and his family saw from a wood a mile off his home and everything they cared about flaming into ruin. The war had been on two months, and he had lost his father, his home, his barns, his oxen, his horses and his corn. The world had nothing left for him to care about. His mother had collapsed; his grandmother seemed unlikely ever to regain her reason; his sister and brother were hysterical. Surely the four sons of Egmont did not behave like this. He and his family spent a day and a night in the woods, then, more dead than alive, returned to the smoking ruin, which had been their whole happy life. Many of the Germans were drunk and were perfectly horrible. "In a few days," they said, "we shall be in Paris; the Kaiser will rule over France and you will all become Germans. At first you will hate it; but Germany is a great country, and you will be proud of being German." This was the first moment Jean had ever felt proud of being a Frenchman. Now he knew he cared about France more than anything else in the world. Nor is this surprising. Nobody can live in France long without feeling just the same as Jean.

There was practically nothing to eat, and what food they got was given them by some kind German soldiers—bread and cocoa from their rations. Jean understood what his grandmother had meant when she said that the Germans had not been so disagreeable. It was drink that made them so terrible, and in 1870 German soldiers had not been encouraged to get drunk.

Thus they lived a week in the cellar, coming above ground as little as possible, for the sights above were worse than the darkness below. But the Germans, somehow, seemed less confident now when he saw them, and boasted less of Paris and the new German Empire. One officer said things were going badly, and they'd soon be off. Then, early in the morning, after eight days' stay, they departed as hurriedly as they came. The Battle of the Marne had been fought and Jean had not known of it. The magnificent, well-equipped, overpoweringly armed might of Germany fled before the ill-provisioned forces of the French. How they cheered, forgetting their grief, as the French army hurried back along the country they had left.

So Jean's village is once more clear of the enemy. But what a weight rests upon his shoulders! His home, his barn, his oxen, his all are destroyed. His father is not alive to help him. War and the spirit of war have cast a blight upon a community that used to be happy and comparatively free from care. He sees now around him people who are utterly discouraged and cast down. He sees them ruined financially, with little apparently left in life to care for; he sees them lonely and sad from the loss of those who were dearest.

But the darkest hours pass. In Jean's heart is courage unconquerable and high hope, and these convert a seemingly hopeless situation into something with possibilities in it. As little by little, with the aid of his family, he clears the débris where once his home stood, and of the fallen bricks builds a little shanty to house them; as with dauntless heart he cultivates, as well as he can, his bit of land, color and light come back to life.

Other events happen, too, to bring cheer and distraction. From across the sea come supplies of clothing and of garden and forage seeds. Agricultural implements are also sent from these Friends in England, and in course of time chickens and rabbits for restocking the farmyards are given away. Best of all, perhaps, these Friends themselves come and live in the villages and distribute their help in person. They erect little wooden "barraquements" for all who most need them and get to know everyone, distracting their thoughts a little from their troubles.

After the blackness of winter, life has begun to bud again into Spring in those villages of the Marne and Meuse, and kindness appears again like the flowers.

Much, however, remains to be done, especially in those villages nearer the battle-line; and in that sad region just beyond an unlimited amount of relief and reconstruction will be needed. If ever those in misfortune deserved the sympathetic help of those less afflicted, it is Jean and thousands like him, in this time of their need.

"THE Lord knows how to make stepping-stones for us of our defects, even; it is what He lets them be for."

A WORD FROM THE QUAKERS.

There is an unusual advertisement in The Herald to-night. It is a word in behalf of peace from the "Religious Society of Friends in America"—that is to say, the Quakers.

It is an appeal that, though we may be unable to agree with it, we must hear with the respect we should accord to every appeal that comes from unchallengeable scruples—that is the reaction of conscience and conviction.

The message of the Quakers is that good-will is a more powerful force in the solution of the world's problems than war. That is a theory that one cannot deny without denying the foundation of the whole structure of Christian civilization. Either the Quakers are right, or Christianity is an error.

It is a protest, on religious and conscientious grounds, against war.

We can sympathize with it, can give it respectful hearing. It is utterly free from the bias of "hyphenism." The Quakers have been Americans for centuries, and good citizens, too.

And yet—it is a condition, not a theory, that confronts us. A great world power, ruthless in its methods and unscrupulous, has been testing our patience beyond even our great capacity to endure. There is grave danger that if we yield now what seems a little, we shall be forced later to decide whether we shall yield all.

Even though we cannot agree with these Friends, it is good to hear this message—good to realize that here, at least, is one group that has laid hold of one of the eternal verities, and proposes to cling to it though the world goes mad. It is a calming and refreshing thought in this time of excitement and distraction when so many, with no hold on the eternal verities at all, are driven hither and yon by every gust that blows.

OUR DIFFERENCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF The Friend:—

Dear Friend.—Your correspondent, Henry F. Horsnail, as is usual with those who support international war, confuses war with the action of the policeman and magistrate.

The quotation from the Declaration of our ancestors does not "forbid the rescue of a child from the murderous attack of a drunken bully." The policeman or civilian who does this no more commits an act of war than a father or schoolmaster when he punishes a disobedient child. The policeman is not a soldier. His proper name is peace officer, while that of the magistrate is Justice of the Peace. These individuals are the servants of the civil law, and their duty is not to engage in war, but to prevent it. If it was not for their beneficent presence, almost every dispute, social, commercial, political and even religious, would lead to deadly violence. They carry no warlike weapons and do not punish the offender. That is done by the law, after a fair and impartial trial, if the offender is found guilty. When the soldier acts as a policeman, he is no longer a soldier, but is then under the orders of a Justice of the Peace, and if he goes beyond his instructions and fatal results follow, he may be indicted for manslaughter. The civil law protects the weak and innocent, it prevents oppression and false accusations, saves life and property and brings the lawbreaker before an impartial tribunal to be tried according to law. The greatest benefit it confers is upon the would-be criminal himself, by preventing him from breaking the laws of God and man. It also seeks his reformation.

The soldier who engages in international war is the paid or conscripted servant of the country which employs him. He acts in their interests alone, and he is sent against those whom they consider their enemies to destroy their power and their persons by any means at his command. War oppresses the weak and helpless, it destroys civil law, slaughters alike the innocent and guilty in the promiscuous carnage of the battlefield, and results, not in the discovery and punishment of the criminal, but only in deciding which party is the strongest. The two systems are utterly opposed to one another in their principle, practice and results and no amount of casuistry can make them appear alike. The strongest opponent of international war, can, with perfect consistency, accept the position of a Special Constable.

The great misfortune has been that the Christian nations of Europe and America have not, long ere this, arranged a code of international law and an International Tribunal to administer it in the settlement of international disputes. If they had been the Christian nations they profess to be, this would have been done long ago. We are now reaping a ghastly harvest of misery and death, rage and hatred in consequence of this neglect of the first principle of civilization, morality and religion.

JOHN W. SHORTHOUSE, in The Friend (London).

WELLINGTON ROAD, Birmingham.

ENGLISH FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED.

Theodore Pumphrey (Stoke Newington, P. M.) was court-martialed for the second time at Mill Hill Barracks on the 4th inst. Our Friend maintained that as he was entitled to absolute exemption under the Military Service Acts he was in his present position as the result of the maladministration of those Acts. After giving an account of his training from childhood to manhood, during which he had been brought up to love and respect the strong, manly character of Christ, and yet to revere those principles which had guided Him in the conduct of His life, Theodore Pumphrey said:

"The weapons of love are spiritual and are based on reason, those of fear are material and based on physical force. So long as the combatants stick to their weapons the former must always win, for love is stronger and can endure more than fear. Fear will do all in its power to entice love to discard her weapons for those of ill-will. If successful in this, fear wins the day, but if unsuccessful, love must be the conqueror.

To-day, blinded by the passion of fear and suspicion, most of the greatest and most civilized nations of the world are engaged in blowing each other to pieces, in the hopes of settling political problems which can only be solved satisfactorily and permanently by an appeal to reason and which will have to be solved by this means eventually, when the combatants have exhausted their material resources."

He added that there is every reason to believe that the principles of Christianity are as applicable to international relations as to individual ones.

A. W. Nissen (Newcastle, P. M.) stated at his court-martial on the 5th inst.:—

"Fourteen or fifteen years ago, I was admitted as a member to the Society of Friends, and one of their basic principles is 'to bear witness against all war.' My desire is to walk humbly in the footsteps of Jesus of Nazareth and to be true to His spirit and teaching, which I believe to be the only way in which war and strife can be eliminated from the human heart. By the Local Tribunal I was granted exemption from military service conditional on my taking up work of national importance. This I cannot do, as I feel that to be true to my principles I must not only abstain from participation in actual warfare, but also from destroying human life by proxy or in any way assisting in the prosecution of the war. I should be only too willing to serve the State were it organized with a view to saving life instead of killing. It pains me to be out of sympathy with my countrymen, but it would be far more painful to me were I to sink my principles for the sake of being in harmony with the spirit of the times. I am convinced that I am right in the stand I am taking, and for that reason I am before you choosing the rougher road instead of the easier way."

Stephen Hobhouse, in a letter to his wife, writes: "Looking back, I feel sure that God has brought me here, past all the loopholes of escape, which seemed so large last summer, for ; great purpose, that He may carry further for me our life ambition to be bond-servants for Christ and humanity, bond-servants for Love's sake, that we may help Christ to break the bonds. As I rather expected, being cut off from the signs of war, I have not had laid much upon me the special burdens of militarism—that I can feel outside, and I don't think much is lost. It is rather of the industrial bondage of our normal city poverty that God has, through the conditions here, given me a keen sense. I have experienced something at any rate of the bitterness of that poverty which borders on destitution in a way which it would be difficult for a man such as I am to do outside prison. . . . Prison life has its own special temptations—to selfish introspection and the like, but I believe I am being given grace to guard against them, and I could calmly face the possibility of many years of this life, in faith that they would bring increase of mind control, in love and nearness to God."—Friends' Fellowship Papers.

LETTER FROM HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

30 KUNO CHO, Mita, Shiba, TOKIO, Japan, Third Month 10, 1917.

Dear Friends—

At the meetings of the Hijirizaka English Speaking Society, which are held once a month in the parlor of the Bowles' home, a number of Japanese students, teachers and business men sit in a circle and the meeting usually begins by each person present introducing himself—giving his name, address, age, business and other remarks. The English is often broken and the sentences always simple. To give you some idea of what might be said let's pretend we are now having such a meeting, and please pardon me for starting things going. "My name is Herbert Nicholson. My home is on a Jersey truck farm. You know New Jersey is near Philadelphia! I work for the Friends' Mission. Please remember me. Thank you." Then the person to the right gives his speech, which might be as follows: "I am J. Harvey Borton. My home is in Moorestown and my business is making plumbing supplies! I am the Chairman of the Committee which has charge of raising funds to support the first speaker in his work in the Orient." (You notice this person is very skilful in the use of English. That last sentence is very complicated!) Then: "My name is John W. Cadbury, of Moorestown. I am Treasurer of the Committee just mentioned. Please remember me!" And so it goes all round the circle.

This scheme not only gets us acquainted, but gives time for the late-comers to get in before the regular meeting begins with a talk on some subject of general interest by a member of the Society or an outside speaker. Of course you will wish to hear something about Japan if I am to do the talking. So in the future you may expect to hear something about Friends' work here, including the meetings, the school, young men's Bible classes, country evangelization, or about some of the startling experiences of a young man in the "Land of the Rising Sun."

After the speech there is always an opportunity for the members to ask questions or give any contributions they may have to the meeting. These remarks are often very short, but sometimes they are longer and very interesting. So in our imaginary meeting I hope there may be questions and responses of various kinds although they be but post cards. You notice that another member of the Committee also wished to be remembered.

Soon tea is brought in, which is a signal for the meeting to become very informal and gives every one a chance to talk to the person next to him. We should take advantage of this part of the meeting and talk over our work in Japan with our friends in order to stir up interest and enthusiasm. If there are any criticisms or suggestions they are always given at this time, quietly to one of the officers.

We can learn much from this English Speaking Society and if we follow its methods should prosper in our project in Japan. My work here is growing even more interesting and I am always grateful to know of the support, both spiritual and financial, that I am getting from my own Quarterly Meeting back home in Jersey.

Hoping to hear from some of you and asking for your prayers,

Yours very sincerely,
HERBERT V. NICHOLSON.

NEWS ITEMS.

MISSIONARY NOTES.—Esther A. Balderston has arrived in this country and is at her home in Ridgway, Pa.

Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles expect to sail from Japan for their year of furbough on the Chicago Maru from Yokohama Sixth Month 21, due in Seattle Seventh Month 7th. The former has been visiting Korea and China in the interests of the Japan Peace Society.

The new year opened in the Friends' Girls' School last month with an entering class of forty-two, the largest entering class on record, and one of the best qualified. There are about one hundred and ten girls enrolled in the School, all undergraduates.

There is very great need for more teachers to help in the School. It would be a great encouragement to those on the field if two teachers could be secured who would go out in Eighth Month of this year.

Alice C. Gifford has been with us for more than a month doing deputation work for the Association. She is now in her home at Falmouth, Mass. She will expect to return to Japan in Eighth Month.

OUR friend Anna L. Dawes, a regular reader of our paper, has kindly called our attention to a series of articles in the Sunday School Times, written from London by Edith Fox Norton. The articles give inspiring details of the Scripture Mission amongst soldiers in Belgium and France. Not a few of our subscribers have had their interest in this beautiful service quickened by Helen Cadbury Alexander during her visit to these parts this winter. They will enjoy reading the Norton articles as we have, and will be indebted to our friend for this reference.—[Eus.]

THE first session of a newly indulged meeting was held in a private residence at Cheltenham, Pa., last First-day, the 6th inst.

The new meeting is to be held regularly until the Eleventh Month, subordinate to Abington Monthly Meeting, and in the care of the Quarterly Meeting's Visitation Committee, in addition to the care of the local Friends. There are about a dozen members of the Society in or near the village, as well as a number of interested attenders. It is the hope of those active in the work that the meeting may be continued and that it may develop into a strong and self-sustaining congregation. The attendance at this initial session was fifteen, of whom twelve were from the village, five Friends and seven not members.

It will be remembered that last autumn our Friend J. Rendel Harris set sail for India, where he hoped to join Dr. Moulton; but being torpedoed en route, he remained in Egypt till his friend returned, when he joined the ship, only to be torpedoed in the Mediterranean a second time. Dr. Moulton succumbed to exposure three days after the shipwreck: he was in his fifty-fourth year. The latest news of Dr. Rendel Harris is that he is now in Ajaccio, where the Friends' War Victims' Relief workers are looking after him. He was reported to be making as rapid and satisfactory a recovery from the effects of his trying experience as could be expected.—The Friend (London).

THE privilege of visiting Tunesassa and thus filling in the actual details of the mental picture drawn by the interesting reports from the Committee of the Yearly Meeting in charge of the Indian School there has created one vivid impression on my mind. It is the unusual atmosphere of the place, for rarely have I seen more signally emphasized true Christian courtesy. This can be due to but one thing—the ideals held up and the example set by the Friends who are devotedly giving themselves to this excellent work. There was a striking contrast, however. Adequate as the physical equipment may have been once, its present condition is far from creditable. The appeals made in the late Yearly Meeting by William C. Cowperthwaite and William B. Rhoads must be heeded and the absolutely necessary facilities provided unless we of the meeting at large are prepared to desert this inherited activity, and retire altogether from a field where the influence of Friends has admittedly been a most important factor, not only in the material, but in the spiritual upbuilding of a people who require and should receive all the assistance which it is possible for us to give them. The amount asked for by the Committee in their appeal ($5000) should be adequate to supply the immediate needs. Less than this the Yearly Meeting cannot give and maintain its work as an uplifting example to the Indians of what right living conditions should be.

FIFTH MONTH 10, 1917.

GEORGE VAUX, JR.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.—The two sessions of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting were accounted seasons of blessing. The meeting of Ministers and Elders feelingly considered the reduced situation of Muncy Preparative Meeting. Not only is the number of those who belong to the meeting very small; they are also widely separated, and at times in such a condition of health as to make attendance at the meetings difficult. The last meeting was omitted entirely. It was suggested that the next meeting of Ministers and Elders might be held at Elklands in the hope of securing an attendance of all the members. Five members of the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders were named to sit with them at that time, and if agreeable to arrange with them in advance for some conference of the concerned Friends of Muncy Monthly Meeting at that time in the desire to encourage the use of the gifts in the meeting that may be obscure and unrecognized. In the Quarterly Meeting on Third-day some very helpful messages brought the meeting to a high spiritual plane.

The message of the Representative Meeting in regard to the "problems confronting us because of the war," a report of the Committee to visit smaller meetings, a report from the Arch Street Centre, and a memorial for George J. and Caroline C. Scattergood claimed the interested attention of a joint session. Although it was nearly two o'clock when Friends were released, the meeting seemed to have been under profitable exercise.

The sessions of New York Yearly Meeting will begin in New York City on the 25th inst. James Wood, of Mount Kisco, N. Y., is Clerk.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Prevailing retail prices of anthracite coal are unwarranted and the supply for next season is adequate, the Federal Trade Commission stated at Washington in a preliminary report based on a partially completed investigation ordered by Congress last winter.

Our export of corn, the crop of which was fairly large last year, rose in Third Month to 10,800,000 bushels, as against 4,800,000 in 1916. They were very much the largest in ten years. The month's export of bacon increased 25,600,000 pounds over 1916, or 37 per cent.; of beef in its various forms, the increase was 10,800,000 pounds, or 62 per cent.

Federal estimates place the American wheat crop at less than the amount needed for home consumption.

Curtailment of passenger train service and shipment of the country's entire output of rolling stock and rails to the allies were forecast at Washington by Daniel Willard in a speech before the national defense conference of governors and representatives of state defense councils.

Fortunately the National Education Society is resolved to hold its meeting at Portland, Ore., next summer despite the war; it is a time when the importance of education needs special emphasis. The Secretary of the Association, D. W. Springer, says: "We believe that one element in national preparedness should be an attempt to retain normal conditions in the country."

The participation of the brewers in politics in Pennsylvania has had the natural consequence. Thirty-four of them have just been fined $52,000 for their proved action in raising a campaign fund of $1,000,000 for use in the Congressional and Senatorial election of 1914 in violation of the Federal law against the contribution of corporations to party treasuries in Federal campaigns.

The Salvation Army announces that it has available, in Europe and the United States, no fewer than 60,000 men and women trained for war relief and Christian work for enlisted men. It says it can command more than half that number, 30,000, in this country, while it has 30,000 in the fields and in the hospitals and training camps of Europe.

The finding of a copy of one of the "lost books" from the earliest press in New England is an event which is likely to cause a sensation, bibliographically and historically. The discovery in New York of a copy of "Tydings from Rome, or England's Alarm," printed in Cambridge, Mass., in 1668, brings to light a work the existence of which has been known for nearly 250 years, and of which no copy has hitherto been located.

The constantly mounting retail price of shoes emphasizes the claim that many people could save much money by making use of shoes of more coarse materials. The wooden shoe having had the trial of centuries has been proved serviceable, and convenient for certain conditions if not graceful. The conditions exist to-day, and the great increase of small gardeners shows an enlargement of conditions favorable to wooden shoes.

Parcels post service from the United States to Denmark and Sweden has been suspended by Postmaster General Burleson "owing to lack of requisite ocean transportation facilities."

FOREIGN.—Appeals for relief for destitute orphans and refugees in the Caucasus and at Erivan, cabled by American Consuls there, were made public by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 1 Madison Avenue. One of the cables put the estimate of the number of orphans in Tiflis at 40,000, and urged the immediate establishment of orphanages.

Coming immediately after the Russian revolution, great significance was attached in Tokio to the promulgation of a law making it possible for any Japanese subject, however humble, to communicate directly with the emperor. The action is regarded as a democratic move to establish closer relationship between the imperial house and the people.

After two years of warfare, the war debt of Germany per capita of population was but $277, while that of Great Britain was $422, and that of France $475.

NOTICES.

A MEETING for Divine Worship is appointed to be held at Friends' Old Meeting-house, Greenwich, New Jersey, on First-day afternoon, Fifth Month 27, 1917, at 3.30 P. M. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

By order of a Committee appointed by Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting.

THE religious service committee of Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting extends an invitation to concerned Friends and others to an appointed meeting for Divine Worship in Friends' Meeting-house at Arney's Mount, N. J., First-day, Fifth Month 20, 1917, at 3 o'clock.

A CORDIAL invitation is extended to all young people to a meeting at Crum Creek, on Fifth Month 25, 1917, under the auspices of the Young Women's Auxiliary. A basket supper will be served at 6.30—each young woman will be asked to bring supper for two. At 7.30 Thomas E. Jones will speak to us, and Esther A. Balderston, who has for three years been at the Friends' School in Japan, will be heard. We expect a treat which we hope everyone may share. Trolleys from Sixty-ninth Street Terminal at 5.32 and 6.02.

STANZAS FROM WHITTIER'S ANNIVERSARY POEM 6 MO. 15, 1863.

The levelled gun, the battle-brand,
We may not take:
But, calmly loyal, we can stand
And suffer with our suffering land
For conscience' sake.

Why ask for ease where all is pain?
Shall we alone
Be left to add our gain to gain,
When over Armageddon's plain
The trump is blown?

Thanks for our privilege to bless,
By word and deed,
The widow in her keen distress,
The childless and the fatherless,
The hearts that bleed!

And we may tread the sick-bed floors
Where strong men pine,
And, down the groaning corridors,
Pour freely from our liberal stores
The oil and wine.

WHAT SHALL FRIENDS DO?

The following statement of the Chairman of the Friends' National Peace Committee is published with the approval of the Committee by way of information and suggestion for Friends generally in America.

Letters received from all parts of the United States since our country entered the war show several distinct facts with regard to the common feelings of Friends:—

(1) There are among Friends in spite of the current of militarism surrounding us for several months just past a remarkably strong loyalty to the ancient peace principles of the Society and an unwillingness to take part in the combatant service of our country.

(2) There is also a strong desire to express in ways consistent with these principles our loyalty to the country. Young men particularly are anxious to prove themselves just as willing for service and for sacrifice as are their neighbors who whether voluntarily or by compulsion are about to enter the dangerous service of war.

(3) Friends of all ages and localities are anxious that the Society as a whole should prove its willingness to do something more positive than merely to oppose war or to accept passively the exemptions or material benefits or protections that may come to us. There is a feeling that the Society of Friends should express itself collectively, concretely and constructively.

These facts are most gratifying. They reveal a wholesome state of mind and a widespread readiness for co-operation and service. In response to this situation the Friends' National Peace Committee has secured the appointment of a larger, more official and more central committee which will endeavor to meet this need and to suggest, as way opens, plans for the corporate action of Friends. Many suggestions have already been received and others should be sent in for the use of the central office which they plan to establish. The situation is so difficult and complex that more prompt action has been impossible. And probably some further delay is inevitable before a complete plan of work is offered. In the meantime the chairman of the Friends' National Peace Committee may express quite unofficially his personal view of some elements of the situation.

It is a matter of the utmost importance that in these times Friends should keep cool, and should not make too hasty decisions. The advice of President Wilson to a member of this Committee, when some months ago he was asked what Friends should do, is even more appropriate now. He said (in effect)—Keep cool, think straight, and try to influence public opinion so that the people will not become excited. With your background and spiritual training you should be able to have great influence for calm, and no other service is so much needed.

The present situation only makes us more careful in our decisions. We see the importance of making right choices. We are forced to consider whether our whole past lives and aims have been such that in time of crisis we can feel that we have done our full duty to our nation, to humanity, and to the causes which challenge our help to-day. We see that both for emergencies and for life we should choose the course that enables us to serve most effectively these ends. Fortunately many Friends are so engaged that at present, as for many years in the past, they are giving very full service to the best interests of the nation. No sudden excitement should lead them lightly to forsake the path of quiet good citizenship and participation in local reforms. Though more novel and conspicuous ways of service may present themselves they are not necessarily more important. The causes of education and social betterment, deserted by many former workers, will need loyal supporters.

Similarly many younger Friends are preparing in school or college for lives of usefulness of all kinds. For many of them the present crisis means no permanent or even temporary change of occupation but merely more diligence and insight in the important work at which they are engaged and the productive use of their leisure time. It is only too easy at a time like this to lose our perspective and to judge ourselves and others more by the appearance and glamor of certain striking actions than by the spirit and permanent value of more humble lives. We should test our motives. To undertake certain work merely to justify ourselves before men or merely to display our self-sacrifice is to fall short of the highest motives.

In determining either to continue or to change our occupation two things should be considered. In the first place we should do something that is worth doing and that we are fitted to do, in the second place our work should either express or give opportunity to express our real ideals, especially our interest in constructive rather than destructive work, in spiritual rather than material progress, in international unity rather than national gain.

To a large extent Friends will have to make these decisions individually. Not merely their abilities but even their consciences will differ. But it is all-important that the decisions should be well made and well followed.

For the same reasons it is difficult to find a service that Friends can do well in a collective way. Of possible lines of activity that suggest themselves some do not really need to be done, some cannot be effectively done by Friends, some cannot be organized on a large scale, and some are too closely connected with war to express our ideals. In rapidly shifting conditions the need of Friends' service will surely present itself. As spiritual pioneers we shall find our place—a large one. It may be that some of the present obstacles will disappear or that by keeping ourselves alert we can discover and create new fields of Quaker service.

So far three lines of service have been very generally suggested:

(1) In England at the outbreak of the war the Friends did some very real and very expressive service in helping the alien enemies who suffered much undeserved persecution. Fortunately not much need for this has yet arisen in this country.

(2) Agricultural work has been suggested for Friends. In some communities Friends are well able to increase the food output and perhaps should organize locally to do so, in others they will be more effective if they merely consult and assist existing agencies. Other Friends lack both the ability and the opportunity to serve in this way. Certainly it would be difficult and perhaps unwise to organize the whole Society along this line. National or international regulation of this matter may be planned by the government. This work has some elements that make it fitting to our ideals of constructive and humanitarian effort. There is no doubt that productive agricultural labor will meet a real demand. Not one country but the whole world stands on the verge of famine, and it is possible that both economy and increase in food will actually save lives. But at present many of our fellow countrymen are regarding it as merely another arm of war, so that any special agricultural work undertaken in the name of Friends should somehow receive a distinguishing stamp.

(3) A Friends' ambulance unit for service abroad would perhaps fulfill many requirements. Many young men are ready to train for and join such an undertaking if it should be started. But it is not yet possible to ascertain whether the governments involved would permit such work to be done by such a unit, or whether the workers would be required to submit fully to military orders, as in the regular Red Cross.

Many other possibilities are being considered, but they, too, have their difficulties. Until these difficulties are solved there will be need for much patience. With our nation at war it is especially hard to find a form of clearly national service that does not involve us more or less directly in the work of killing our fellow-men. We may look forward to great and congenial opportunities when peace comes, and perhaps even before peace comes. Meanwhile we must not chafe at our restrictions nor surrender our ideals but keep ourselves in readiness for every call to sacrifice or service, and by quiet obedience and individual faithfulness in our present tasks learn how in time of war to prepare for peace.

There is a special need that amid the strong current of militarism and with the perplexity of finding our individual duties our conviction on the subject of war should not become clouded or confused, but rather be made clearer and stronger. Many conscientious objectors to war who secretly agree with us look to us for encouragement and support. Without criticizing the motives of others, in the spirit of persuasive love, we may persistently urge all men everywhere to hasten to exchange the method of war for the more excellent way of peace. This is still a supreme service for every Christian patriot.

HENRY J. CADBURY,

Chairman Friends' National Peace Committee.

THE EXEMPTION CLAUSE.

Section 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed, and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organization, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be non-combatant.

JANE ADDAMS'S PACIFIST POSITION.

[Perhaps no so-called pacifist has a hearing at once so extended and so influential as Jane Addams. The following quotations from a recent speech of hers, "to a large and profoundly interested and stirred audience of club women, social workers and others" in Chicago will show how she is still able to sound a constructive note.—EDS.]

We pacifists, so far from passively wishing nothing to be done, contend on the contrary that this world crisis should be utilized for the creation of an international government able to make the necessary political and economic changes when they are due; we feel that it is unspeakably stupid that the nations should have failed to create an international organization through which each one, without danger to itself, might recognize and even encourage the impulse toward growth in other nations.

Pacifists believe that in the Europe of 1914 certain tendencies were steadily pushing towards large changes, which in the end made war, because the system of peace had no way of effecting those changes without war, no adequate international organization which could cope with the situation. The conception of peace founded upon the balance of power or the undisturbed status quo, was so negative that frustrated national impulses and suppressed vital forces led to war, because no method of orderly expression had been devised.

The very breakdown exhibited by the present war reinforces the pacifists' contention that there is need of an international charter—a Magna Charta indeed—of international rights, to be issued by the nations great and small, with large provisions for economic treaty.

Pacifists believe—if I may go back to those days before the war, which already seem so far away—that the United States was especially qualified by her own particular experience to take the leadership in a peaceful organization of the world. We then ventured to remind our fellow citizens that when the founders of this republic adopted the Federal Constitution and established the Supreme Court, they were entering upon a great political experience of whose outcome they were by no means certain. The thirteen colonies somewhat slowly came into the Federation, and some of them consented very reluctantly to the use of the Supreme Court. Nevertheless, the great political experiment of the United States was so well established by the middle of the nineteenth century, that thousands of American citizens shed their blood for the principle of Federal Government and for the contention that the decisions of the Supreme tribunal were binding upon sovereign states.

We pacifists hoped that the United States might perform a similar service in the international field, by demonstrating that the same principles of federation and of an interstate tribunal might be extended among widely separated nations as they have already been established between contiguous States.

It has been officially declared that we are entering this war for the sake of making the world safe for democracy. While we are still free to make terms with our allies, are we not under obligation to assert that the United States owes too much to all the nations of the earth whose sons have developed our raw prairies into fertile fields, to allow the women and children of any of them to starve? Could we not urge that an international commission sit at Athens during the rest of this war, as an international commission sat in London during the Balkan wars? Such a commission might at once insist upon a more humane prosecution of the war, at least so far as civilian populations are concerned, a more merciful administration of the lands occupied, and distribution of foodstuffs to all conquered and besieged peoples.

The United States, the pacifists feel, has not done all that it might and should have done to mitigate the horrors of the war, or to bring the belligerents together, or to unite the neutral nations and exert their full collective strength in the interest of peace and humanity.

It has failed, and it is incumbent on those who deplore this failure to prevent other and perhaps more preventable failures. The pacifists should never forget, or permit the nation to forget, that we are fighting for democracy and peace, for a true internationalism. Everything chauvinistic and unworthy, everything cruel and illiberal, should be frowned upon. We should remember that we are indebted to our ideals not only to English, Scotch, Irish, and French stocks, but also to splendid German elements. We must speak, then, for the whole world, and we must strive to play an energetic part in inaugurating new policies in the international life of the world.

LONDON AND MIDDLESEX QUARTERLY MEETING MINUTE.

At a special meeting of Elders and other Friends of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting held last month, the following minute was passed for sending down to Particular Meetings. It was felt that its wider circulation might be helpful.

"This Meeting . . . has seriously and prayerfully considered our shortcomings in the spiritual life, which have so grievously hampered us as a Church in aggressive work. To this must mainly be ascribed our comparative failure in making our witness for Christ and His Kingdom an effective appeal to our fellows. The chief essential is a personal one—a deeper striving individually constantly to grow nearer to our Lord and Master in deed as well as word, so as to carry the Quaker message into all departments of our lives. We are bound, as heirs to a great tradition, to put forth our united strength, not only to uphold but to increase this heritage, and above all not to permit ourselves to be swallowed up into the materialistic environment of this metropolis. We may perhaps effect this best by acting as if no such traditions were behind us, simply doing our utmost as ambassadors of Christ to bring others into God's Kingdom. For this end our vocal ministry must strive to keep in intimate touch with the spirit and thought of the day, having the windows of the soul open to these fresh breathings of the Divine life. Thus we shall also be ready to open wider the doors of our Society for the entry of inquirers. Thus also our younger and older members, being filled with loving sympathy, will retain close touch with each other and with all who have their faces turned towards the light.

"JAMES EDMUND CLARK, Clerk."

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

Abington Quarterly Meeting convened in Germantown on Fifth-day, the 10th instant, at 3.30 P. M.

Two Friends exhorted the meeting to greater faithfulness in upholding the principles of our Society, one from the text, "But this I confess unto thee that after the way which they call heresy so worship I the God of my fathers," the other from the words, "But as many as received Him to them gave He power to become the sons of God."

At the opening of the business meeting in joint session extracts from the reports of the late Yearly Meeting were read. This was followed by the reading of the letter sent out recently by the Representative Meeting.

Mary J. Warner spoke briefly on the duty of Christians at this time to organize in prayer for a suffering world. George M. Warner urged that discouragement should have no place in our lives; that the armor against discouragement has its source and maintenance in a constant and humble walk with God and a daily seeking to do His will. That to live up to what we believe and to make clear to others the sense of our convictions is the duty of each one of us in these days of darkness and sorrow.

Morris E. Leeds spoke of the work which is being done by the Y. M. C. A. not only for the physical, moral and spiritual welfare of the soldiers in training and prison camps, but also to further the cause of peace among nations. He suggested that a Tea Meeting be held at which this subject should be presented. A number favored this concern and it was referred to the Tea Meeting Committee with power to act.

Samuel Emlen spoke feelingly on the injunction, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Separate sessions for routine business followed the joint session. After a supper served in the Tea-room, Murray Gordon Brooks spoke on "The Women of India" and Thomas Grubb of Ireland on Y. M. C. A. work in the training camps of Great Britain.

MEETING AT CARVERSVILLE, PA.

A meeting appointed with the authority of Lansdowne Monthly Meeting for Samuel W. Jones, was held at Carversville, Bucks County, Pa., on the afternoon of Fifth Month 6, 1917. It was attended by more than one hundred persons, residents of that village and vicinity, a number of whom rarely attend any place of worship. There were also many of the members of the two congregations who meet there, with the minister of one of them. The manner of holding a Friends' meeting was clearly set before the company as the meeting settled into a deep, reverent silence. This was broken by a loving earnest appeal to the Throne of Grace, for a renewed and continued extension of Divine love and mercy to each individual soul. Following a time of solemn silence, the language was revived: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." The invitation was pressed closely home to every condition to co-operate with that witness in every heart who "teaches as never man taught."

The young and middle aged were entreated to surrender themselves to the transforming power of Divine Grace ere the cares and burdens of life make the Christian pathway more difficult to find and follow, and all were committed to the guardian care of a loving heavenly Father through His dear Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, our only hope of salvation.

At the close of the meeting an expression of gratitude was offered to the assembly for their assistance in having made it possible to hold, as was humbly believed, a Friends' meeting, to the honor of Truth.

Many expressed their satisfaction with the opportunity, and one man who is rarely seen at a place of worship, said: "This has been a good meeting, we ought to have this kind often." A woman whose life has been one of many conflicts expressed thankfulness for this privilege and added, "I shall have much to think of for a long time."

The Friends' meeting at Buckingham that morning had been attended by Samuel W. Jones and his wife, Florence Jones, whose company was quite appreciated at both meetings. About fifty persons were in attendance there and much unity and approval were expressed with the service in supplication and testimony that had been given in the fresh openings of Life.

Both occasions of the day were felt to be of special favor. May all the praise be ascribed unto Israel's unslumbering Shepherd, who prompted this service and crowned it with His presence.

There is an earnest hope that exercised Friends will keep their minds so open to the pointings of the Unerring Guide, that if they feel called into this part of the Master's vineyard, they may be faithful. "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth laborers into His harvest."

DOYLESTOWN, PA.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

On the morning of the fifteenth of Fifth Month, Concord Quarterly Meeting assembled at Media.

The solemn hush which overspread us was broken by vocal prayer, and then what seemed the keynote of the meeting was struck, in the words: "The Lord Omnipotent reigneth." We were reminded that, though the sense of unsettlement and overturning might seem almost to shake our faith, yet the stars move on in their appointed courses and all the natural world buds and blossoms into new life.

"We have no need for discouragement because we are so human," was the burden of another message. It is our Heavenly Father's will that we should be in the world, subject to the same temptations as other men, humbled again and again under His hand.

The exercise of prayer overspread the meeting to an unusual degree.

Before the business meetings separated, a joint session enabled a Friend to lay before us the concern for our younger members, which had arisen the preceding day in the meeting of Ministers and Elders. It was not alone for these, however, much as we need their help and feel our hearts drawn on in loving sympathy for them, but that we all might be drawn nearer to one another, and that, if the way rightly opened, a meeting might be appointed to which all who desire the up-building of the Kingdom of Heaven in the earth might come, each with a sense of responsibility for the meeting—each with a desire that all might be blessed and strengthened. An extended discussion of this concern led to the appointment of a special committee, and such a meeting will probably be held within the next few weeks.

The Committee already under appointment to arrange for holding a conference near the old Concord Meeting-house contemplates having such a gathering on the afternoon of Sixth Month 16th, with a basket supper and an early evening meeting for worship in the old house.

This matter, and also the organizing of women's work under the Emergency Service Branch of the Yearly Meeting's Peace Committee were brought before the women's meeting after the adjournment to separate sessions, with other business.

Appreciation was expressed of the presence and services of our friend, Anna G. Crawford.

The lunch hour, with its opportunities for social converse, was, as always, a pleasant feature of the day, and reminded us again of our debt of gratitude to those who serve the meeting in this way.

So our homeward ways were cheered with the feeling that it had been "good for us to be here."

PRAYING PROGRESSIVELY.

For it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do.—Philippians ii:13.

I.

"Lord, help me"—so we pray—
"Help me my work to do;
I am so ignorant and weak,
Make me more wise and true."

II.

"Lord, help me do Thy work,"
We pray when wiser grown,
When on the upward way
Our feet have farther gone.

III.

"Lord, do Thy work through me;"
So—when all self we lose;
His doing and His work, and we
The tools His hand can use.

AMERICAN FRIENDS' SERVICE COMMITTEE.

The American Friends' Service Committee, a body consisting so far of fifteen Friends, five from the meetings constituting the Five Years' Meeting, five from the Yearly Meeting held at Fifteenth and Race Streets, and five from the Yearly Meeting held at Fourth and Arch Streets, has been formed to coordinate and stimulate, so far as it may be able, service along Christian and humanitarian lines by Friends throughout this country. Its second meeting was held in Philadelphia on the evening of Fifth Month 11th. Among the subjects discussed was greater co-operation on the part of American Friends with English Friends in their War Victims' Relief Work in different parts of Europe. In order to secure definite knowledge of what steps should be taken to participate in this work in the best way, it was decided to send to London at once a commission of probably three Friends to confer with English Friends on the subject. Steps also were taken to obtain first-hand information from the State Department authorities in Washington regarding passports for Friends who might desire to work in relief and reconstruction work in Europe. Efforts will also be made to confer on this subject with the French Ambassador and members of the English and French Commissions now in this country.

Another subject claiming attention was that of assisting the Y. M. C. A. in its work amongst soldiers in training camps in this country and in the prison camps of Europe. No decision was reached about this.

Agricultural work was touched on and other forms of service particularly appropriate to the time. It was felt that these various forms of service would require liberal financial support, if the desire to serve, which seems so strong on the part of many at this time, is to be given full expression. That Friends, in this time of world-wide suffering and travail, would be anxious to mitigate this suffering and, in ways that might open, to minister to the needs of humanity, even at great sacrifice of time and money, the Committee felt assured.

The headquarters of the Committee will be in Philadelphia under the care of an Executive Secretary, who will give his whole time to the work. The members of the Committee are:

L. Hollingsworth Wood (N. Y.), Willard E. Swift (Worcester, Mass.), Vincent Nicholson (Richmond, Ind.), Homer Morris (Iowa), Lucy Biddle Lewis, Arabella Carter, J. Barnard Walton (Phila.), Wm. W. Cocks (Long Island), T. Janney Brown (Washington, D. C.), Anne Garrett Walton, Stanley R. Yarnall, Charles J. Rhoads, Henry W. Comfort and Alfred G. Scattergood (Phila.).

THE CHRISTIAN ETHIC OF WAR.

[So far as we are aware since the present world-conflict began, there has been no more serious effort to show that war is compatible with Christianity than this volume from the hand of Dr. P. J. Forsyth. We are gladly reprinting a review of the book from The Venturer. If we are correctly informed, the review was written by our friend Charles I. Evans, of the Leighton Park School.—Eps.]

You will sometimes see in a sweet shop window an ingenious machine for the manufacture of a confection called "buttercreams." It revolves and convolves and involves, patiently "pulling" and kneading the same lump of material, and there seems to be no reason why it should ever stop. Dr. Forsyth's latest book is curiously reminiscent of this process. He sets out with his own characteristic stock of leading conceptions and he keeps assiduously pounding, stating, restating, permuting and combining—brilliantly, not to say bewilderingly; and the result is extraordinarily interesting. But the end of the book finds you no farther on than the beginning.

This is partly due to a certain obscurity which clings pertinaciously to Dr. Forsyth's terminology. The next Forsyth book should have a glossary attached to it, which will tell us in plain terms the precise connotation of "righteousness," "judgment," "Kingdom of God," "the new humanity," and the like. We suspect that these expressions have in the process of time and use gathered a certain esoteric content in Dr. Forsyth's own mind; and this makes it difficult for those who are not privy to the idiom to follow intelligently the swift epigrammatic and (let us frankly add) erratic movement of his mind.

But we also venture to suggest that this book fails because it is occupied in maintaining an impossible thesis. It is more than a herculean task to reconcile war with Christianity; and Dr. Forsyth only does it by reducing the Gospel. We imagine that he is occasionally not very comfortable about it himself. "Let us repress the gibe about Jesuitry," he says. "Casuistry everyone has to practice." As a matter of fact, the word we should use is neither Jesuitry nor casuistry but another with a similar termination. And there is no other way of putting war and Christianity into double harness. What, for instance, are we to say to such a statement as this—"To make such a policy (i. e., the German militarist policy) impossible is a Christian duty, even if it mean some considerable postponement of the Christian ideal." That in a single sentence is the gist of Dr. Forsyth's argument. But he does not seem to have asked whether the German policy can be frustrated by war; nor does he appear to reckon on the possibility of its being stimulated and reinforced by a defeat. His frequent appeals to history justify us in expecting some historical evidence from him that war can accomplish so desirable an end. He tells us in one place that "even John Bright thought there was no means but the American War to destroy the worse evil of slavery." But he does not go on to tell us of the body of competent opinion on the spot to-day which says that it is (to quote a recent writer) "open to question whether it hastened or retarded" the settlement of the Negro question. But even if we were to grant the possibility of permanently frustrating German militarism by force, how can it be a Christian duty to do anything which postpones the Christian ideal? It may be any other kind of duty, but it is to turn language upside down to call it Christian. Dr. Forsyth may have his joke about the "blunt and slashing" type of mind which does not appreciate these subtleties; but the difficulty is not to be settled in that "blunt and slashing" way.

The truth appears to be that Dr. Forsyth has fallen a victim to two things. The first is his own subtlety. Over and over again he uses phrases betraying an impatience with the lay mind which proves him incompetent to be a fair judge. He speaks of "minds untutored either in history or ethic," of "the pietist type of faith," of "sentimental religion of a pietist cast," of "the young and crude," of "the perverse amateur conscience" in a way which suggests not a sympathetic understanding but a too facile confidence in his own sophistication. And this does not make for light. The second pit into which Dr. Forsyth has fallen is his unquestioning acceptance of that idealized case for the war which the politicians and journalists have served up to us. Had he applied his incisive analysis to the plausible half-truths on which the illusion of a "righteous war" has been raised, with as much industry as he has shown in his attempted rout of the pacifists, we should have had a different result. We should at least not have been told that "we stand for the Christian future of the world."

Dr. Forsyth does not appear to us to have seriously endeavored to appreciate the position of the Christian pacifist. The arguments he rebuts are his own versions of what he thinks our arguments to be. If he supposes we have no care for national righteousness, that we are sheer individualists, he is entirely mistaken. Moreover, that we interpret the course of history differently from him does not mean that we are ignorant of it. We happen to consider his interpretations of history and his doctrine of the state to be untenable and obsolete; and we are not a little puzzled that an alert mind like his should still be entangled in the worn-out fallacies of a moribund historical school. But having thus dissented strongly from Dr. Forsyth, let us say in conclusion two things—first, that we are persuaded that we are united with him in a great common hope far more closely than this present controversy would suggest; and second, that we gladly acknowledge to him a heavy debt for all that he has given us of inspiration and light in the past. It is this last circumstance which makes this book so grievous a disappointment.

OURSELVES AND OTHERS.—Whenever we have failed to be loving, we have also failed to be wise; whenever we have been blind to our neighbor's interests, we have also been blind to our own; whenever we have hurt others, we have hurt ourselves much more.—CHARLES KINGSLEY.

ON THE EVE OF THE WAR.

FROM A STATEMENT BY JOHN HAYNES HOLMES IN NEW YORK CITY,
FOURTH MONTH 21, 1917.

But if I will not, or cannot, either as man or minister, have part in the operations of war, how can I talk of such a thing as serving the nation? When the enemy is at the gates, what is there to do but to snatch up a sword and fight? Let me tell you what there is to do. Let me specify at least four things which I propose to do.

First of all, I shall make it my duty to fulfil in word and deed the gracious tasks of what may be called the ministry of reconciliation. In a time of raging hate and brutal passion, I will keep alive that spirit of good-will toward men, through which alone a durable peace on earth may some day be established. . . . When hatred consumes men's hearts, I will keep sweet, wholesome and compassionate. If unfortunate aliens among us are seized and persecuted, I will protect them from the vengeance of my countrymen. If my comrades are reviled and stricken, I will sustain their courage and fortify their patience. If I am myself assailed in bitterness and contempt, I will speak no evil, but "bear all things" unperturbed. I will remember the starving millions of Belgium, Serbia, Poland and Armenia, whom my countrymen may neglect for the more important business of killing Germans. I will remember the burden-bearers of my land who, in times of war as in times of peace, are still the victims of political corruption and economic injustice. I will remember without distinction the peoples of all lands who bear this day the agonies laid upon them by the governments which deceive and use them. Always will I labor to keep open the choked and defiled channels of understanding, sympathy and good-will between hostile nations and divided classes. And above all will I remember that, as an apostle of Jesus Christ, it is my business to preach and practice, not my passions as a man or my prejudices as an American, but that whole and perfect love which is of God.

Secondly, I will serve my country in war time by serving the ideals of democracy which constitute the soul and center of her being. War and democracy are incompatible. When war comes, democracy goes. England, fighting nobly to conquer Prussianism, is herself in process of being conquered by the Prussian spirit. Already in our own country, before the beginning of war, the dread work of militarism is under way. Already freedom of thought is being denied, and liberty of conscience challenged. Already we are in the midst of such an orgy of bigotry, intolerance and persecution for opinions' sake, as America has not seen since the days of the Salem witchess. The whole fabric of democracy is threatened, the priceless heritage of our fathers in peril of loss. America has never been in such danger as she is to-day—and the source of the danger is at home and not abroad. Hence my resolve to serve that America which I love so well that I would not have her made over into the likeness of the militarism which she clamors to destroy. I will do what I can to safeguard free thought and free speech, by practicing both at any cost. I will do what I can to preserve liberty of conscience, by exercising that liberty without flinching. I will do what I can to guarantee to posterity the democratic ideals and institutions of America, by resisting to the death every assault made upon their bulwarks. One such assault is now being made in the movement for universal military training. So long as I have breath to speak, or hand to lift a pen, I will oppose this monstrous thing. By conscription the autocracies of Europe have stood thus long. By conscription, this war, perfectly prepared for, inevitably came. By conscription the minds of men are "cribbed, cabined and confined" to the bounds of that narrow nationalism which is the fiercest foe of brotherhood. By conscription the consciences of men are enslaved to the mastery of those who can command the sinking of the Lusitania and the shooting of Nurse Cavell. By conscription, more effectually than by the attack of German legions, this country can be destroyed, and the fairest experiment of democracy the world has ever seen brought to an untimely end. Therefore will I fight it, and all other devices of militaristic tyranny, and thereby again exalt truly the best interest of my native land.

Thirdly, I will serve my country at this time by preparing the way, so far as I am able, for the establishment of that peace which sooner or later must follow upon war. This struggle, into which now we are about to plunge, cannot go on forever. Some day the bugles must sing truce across the fields of battle, tired warriors ground arms, and statesmen sit in guarded council halls to make an end of strife. And this end must be an arrangement by which Germans and English, Russians and Turks, must continue to live side by side in a common world, engage in the interchange of business, learning and decent courtesy which make up ordered life, and co-operate in the common service of the common interests of our one humanity. . . . Before she herself became a belligerent, this was the task appointed as by the fiat of God for America. But now that she has cast away this sacred charge, it remains for us who cannot take up arms at her behest, to keep it in her stead. How better can we serve our country than by restoring to her, or fulfilling for her, that high mission of peace-making, which is so uniquely and divinely hers!

Lastly, I will serve my country in war time, by serving the dream of international brotherhood. No nation is worthy the allegiance of even the meanest of her citizenry, which is not dedicated to the establishment of that larger and more inclusive life of universal association, which is the glad promise of mankind. America, for more than a hundred years, has been first among the countries of the world, in recognition and service of this ideal. She has been a gathering place of all the tribes of earth—a melting-pot into which the ingredients of every race, religion and nationality have been poured. And out of it has come not so much a new nation as a new idea—the idea of brotherhood. This idea has stamped our people as a chosen people. It has set our land apart as a holy land. It has exalted our destiny as a Divine destiny. And now, with the plunge into the welter of contending European nationalities, all this is gone. Gone, at least, if those of us who see not to-day's quarrel but to-morrow's prophecy, do not dedicate ourselves unflinchingly to the forgotten vision! This I am resolved to do. I will serve America by serving her ideal of humanity. I will open my heart, as she has opened her shores, to all peoples of the earth. I will give love, as she has given hospitality, to the hated and hunted of God's children. And lo, from out my soul, as once from out her soil, shall grow "a tree of life," whose leaves are for "the healing of the nations."

This is my service for the days of war—the ministry of reconciliation, the defence of democracy, the preparation of the gospel of peace, the quest of brotherhood. It is the deliberate espousal of that higher spiritual loyalty which is not so much the destruction as it is the fulfillment of those lower and more carnal loyalties which stir the envy and the hate of men. "For finer spirits . . . there are two dwelling places," says Romain Rolland in Above the Battle, "our earthly fatherland, and that other City of God. Of the one we are the guests, of the other the builders. To the one let us give our lives and faithful hearts; but neither family, friend, nor fatherland, nor ought that we love, has power over the spirit. The spirit is the light. It is our duty to lift it above tempests, and thrust aside the clouds which threaten to obscure it, to build higher and stronger, dominating the injustice and hatred of nations, the walls of that city wherein the souls of the whole world may assemble."—From The Intelligencer.

[This conversation as reported took place in the office of THE FRIEND and was written out at the request of one of the editors because of its evident interest and value.—Eds.]

CULLS.

The old story of the ugly duckling that grew up into a swan is familiar to most of us. Whatever harm the story may have done to imaginative children who were disposed to think of themselves as unappreciated swans, it has an important lesson for parents who find it hard to be patient with the whims of the exceptional son or daughter. A conversation between two fathers may be worth reproducing as presenting a view of this problem from an angle which may perhaps be unfamiliar to some readers of THE FRIEND.

A. "I very much enjoyed meeting thy son, James, a few months ago. He is a very interesting boy."

B. "I am glad to hear thee speak well of him. He is a bright boy. One of his teachers told us the other day that he is the best student in his class. But he is not a good boy. He is a great trial to us."

A. "Don't be discouraged about James. I am sure that he is essentially a good boy, even if he does not take kindly to parental restraint. I know from experience what it is to deal with a son who finds it impossible to accept the point of view of his parents and teachers."

B. "And did thy son turn out all right?"

A. "At least he is a man of correct habits and sound principles, though not a consistent Friend. He used, as a boy, to question everything, and the fact that his elders believed in certain things almost seemed sufficient reason for him to reject them."

B. "That is just the way with James. He quite refuses to accept our point of view and wishes to do many things of which we disapprove. He causes us much uneasiness."

A. "I sympathize with you keenly, but think you ought not to be discouraged. James will probably not be the kind of a man you would wish, but I am satisfied that he will make a man worth while if he is carefully handled. The son of whom I spoke worried us a great deal, probably in much the same ways that James tries you, and at the same age, when so many boys suffer from volcanic emotions. But we held on, and tried not to make occasions of friction, as we were determined not to drive him away from us."

"I believe that an important reason why James is a source of uneasiness to his parents and teachers, is because the classification which has been provided has no group in which he belongs. Permit me to tell thee about the sorting of apples in the Northwest. The system which prevailed there a few years ago was somewhat as follows: Most apples of the same variety lie within a rather narrow range of sizes. Suppose a sort which range from three and one-half inches in diameter down to two and one-half inches. Four sizes would probably be packed, the largest ranging from three and one-half to three and one-quarter inches, the next from three and one-quarter to three inches, etc. Whether sorted by hand or machine, these four sizes would be separated, and all other apples thrown aside. After the graded fruit had been boxed and taken away, a visitor from the East inspecting the piles which remained would be surprised to see among them a few extra large apples. They did not fit the classification. I think our systems for dealing with children, whether at school or at home, sometimes err in the same way, by condemning not only those who fall below our standards, but also those who do not fit because they are too big."

B. "Well, thy view of James's case is encouraging. I thank thee."

It is needless to control our children, while they are children, in regard to what they do, but it is quite impossible to control what they think and believe. It is our duty to teach them what we think and believe, and it gratifies us to find most of them disposed to follow in the beaten paths. But belief is a thing which cannot be compelled, and the fact that an occasional child finds it impossible to accept the point of view of his elders is no proof of innate depravity. Such a disposition of resolute questioning toward generally accepted beliefs is in fact a trait of all pathfinders in every department of knowledge. We may rightly ask of the exceptional sons and daughters, whether they belong among the few big culls or the more numerous little ones, that they conform to our wishes in what they do and to some extent in what they say, at least until they are "grown up." If we have kept the bond of mutual confidence and respect unbroken, they will conform to our wishes out of regard for us. But we must be careful not to be censorious in regard to beliefs and habits of thought.

Often the things which our children see us do and hear us say in every day life influence them more than advice which we offer them individually. There is no sermon so powerful as a consistent Christian life, and many a son, far from his father's house, has been restrained from wickedness by the memory of his parents' circumspect daily walk.

CAIRO UNIVERSITY.

George Vaux, Jr., has put into our hands a letter addressed by C. R. Watson to the friends and supporters of Cairo University. It is accompanied by a personal letter from which we extract this paragraph:

"Out here, one is in the midst of the war zone, and meeting not only those connected with the great conflict, but those who have given a son, or several sons, to it. While naturally there is sorrow and darkness about the awful bloodshed, it is wonderful how the Spirit of God has transfigured death, and made the presence of God seem more real, and immortality to become more real, in the consciousness of those who are thus disciplined."

The project of a Christian university in Egypt is so in line with constructive peace work for the world that we are presenting herewith the bulk of the general letter.—[Eds.]

CAIRO, Egypt, Third Month 21, 1917.

TO THE FRIENDS AND SUPPORTERS OF CAIRO UNIVERSITY:—

Out here in Egypt I am writing under difficulties. For one thing, there is the censor. So I am not free to give you impressions of the war, nor discuss military movements, nor send you any photos or pictures.

I cannot say the voyage over was a pleasant or peaceful trip. Crossing the Atlantic was easy enough at that time, but on the Continent it was an endless round of visiting police and consular offices to get permission either to stop off or to go on. I came to prize my passport more than my pocket-book. On the Mediterranean, I had a particularly anxious time. Our steamer was reported to be "spotted" for torpedo-treatment. We were held up at _____ four days owing to submarine activities outside the port, and all the way one kept his life-preserver within reach, while all lights were extinguished by night.

Here in Egypt I find things much as they were a year and a half ago. One difference, however, is noticeable—business has improved. In Cairo, many new stores have opened up. Prices have gone up markedly. There is a general air of prosperity. The reasons are obvious. The war scare of two years ago has passed. The presence of military forces in Egypt has made an enormous market for all kinds of food-stuffs. Egypt is an agricultural country and responded instantly to the appeal, but saw to it that good profits were forthcoming. Furthermore, here in Egypt "Cotton is King," and cotton has climbed to the high figure of $42.00 a cwt. That is twice the normal price in peace times.

Land values are considerably higher than two years ago, but have not yet come up to prices before the war, so it was indeed well that my coming here to buy land for our university site was not delayed a year longer. The advantages gained by coming at this time have fully justified every risk and discomfort and anxiety of the journey.

But I wonder whether you have any idea what land values are here. In Cairo itself within the building area, large plots have been sold at the rate of $75.00 a square meter, which is about $7.00 a square foot. Agricultural land values run from $300.00 an acre for basin land (only receiving the annual Nile flood) to $1500.00 an acre for sefi land (receiving irrigation all the year round). Nor are these values inflated, for the clear rental which you can get from an acre runs as high as $115.00. An acre will produce ten cwt. of cotton, valued at over $200.00 in peace times (higher now) and the same land is clear for additional crops during our winter.

What a country for agricultural development and what an opportunity for our School of Agriculture!

On my arrival, I took up negotiations with the Government with reference to the place which Cairo University should occupy. My progress has been slower than I wished for, partly because a change of Administration occurred soon after my arrival, when Sir Reginald Wingate, who had been Governor of the Sudan, came into office as High Commissioner of Egypt. This practically required that a fresh start be made in all of our negotiations. Fortunately, I had met His Excellency twice before and so it was only the renewal of a former acquaintance to discuss with him our university project. He was most appreciative of this disinterested undertaking for the uplift of Egypt and commissioned Lord Edward Cecil, of the Ministry of Finance, with the task of carrying forward our negotiations for a site in so far as we might be dealing with the Government. And Lord Edward's kindness has been simply unflinching. Many conferences with various Government departments have been necessary. Those with the Ministry of Education have been most important, for, of course, it is our desire to adapt our efforts to existing educational needs. The curse of the Orient is an artificial education which unfits men for usefulness. Whatever we do we must be eminently practical.

It is naturally impossible to go into details as to the negotiations which I have been carrying on for land. These are still in process, but those who are experienced in Oriental methods of procedure tell me that our progress is quite unusual. For all that, there are difficulties and delays incident to negotiations in Egypt which have made me feel at times that I would like to take an option on Methuselah's life and on Job's patience. For example, the holdings are generally small. When an entire farm may consist of no more than an eighth of an acre, it becomes no small feat to bring together a large area of fifty to a hundred acres. Land is also held generally by families rather than by single individuals, and it is a laborious task to ferret out final ownership. Here you cannot often get an option on a piece of property to secure you while you press forward with other negotiations; you must deal largely on a cash basis and with immediate purchases. Finally, let me add to this list of difficulties, the right of preemption, whereby a neighbor, who had no part in the negotiations, may come in to scoop the advantage of your good bargaining, paying the price you had planned to pay and taking the land. Buying land in Egypt, as you will see, is not an act, but a process. However, we are making good progress in several directions and whichever deal succeeds ultimately we will have an ideal location for our university.

Before I conclude this letter, I must record certain convictions that have been deepened by this visit to Egypt.

Egypt holds a position of unique influence for this whole section of the world. You would realize how true this is from a military point of view if I were permitted to enlarge upon the war situation. But leaving the war aside, Egypt is literally at the confluence of the nations. Here the East and the West touch each other most influentially. Nowhere that I can think of, can America so help this great and needy world of the Near East, as from Cairo and Egypt. Influences set in motion here penetrate not merely into Africa, but into Syria, Arabia, Persia and India.

Then I am convinced as never before that the present is a unique time for establishing a great Christian university here at Cairo. At best, of course, it will take years to get fully under way, so there is no time to lose, for the Moslem attitude toward Western learning and Christian teaching is already one of eager inquiry. This is an attitude which the war has accentuated. The movement of hundreds of thousands of troops in all lands, with all that this has involved of the stirring of stagnant Oriental life, has produced a sort of intellectual and spiritual awakening in the whole Moslem world. Now I should like to amplify and illustrate this statement were it not for the limitations of this letter! But of the many things which Christendom must do to give the awakening East its chance, I can think of no single thing so worth while, so potent in its influence, as the establishment of this center of a strong, well-equipped university, Christian in its moral and spiritual influence and thoroughly up to date in its scientific teaching and training. And America must do it.

The other day I was in a native home where ten out of the fifteen children born into that home had died. It is only suggestive of the awful infant mortality that prevails here. I also know of a mother who called a few weeks ago with her child, the only one surviving of fifteen that she had had. Also a man who is the only one of a family of twenty-one to reach adult years. Now these conditions are generally traceable to a host of traditions, superstitions and religious notions which go hand in hand with ignorance of hygienic principles in their tyranny over life in these Oriental lands. As I see childhood crushed and womanhood degraded, I often ask myself, How can we get at the problem most effectively? To undertake relief measures only, leaving untouched the causes which produce these conditions, seems very hopeless and near-sighted. We must change public opinion and lift the standards of life. This is the unique task of Cairo University as I conceive it. By breaking the tyranny of superstition and ignorance at the top of society and among the leaders of the national and religious world of the Near East, we shall set free helpless women and men and little children too in the lower levels of social life. Only thus can it be done.

I hope to leave Egypt within a month, sailing via the Pacific. I can always be reached, by mail or cable, through George Innes, at our University office in Philadelphia, No. 1005 Land Title Building.

Very sincerely yours,
C. R. WATSON.

A RESTORED CRIMINAL.

THERE are many interesting incidents connected with the recent enthronement of Emperor Yoshihito. So many educators, among them a number of Christian leaders—all Japanese, of course—were decorated, many prisoners were set free and many more had their years of imprisonment shortened, many of the dead had their rank raised, etc.; but there is one story that it seems to me has more interest for some of us than all the others. There was a famous criminal named Muramatsu who had followed this profession from his early boyhood. He had been imprisoned the thirteenth time. There was another criminal put in his room, and together they worked out many schemes which they determined to try to carry out when they got out of prison. One day the wife of Muramatsu San's room-mate called to see if her husband wished anything. He asked her to secure a document of release. She was an ignorant woman and could not read, so she went to a book shop and tried to get a book for him. She found a New Testament. It was large, and had attractive maps of foreign countries which she thought he would like. It seemed to contain much reading and was the cheapest book for its size she could find, so she bought it and took it to him. When he saw it he recognized it as the "Jesus" book and threw it at her. He was so angry. She had not brought him the document he wished and he would have nothing to do with it. Muramatsu San picked it up and said, "I will read it, it is a foreign book. The foreigners are more clever than we are. By reading this book we shall become clever enough to do our wickedness without being caught." With this intention Muramatsu San began to read it. He got to the twenty-first verse of the first chapter—"And thou shalt call his name Jesus." He stopped, and read it again; over and over he read it. He could not go on. The wonder of it struck him silent. He sat long in deep thought. He decided to see what came next. He read—"For he shall save his people from their sins." It was too much. He buried his head in his hands. For the first time in his life he felt he was a sinner, the sinner whom "Jesus came to save." The work in his heart was begun. No more plots were made. He spent his time reading the Bible, which grew more wonderful to him all the time. He resolved when he got out of prison he would earn an honest living and do what he could to save others from the sins which had tempted him. Before he had read far, his co-prisoner was released and took the Bible with him. Muramatsu San wished to continue to read the Scriptures, so he asked the officers to buy him a New Testament. They said it had never been done and they could not get one for him. A Buddhist priest called and tried to get him to study their doctrine, but he refused saying he wanted the "Jesus Book." Again and again he pleaded with the officers to buy him a New Testament. He would pay for it himself with his own small prison earnings. He was so persistent that at last the prison officials held a council and decided to buy him a Bible. It was paid for with his own money. He went on with his study. He came to Matt. ix: 12, 13—"They that be whole need not a physician but they that are sick. . . . I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." This he felt applied especially to his own case. Immediately on being released he began seeking work. He tried until what little money he had was all gone. Then he knew not which way to turn; the temptation came to him to go to a certain rich man's house in Kyoto, as he had planned while in prison, and get what he knew he could find there. He was in Kobe. In his distress he went to the train, but was just too late. He was walking about near the station, when he heard singing in a little chapel near by. He went in, was again profoundly overcome, surrendered, confessed, and as the pastor was very kind to him he told his whole story. The pastor said, "If thou art really sincere and in earnest, I can get thee work." The man assured him he did not wish to do sin again, and that if he could earn even his own food he would rather live the Christian life. He was sent to work in Ishii's orphanage. He proved true and soon began to work for released prisoners. He began in a small way in Kobe, and has rescued many hundred men. He has never felt it right to borrow money. He has often had George Müller experiences. He is a man of faith and of prayer. Doing work of this kind he often has occasion to sign official documents. Since he has been a convict himself he is required by his government every time to state in writing, when he signs or seals an important paper, he must always write in "a criminal in prison thirteen times." This has always been hard to do since he knew "his sins" had "been forgiven." Over and over he has been called to Tokyo by the Home Department to talk over special cases and many questions concerning criminals and his special work. Although much trusted, yet by his Government has he been forever "stamped and sealed" as "a criminal thirteen times." After the Emperor returned to Tokyo, he had Muramatsu San called to Tokyo and His Majesty blotted out "his sin forever" and from that moment he told him he need never again write after his name, "a criminal thirteen times imprisoned." His joy knew no bounds. He was completely overcome with humility and what it meant to be—a "new man in the eyes of his own countrymen" as well as before God. He went to T. Hara's home for Ex-Convicts in Tokyo and had a great thanksgiving meeting and then returned to Kobe.

I said he was a man of great faith. Not long ago he was summoned to Tokyo by the Home Department. He knew the business must be urgent. He could not refuse. He looked in his pocketbook. He had 1.53 Yen. This would not take him to Tokyo, but he felt he must get ready. He spoke to his wife about the call to Tokyo, gave her 1.50 Yen, said good-bye and started to the station with 5 Sen in his pocket. He was praying all the time. After reaching the station he soon felt impelled to go out on the platform. In a moment the express arrived from Okayama. A Methodist missionary living in Okayama stepped off of the train and seeing Muramatsu San on the platform, walked straight up to him and said, "How do you do. I am certainly glad to find you here. Had you not been here I should have had to hunt you up, as here is an envelope with some money for you from Mr. Pettee." Muramatsu San thanked him and God, and went in at the gate and immediately bought his ticket and had just twenty minutes yet before time to take his train.

I have written out this much of a life that is now being lived in Japan, by a real Japanese Christian, that those who may sometimes wonder whether Japanese can be Christianized or not need never again doubt.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE following statement is forwarded to us by the Chairman who has signed it.—[Eds.]

There is now an opportunity for Friends to meet the long-felt want for a more thorough training in the Bible and in social problems. Elbert Russell has been appointed Director of Woolman School, which is being re-organized to make it an undertaking of the whole Society of Friends.

A summer term is being announced for the six weeks, Sixth Month 28th to Eighth Month 10th. The following courses will be given:

Old Testament, Elizabeth W. Collins, 24 hours.

New Testament, Elbert Russell, 24 hours.

History and Message of the Society of Friends, Elbert Russell, 24 hours.

Primary First-day School Methods, Annie Hillborn, 12 hours.

Adolescent First-day School Methods, (To be announced), 12 hours.

Rural Social Problems, Led by Grace W. Brown, with lectures by experts, 24 hours.

International Problems, (To be announced), 12 hours.

Each of the courses will be given 4 hours per week for the six weeks except the Primary Methods which will be given six times a week from Seventh Month 2-14. The Adolescent Methods will follow.

The cost for board and tuition for the six weeks will be $60, if twenty pupils or more register; if less on a sliding scale with a maximum of $75. The only other expense is a $5 registration fee and books, laundry and railroad fare.

The permanent location of the school not having yet been selected the summer term will be held in the present well-equipped house in Swarthmore, Pa.

The school has for three years been giving a short course of three months, in the fall, winter and spring. Its purpose is to meet the need for something more thorough than the work that can be given at summer school or conference, and at the same time make it available to the rank and file of the Society who have not had the opportunity of more advanced college work in the Bible.

The Board of Managers which is being organized to take over the school at the beginning of the summer term has as temporary Chairman, Carolea M. Wood, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., and temporary Secretary, J. Barnard Walton, 140 N. Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia. Registrations for the summer term can be sent to Grace W. Brown, Woolman School, Swarthmore, Pa., or to Elbert Russell, 725 Euclid Avenue, Roland Park, Baltimore, Md.

HENRY J. CADBURY,
Chairman of Executive Committee.

The meeting at Woodstown, N. J., while never very large, was maintained until about 1906. Since then the house (a small frame one, situated on the main street, near the northern part of the town) has been opened only when some one interested has had a concern for those of the neighborhood. During the summer of 1916 it was opened the last First-day of each month, and there was a good attendance each time. There are about thirteen of our members residing within close proximity to the meeting-house, of these eight are children. Two of the families have continued to meet at one of their homes during the past winter.

It was my privilege, in company with a few others, to sit with them on the afternoon of Fourth Month 29th. He who gathers with rightly gathered assemblies everywhere was present.

Our Friends in Woodstown are desirous of having their meeting-house opened this summer. They feel their weakness and are anxious that Friends bear them upon their hearts, and as right openings offer visit them. They propose having the meeting the last First-day of each month at 3 o'clock.

NATHANIEL B. JONES.

The Boston Transcript has this interesting item: The stand taken by American Friends, in so far as Yearly Meetings have been held, is that our Government is to be upheld, and that Quakers are lacking not at all in patriotism and in hatred of autocracy. But they deplore war, and so they have decided to pursue two courses. One is to pray and work that Americans may not hate their enemies, but only the evil that has brought on the war. An active campaign has been mapped out by American Friends to do what they can to keep down hate. The other course is one of relief for noncombatants and others suffering by the war, such relief to be given here and abroad. Into measures for such relief the whole strength of American Quakerism, Orthodox and Hicksite, is being thrown.

A GREAT nation-wide Conference on "Democracy and Terms of Peace" has been called for New York City, Fifth Month 30 and 31, by persons representing all shades of the peace movement, labor unions, Socialist organizations and kindred bodies. Headquarters are at the Holland House, where Louis P. Lochner, former Secretary of the Ford Peace Expedition, Elizabeth Freeman, legislative Secretary of the Emergency Peace Federation and Roy Brazzle, labor unionist, are in charge as an executive staff.

Among the principles laid down in the tentative program are: A speedy and universal peace in accordance with suggestions of President Wilson to the belligerents and by the revolutionary government of Russia, on a basis excluding forcible annexation and punitive indemnities; a demand that the United States announce its war aims in definite and concrete terms, and that it make peace the moment these aims are attained, regardless of the territorial ambitions of any other nation.

It is proposed that the Conference pledge itself against enactment of and for the repeal of all compulsory military training and service laws, to uphold freedom of conscience and support conscientious objectors, to defend constitutional rights of freedom of speech, of press and of assemblage, to work for the democratization of the diplomacy of the United States, for the establishment of the principle of referendum on war.

SINCE our last issue, says The Friend [London] of Fourth Month 27th, further particulars have been published of the circumstances under which Dr. Rendel Harris reached Corsica after his ship had been torpedoed, while his friend, Dr. Moulton succumbed to the exposure. There were, it appears, six boats in which passengers and crew were got away after the ship had been torpedoed at midnight. Five of the boats reached a port without grave difficulty. Dr. Harris and Dr. Moulton were in the sixth boat, which, having separated from the rest, was driven out of its course by bad weather. It was over four days before it made land on the Corsican coast, by which time about half the occupants of the boat, including Dr. Moulton, had died. It is remarkable and cause for much thankfulness that after such prolonged exposure in the midst of such suffering our Friend is among the survivors. As reported last week, he is making good progress to restored health.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Ex-ambassador Joseph H. Choate died suddenly on the night of the 14th. He was characterized by Mayor Mitchell as "New York's foremost citizen."

A State-wide organization of sub-committees of the New Jersey Citizens' Union will try to arouse public sentiment to the necessity of insisting upon prison reform, according to J. A. H. Hopkins, chairman of the Committee on Institutions of the Union. He said that the fight for prison reform in New Jersey and New York would be along parallel lines, and that there would be close co-operation with the People's Campaign Committee in New York.

According to a statement issued by Director Samuel L. Rogers, of the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce, there are estimated to be in the United States at the present time, in round numbers, 100,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive. This number represents very nearly 10 per cent. of the estimated population of the country—between 103,000,000 and 104,000,000. The selective military draft will be from this 100,000.

Bookkeepers and office assistants die youngest and farmers die oldest according to a Bureau of Statistics report, based on an analysis of deaths recorded by a life insurance company between 1911 and 1913. The average age of death among bookkeepers and clerks was thirty-six years, and among farmers fifty-eight years.

Tennis courts and golf links are unfit for vegetable gardens, and well-intentioned persons who expect to transform them into productive gardens are doomed to disappointment, according to the authorities of the Pennsylvania State College Agricultural School. The soil from which tennis courts are constructed, they say, is heavy and without plant food. Golf course turf is a paradise for injurious insects, caution the college experts.

Alarming reports are coming from the country sections all over New England, about the slaughtering of cattle and the turning of milch cows into pasture where they will "dry up" for want of grain. A substantial reduction in the milk supply is the immediate result, and a serious shortage next fall, if nothing is done to stem the movement.

Honey now makes up about two-and-a-half per cent. of the sugar supply of the United States. This council of bee experts has undertaken to stimulate the 800,000 beekeepers in the country to produce this season three-and-a-half per cent. of the total sweets that will be used. The "war programme" calls for the making of at least 350,000,000 pounds of honey.

Marshall Joffre, idol of the children of France, received on their behalf a check amounting to approximately $175,000, the gift of the school children of Massachusetts and citizens of New England on Boston Common. The presentation was made by Mary Curley, the eight-year old daughter of Mayor Curley, who handed the hero of the Marne a gold casket containing a statement of the sum raised for the war orphans of France.

Cotton-seed meal in rather limited amounts has been fed, with excellent results, to a pen of thirty pullets on the experiment farm of the United States Department of Agriculture. These pullets have averaged 52.3 eggs each in twenty weeks, which is practically equal to the best egg yield received this year from any of the other experimental flocks.

FOREIGN.—At the inaugural dinner of the new American-Japanese Society in Tokio, Baron Goto said: "There are few questions of such vital moment to the welfare of mankind as the relations of Japan and the United States. The era of the Pacific promises to surpass that of the Mediterranean or the Atlantic. All the forces of the East and West will meet. Will they unite or clash? I believe it lies in the power of the United States and Japan to answer that question, on which the future happiness and progress of the world will depend."

Commenting on the improving conditions in Mexico, the Boston Transcript says: "More important than anything else is the profound intellectual awakening that the revolution has brought to the submerged classes in Mexico. They are roused to a new freedom and are dimly comprehending the fact that to avail themselves of it they must learn and know. The education of the masses in Mexico has been retarded by two great forces: on one side was the reluctance of the people who controlled the resources of the country to supply means for schools and teachers; on the other, was the contented ignorance of the people themselves. They knew that they were ignorant, but did not rebel against it. They have now been so exploited and victimized that they are at last shaken out of their lethargy."

NOTICES.

New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westley, R. I., is to be opened with the meeting of Ministers and Elders on Seventh-day, the second of Sixth Month, at eleven o'clock.

Stephen Hobhouse, at the court-martial rehearing of his case, where he received a second sentence of two years at hard labor, said:—

"A sea of death and darkness is flooding Europe to-day. God holds in readiness an ocean of love and light to purge away that hateful flood. My highest service is to be one tiny channel for the waters of healing. If I am faithful, if my comrades in every land are faithful, if you soldiers will heed the inward witness of your spirits, the deadly darkness of war will be swept away, never again to spoil the beauty of God's world. 'Thou shalt not fear man; thou shalt not hate man; thou shalt love thy fellowman as thyself, even if that fellowman be the hated and despised Samaritan or the brutal Roman oppressor.' So rang out once Christ's call to love—so it rings out again to-day. It sounds through prison walls, it re-echoes into Germany across the blood-stained trenches. There is nothing mightier than fearless love, and it must conquer in the end. Governments may indeed wear out our bodies with harshness, but no power on earth, except our own inward disloyalty, can arrest our contribution to the final victory of justice and love. Gentlemen, my heart is free of all bitterness and ill-will towards you, my judges, the instruments of a short-sighted Government. I pray that you also may soon know the fuller liberty of spirit, which we, the prisoners of hope, are striving to win for a world in chains."—The Friend (London).

THE EXEMPTION CLAUSE.

Last week we printed the exemption clause from the conscription bill, now made law by the President's signature and proclamation. It is a notable recognition of the rights of conscience, grounded in religious conviction. Many Friends sincerely regret that exemption had to be limited to distinct religious sects. There is an undoubted element of unfairness in this, and yet it is in a sense comforting that two or three hundred years of consistent testimony bearing by very small groups of people, should win national recognition for the supremacy of conscientious conviction. This may point the way for a final triumph of a great principle. The little cloud of promise in this small amount of exemption may develop into that which in the end will water the whole earth with a more general outpouring of liberty! We need to nationalize and inter-nationalize the process which has secured this small amount of freedom. How to do so, other than by being faithful to our well-understood position, may not be immediately clear, but it presents one of the obligations devolving upon us as members of an apparently privileged class. It is the kind of privilege that must be recognized in a real democracy as a right if we are to progress toward the higher freedom.

There are, however, other more distinct and more immediate obligations put upon us by this exemption clause that we shall all need to remind ourselves of many times, perhaps, before the painful business of this war is concluded.

It is not conceivable that Congress and the President would exempt any as "mere slackers," nor yet as "mere objectors," even on conscientious grounds. As a background for exemption there has been an undoubted record of unselfish patriotic service during a long term of years. So the exemption clause is most particularly and immediately a challenge. Let us make it personal. Are our homes organized on the service plan without extravagance or ostentation? Could we, as most English Friends did, receive into them two, four or even a dozen homeless refugees? Could orphaned children or heart-broken mothers find shelter in an emergency under our roofs? Upon what plan do we conduct our business? Do we put profit first, or the welfare and happiness of our associates and employees? What are our general social relations? Are we first to respond to relief and uplift work? Are we leaders in the constructive processes of society? It bears repetition. The fact that our forbears have been foremost in all these lines of positive citizenship has won for us the recognition that is expressed in exemption. We can not in any good grace do less than they. The call is clearly that, if possible, we should do more. The young life in our Society in America, as in England, has reacted instantly. Some may have been hasty, may have taken false steps. The counsel to cautious action in the article that had a first place in last week's issue will be good for us all. But we can not afford to leave any ground for question as to the confidence that exemption puts in us. When the war is over it should be more clear than ever that "our better way of life" is quite as certainly a better way for our country as for us.

THE SACRAMENT OF SILENCE.

What the sacraments are to devout souls in so-called Catholic communions, our times of silent introversion are, or ought to be, to us, whose confession is that Christianity is the religion of the Spirit, and that the flesh profiteth nothing in begetting or nourishing the life of God in man.

Believing that the mystery of godliness, the manifestation of the Eternal Christ in the flesh; living our common life; sharing our common lot; battling with our temptations; grappling with our problems; perfected by enduring our sorrows; has made the whole of life sacramental, we do not crave special ceremonial sacraments. God was in Christ, coming into human circumstances. The Incarnation brought heaven and earth together in mystic communion and glorified our common dust with the splendor of the Divine. We cannot put back the clock now. Whatever happens to humanity things cannot be quite the same they were before Jesus came in our flesh and lived that life, and died that death, and won that resurrection victory for us all.

But how can we eat of His flesh and drink of His blood that His life may be in us, and that we may know that the day of the Paraclete has come on which He dwells in us and we in Him, and that our life is hid with Christ in God? His flesh is meat indeed and His blood is drink indeed! But how and when and where may we partake of this heavenly food?

It is here where our Quaker silence helps us. For what others seek in elements which their senses declare to be material, but which are supposed to have been mysteriously transformed into the very substance of the Saviour's flesh and blood in order to become the soul's life, we actually find, without being obliged to accept such a view, in that silence which is more than stillness. There is a sacramental silence in which we sit at the Lord's table and spiritually taste and handle things unseen. The prostration of the spirit before the Divine majesty in the silence of the inner sanctuary makes it possible for the Divine and the human to flow into each other. Whenever this contact is established the silence has become sacramental. It has become the vehicle for that which is deeper than words. The hand of suppliant faith has touched the golden sceptre in the hand of the King. For the soul, because of its Divine origin opens inwardly into God. It is conscious of a vacuum within it which only God can fill. Its very constitution cries out for the Living God, as a harp calls for a harper whose master touch can alone waken its chords into music. Yea, it is restless till it has found through Christ the rest of God.

Shall we not then respect the silence, whether in our meetings or in our private devotions, or as we reverently pause before partaking of our meals? We may make it sacred and sacramental if we but enter it with reverence and godly fear, not belittling it as a mere Quaker heirloom, or as "our method of worship," but rather esteeming it as the divinely appointed means of approach to Christ, the soul's true Altar, where we meet with His healing and His peace. SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, BRITISH COLUMBIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

TO ALL BEARING THE NAME OF FRIENDS IN AMERICA:—

British Columbia Quarterly Meeting of Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends assembled in regular session at Vancouver, B. C., the twenty-eighth of Fourth Month, 1917, has been led to consider sympathetically the present condition of American Friends in regard to the war in Europe, realizing the disappointment that they must feel in that their country has been drawn into the conflict.

In particular we fully comprehend that many Friends, as a result of strong conscientious objections, will probably be called upon to suffer in bearing their active testimony against war, and we desire to convey to these Friends a message of loving sympathy, and to assure them that we shall be one with them in fellowship and prayer.

We also feel that any who are called upon to endure persecution will have the encouragement of knowing that those who stand firm for conscience' sake will be, in a special manner, a strength to their country and their fellows in after days.

WRITTEN IN THE DARK DAYS.

BY HORACE GREELEY, IN 1863.
O God! our way thro' darkness leads
But thine is living light;
Teach us to feel that day succeeds
To each slow wearing night.
Make us to know, tho' pain and woe
Beset our mortal lives.
That ill at last in death lies low
And only good survives.

Too long the oppressor's iron heel
The saintly brow has pressed;
Too oft the tyrant's murderous steel
Has pierced the guiltless breast.
Yet in our souls the seed shall lie
Till thou shalt bid it thrive.
Of steadfast faith that wrong shall die
And only right survive.

We walk in shadow; thickest walls
Do man from man divide.
Our brothers spurn our tenderest calls,
Our holiest aims deride.
Yet tho' fell craft with fendish thought
Its subtle web contrives,
Still falsehood's textures shrink to naught
And only truth survives.

Wrath clouds our sky, war lifts on high
His flag of crimson stain,
Each monstrous birth o'erspreads the earth,
In battle's gory train.
Yet still, we trust in God the just,
Still keep our faith alive
That 'neath thine eye all hate shall die,
And only love survive.

"THE RISING GENERATION."

[F. B. G. Branson has put the following into our hands. It is a report in the Somerset and Wilts Journal of an address by Anna Barlow before the Sisterhood of the Wesleyan Chapel.—Eds.]

I have chosen this as the title of my address because my thoughts are being driven more and more into the future. I find myself wondering, Where are we drifting? What is to be the future of Europe, of our own dear country, of our own people? Sir Robert Baden-Powell has said, "The real issue of the present war will be decided in 1940, by the quality of life then surviving at early manhood and womanhood in the now combatant nations." That is to say, "What sort of people will our grandchildren be?"

I am speaking to many men and women who are dealing with the rising generation in its early stages, and I am going to tell you quite simply what seems to me the matters of great importance in bringing up our children; because I firmly believe we are at a crisis in the history of our country, that many old conventions will have to be swept aside, that we must frankly face what it is we are wanting, what kind of men and women will best sustain the worthiest traditions of Britain.

I believe this question lies almost entirely in the hands of the mothers. Teachers share this responsibility to a great degree, but they will be the first to admit that the atmosphere, the tone of the home is first stamped on the child.

What are the three predominant qualities we want to develop in our children? Clean living, truth-speaking, God-fearing. You will not be surprised when I put, as one of the first necessities of clean living, temperance. I believe that if we could sweep away the drink habit from our midst we should have a different type of physique among our people. For we find that the curse of drink descends in one form or another from generation to generation, in the form of poverty, physical and mental defect, and the weakening of the constitution. When a serious illness comes, the patient is unable to recuperate, nature has been interfered with, and cannot recover owing to the enfeebled condition of the body generally. The surgeon dreads operating on a patient accustomed to take alcohol.

Children lie very often from fear, and sometimes because they have vivid imaginations. Let us gently lead them to feel that to lie is a real and terrible evil, that it is the bounden duty of us all to speak as simply, clearly and accurately as we are able. But if you train your child on these lines it is only fair to warn you that there is one profession which will forever be closed to him—diplomacy—in which, as far as I can judge, there is no pretence at honesty, and a man must be prepared to lie freely as he considers occasion requires. But diplomacy, as it exists at present, is a mediæval survival, one of those things which must be either swept away or reformed.

The expression "God-fearing" is often misunderstood. Fear we associate with trembling and anxiety and dread. I do not mean this at all. I mean rather that, of all that we teach our children, nothing, nothing is as important as to give them the knowledge of God, and that we shall have to do by demonstration in our own everyday existence. It is the only sure and certain way. If our children see that we, in very truth, love the Ideal, the Perfect, the Holy, they will wend their little steps along the same path. Let us be sure it is a lesson of love which they learn, or we shall leave a dreary conception in their young minds of what is warmest, most glowing in creation. It is in the hands of mothers whether wars continue on this earth or not. Wise and learned men—presidents, peers, divines, members of Parliament—are gathering in groups to decide how best to prevent wars. But I believe you are far more powerful to do this than they are. You and I, in our day and generation, have to think out for ourselves and teach our children according to the light that is given us. Is war to be the method of settling disputes between nations, or are we to find another way? We cannot shirk this issue. All legislation in the coming years will depend on the answer. As you train your children, so will be the answer. Are you going to tell them that war is the right and Christian method of settling international quarrels? If so, let us model ourselves on the German pattern. Let every man be trained in arms to know how best to kill or maim other men. When you pray, as I earnestly trust you will pray, for guidance in this matter, it may still at first seem to you that there is no alternative. The atmosphere of militarism is growing daily among us; the man who has slain most men is the hero. But to some of you there may, and I believe there will, come a vision of what might be—a world where men refuse to slay men, even as wolf will not hunt wolf. Wars will continue till men refuse to fight; but even this refusal will fail if made by men from wrong motives.

I suppose any mother here would dread to see her son a coward, or her daughter either, for that matter. This new ethic must come, if it comes at all, by young men and maidens, fearless and full of faith—Faith in the Power of God, and faith in the divine in man. Did our Lord go meekly to His death on the cross, offering no resistance to the Roman soldiers—did He allow the apparent triumph of all the Powers of Evil, gently, humbly, patiently, in order that we might be satisfied with the ethics of the Northcliffe press? No—and I verily believe that the future of the Spiritual Life in this country lies in the hearts of the mothers—more especially the mothers of the workers—those silent, strong, enduring souls. It is to them I look for the answer to the question, Must war continue?

The dawn will come, a dawn which no press, no peer, no government, no power on earth can stay—the dawn of the Brotherhood of Man. That is why I ask you, in view of your responsibilities to the rising generation, to face this question afresh, each one in his or her breast taking counsel of God. Then, if you come to the conclusion that we must find another way of settling our difficulties than by hacking, maiming and destroying one another—then teach that, as the Truth, to your boys and girls, telling them that in their hands the peace of the world will lie. They are the pioneers of a Christianity as new, as fresh, as compelling, as when He taught it 2,000 years ago, sitting by the water's edge with the simple fisher-folk and peasants drinking in His words,

Knowing this—that never yet
Share of truth was vainly set
In the world's wide fallow;
After hands will see the seed,
After hands from hill and mead
Reap the harvest yellow.

Thus, with somewhat of the seer,
Must the moral pioneer
From the future borrow;
Clothe the waste with dreams of grain,
And, on midnight's sky of rain,
Paint the golden morrow!

J. RENDEL HARRIS'S ESCAPE.

We have already printed two brief notes in regard to the second escape of Dr. Harris from a torpedoed ship. The Friend (London) of Fifth Month 4th gives further graphic details in an account furnished to the Manchester Guardian by a member of the Serbian Relief Committee. It is written from Ajaccio as follows:

"That day we had been entertaining the boys from our Serbian school at Bocagnano for their prize-giving. As the carriages drove up with the people, the boys lined up and gravely saluted. . . . They all looked as if they had been ill for months. Very feebly they descended; in most cases their feet and legs were bandaged. Lady Boyle, who intended receiving them, had to disappear. The sight was too much for her.

"What was our intense astonishment to see one of our Quaker organizers here [John W. Harvey] suddenly embrace an old white-haired, white-bearded gentleman of about seventy, and with tears in his eyes place him in a chair. When they had recovered from their mutual surprise, he announced that it was Dr. Rendel Harris, the famous Dr. Harris, and an old friend of his. I tried to recover from my amazement as quickly as possible and to do something for these poor souls. They all asked for hot baths and tea, and while waiting told little incidents of their experiences. No wonder they looked ill!

These poor creatures had been for four days and four nights in an open boat, tossed about in the awful storm which raged here last week-end. During this time they lived on biscuits and water, and were shadowed by the German submarine, the inhuman occupants of which pointed a gun at them and endeavored to extract information. Fourteen of their number perished from shock and exposure, and had to be thrown overboard, one by one, by their suffering companions.

"One of the women was a stewardess, the other a medical doctor's wife. A gentleman, a solicitor, had been torpedoed three times. This time he rowed in an open boat for ninety hours. He cannot sleep, not even under morphia. Five of the crew are in our hospital here, and all passengers and crew bear the stamp of a nervous strain impossible to comprehend. They were all put to bed, where they still are, except Dr. Harris. That wonderful being—man or something more—got up on the following day to visit and console the others, all about half his age.

Rendel Harris's story of the last days of his friend Dr. Moulton, written to his brother, W. F. Moulton, M. A., is one to place alongside the best "tales of the sea." Physically, be it remembered, Dr. Moulton was far from well, yet he played a hero's part in the boat. He toiled at the oar till sickness overcame him; he assisted to bale out the boat and to bury (is that the right word?) the bodies of those who fell. He said words of prayer over poor Indian sailors, and never, never complained or lost heart for a moment, through the whole of the three days and more of his patience, though the waters were often breaking over him and the water must have often been up to his middle."

THE AMERICAN PLAN.

[The following is taken from an able tract by Professor William I. Hull. It presents historical matter with which Friends should be fortified for constructive peace.—Eds.]

The United States has given the world many illustrious examples of the peaceful settlement of knotty international disputes by means of arbitral tribunals or joint commissions of inquiry and conciliation. At least eighty-three such disputes it has settled by these rational, inexpensive, civilized and honorable means.

In Washington's administration, when the French Revolution was raging and had involved all of Europe in it, a large part of the American people had as hearty a sympathy with France as exists now for the Allies, and demanded that President Washington should lead the country into war on the side of France, which had aided the Americans so greatly during our own Revolutionary War, and against Great Britain with whom we had recently emerged from an eight years' war. President Washington insisted, however, on maintaining American neutrality, and he sent Chief Justice John Jay to England to adjust with that country a number of outstanding grievances and injuries which we believed that England had inflicted upon us both on land and sea. Jay succeeded in making a treaty, the most important feature of which was an agreement to settle the most exasperating difficulties by means of arbitration. The arbitration was successful, the difficulties were adjusted, and the modern history of arbitration was begun—a history in the course of which more than 240 international disputes have been settled by arbitration. Jay's treaty was for a time enormously unpopular in America; Jay was accused of having betrayed the honor, the independence and the vital interests of his country, and he was burned in effigy and almost universally denounced. Washington, too, came in for a large share of condemnation, and so bitter was the contumely and denunciation heaped upon him that he even expressed the wish that he had never been born. How amply he has been justified by history need not be told; and the fact that he soon became and has remained ever since "first in the hearts of his countrymen" is due largely to his heroic determination to maintain to the bitter end the policy of neutrality and not to lead our Republic into the European Armageddon.

Four years later, when the European tempest was still raging, and even a majority of the President's own party under the leadership of Alexander Hamilton was clamoring for a war with France in order to avenge infractions of our neutral rights upon the seas, President John Adams determined to keep the country out of war and to settle the dispute by peaceful means. Even after hostilities had begun, and in defiance of his own party, without the consent and almost without the knowledge of his own Cabinet, he sent commissioners to France, and succeeded in negotiating a just and peaceful settlement. This act split his party in twain and lost him all chance of re-election to the Presidency. But well might he have said, with Henry Clay, that he "would rather be right than be President." And he did say, a score of years after his heroic act, that he would rather have inscribed upon his tombstone the words, "Here lies John Adams, who took upon himself the responsibility of the peace with France in 1800," than the record of any other event in his long and illustrious public career.

The patient efforts of Jefferson to keep the country out of war with France and England during the eight years of his Presidency, and during the height of the Napoleonic cyclone, were rewarded with success, however unwise one or two of his measures may be considered; and his patience was rewarded by the peaceful acquisition for the country of the vast Louisiana Territory which carried our national domain from the Mississippi to the Rockies.

Madison, too, made persistent attempts to tide the country safely over the Napoleonic Wars, at a time when both England and France were disregarding in most exasperating fashion our neutral rights. He would probably have succeeded both in keeping the peace and in asserting neutral rights had it not been for the party of "War Hawks" who hounded him and the country into the war. The War of 1812 was one of the most singular wars in history. It might just as well have been fought against France as against England, so far as the contempt on both sides for our neutral rights was concerned; it was an attack made by our Republic against the chief opponent of Napoleon's political despotism and lust of conquest; it began after Great Britain had withdrawn the Order in Council which was its immediate cause; its only real victory was won after peace had been made; and the treaty which ended it said nothing whatever about the main disputes which had caused it. It brought Madison re-election to the Presidency; but it brought a successful general, Andrew Jackson, to the fore, and he dominated the political arena for a score of years, filled the Presidency for two terms, dictated his successor, and kept out of the President's chair all the "War Hawks" who had precipitated the war.

President Polk was the next President to lead the country into foreign war, and participants in it (like General Grant) have joined with historians (like Theodore Roosevelt) in denouncing it as an unjust war of unholy aggression. It sowed the seeds of slavery and secession in the West, and these sprung up into the terrible harvest of Civil War in 1861 to 1865.

President Lincoln's refusal to go to war with Great Britain over the retention of the Confederate envoys, Mason and Slidell, who had been captured by a United States man-of-war, at a time when the country loudly demanded that they should be kept, has been completely vindicated by history. The dispute between our country and England over the Alabama Claims was another dispute which England declared involved its "national honor," and which we declared involved our "vital interests," since the Alabama and her sister cruisers had completely swept our commerce and merchantmen from the seas. But this dispute, too, was peacefully settled by the Geneva Arbitration.

Again, in 1895, the United States and England were on the verge of war over the question of Venezuela's boundary, and England claimed that a vast territory settled by her own citizens was involved, while we claimed that the Monroe Doctrine was at stake. It was a very popular pastime in those years among a large section of our people to "twist the British Lion's tail," and the jingo spirit ran high and strong. But the appointment of a joint commission of inquiry and an arbitral tribunal settled the dispute in a just and peaceful way.

WHY I WANT TO BE A FRIEND.

I have read "Why I Am a Friend," also "Why I Remain a Friend." I would like to state "Why I Desire to be a Friend."

I realize that the Old Testament did not, seemingly, prepare the Jew to recognize the Messiah when He came. I fear that reverting to it so largely has not placed people since His coming in position to really get acquainted with Him. Not that I set at naught the Old Testament, it has its place to fill. But the New Testament really makes one acquainted with the Master, and I think the Friends have built almost entirely on its facts; therefore are acquainted with the Prince of Peace whose Kingdom is not of this world, but is a kingdom of love whose citizens will not fight. I see the Christian judged by the Gospel of Jesus Christ, hence my desire to become a member of that branch of the Church on earth which follows most closely the revealed words of Jesus as I see it.

G. ROBERTS ROGERS.

ANGER is a confluence of all the irregular passions; there are in it envy and sorrow, fear and scorn, pride and prejudice, rashness and inconsideration, rejoicing in evil and a desire to inflict it, self-love, impatience and curiosity.—JEREMY TAYLOR.

MESSAGE.

Our friend Wm. C. Allen is one of a dozen ministers on the Pacific coast to sign this message.

TO THE CHURCHES ON THE PACIFIC COAST:—

Dear Brethren:—Now that we are plunged into this terrible maelstrom of world war, we ask you to consider that ultimately it will be Christ and His gospel of good-will alone who will answer all social and international needs. The Christian barque of love may be sorely distressed and almost founder if we fail to hold forth this immutable principle to the world to-day.

The cries of those who in various ways inflame the vindictive spirit tend to destroy the spirit of love in our hearts and so wound our own souls and hinder human brotherhood. We beg of you, our dear brothers and sisters, to do what you can to advocate and maintain a Christian spirit in this time of war.

The New Testament declares "Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord, therefore if thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirst give him drink." We venture to ask that you join with us in endeavoring to lift up the banner of a universal Christian spirit—remembering that Christ died for all and that the peoples of other lands and of all races are the children of the one Father with ourselves. To us is committed the gospel of reconciliation. We, ourselves, must some day appeal for the same forgiveness that our Lord enjoined should be exercised toward those who trespass against us.

We ask you to think of the children under your care, that the serious damage done to child life abroad since the outbreak of this war may not be duplicated among us.

Let us remember that after this season of human agony days of reconstruction must follow and that now in the shock of human conflict, it will be well for us to keep our vision so clear and our faith so strong that we may then be prepared to assist in the upbuilding of the broken walls of Christ's Kingdom, and proclaim Christian unity as essential to world unity.

This Kingdom, which we are seeking to promote, is spiritual. The Divine resources can never fail. Let us enter into much prayer, asking that the flood tide of His love may so sweep over the world that our own hearts may yield thereto and wars among Christian peoples cease.

EMERGENCY COMMITTEE FOR HELPING ALIENS.

"THE COMMUNITY OF OUR WORK."

There have been fresh evidences lately of the response from Germany to our efforts here, and of the likeness between our work and that of the Berlin Committee. The animating spirit is evidently so much the same that a wife left behind in England wrote to her repatriated husband in Germany, "Just write your letter and send it to St. Stephen's House at Berlin and they'll send it for you." The italics are ours.

Dr. Rotten wrote Third Month 8th:—

"Just a few lines to tell you that a second parcel from Berne arrived to-day containing the remainder of the reports about your work—namely, 25 copies of your Fourth Report and 100 copies of "A Day at St. Stephen's House." We are much pleased to make these vivid descriptions of your assistance to the Germans in England accessible to so many, as our experience has taught us that direct information has a much greater effect than our own full or abbreviated translations. But we try again and again with the latter, and at the present moment two different sketches of our endeavors in England and Germany for mutual help have been accepted by various papers, so we may hope to be able to send you a copy before long. Grateful as ever, with kindest greetings in the name of all."

The same idea is carried further in a letter received by one of our helpers from a personal friend in Germany:

"Your printed report which came into my hands a few days ago has made me very happy. I was not surprised, but it only strengthened my belief in you and in the good in humanity. What you have done and are still doing brings nearer the goal that now seems so far off—everlasting peace grounded in respect and mutual understanding."

The following extracts from letters recently received from Dr. Rotten give interesting information about some of the efforts which the Committee is making to keep alive the spirit of humanity in war time.

THE RELATIVES OF MEN IN RUHLEBEN.

"When in April of last year after repeated applications by us, regular visits by the wives and children were at last permitted, the regulations were at first rather strict. The separation of husband and wife by a table was felt to be a special hardship. The visits taking a satisfactory course, however, this was altered in a few weeks, and since then visitors have been allowed in the Camp itself and may walk around and converse freely with their relatives. Permission was indeed soon extended to mothers and sisters, and also fiancées of those interned, provided the engagement had taken place before internment. At the present time wives living in and around Berlin are allowed to visit once a month, the time permitted being nominally one hour, but this is fortunately not interpreted very strictly, so that in actual practice two hours are often allowed. Wives coming from a distance receive permission every three months; and it was for a long time a concern of these women and of their husbands—a concern shared by us—that these visits had to be made in a single period of two hours. Over and over again one found that the joy of reunion after so long a separation was so unerving that they could scarcely unburden themselves on a single occasion of all the important matters reserved for discussion, and that only afterwards did they remember all that they had intended to say. We repeatedly made representations on this score in the proper quarter, appealing for a change in the regulation, and in December last, we had the joy of obtaining permission for the wives from outside to stay in Berlin for a week and to make two visits of two hours during this period. In special cases a third visit might be allowed. All wives coming from a distance, at the same time they receive the permit, are instructed by the Commandant to apply to us in the event of their needing any advice in respect to accommodation in Berlin. And so we are visited by many whose reception in Berlin we either arrange for at their request in advance, or who, though acquainted with Berlin, yet come for information. They are all so well satisfied with the conditions of their visits that at the present time there is no occasion to ask for further concessions."

GETTING MEN OUT OF RUHLEBEN.

"Apart from our interest in the repatriation of the 'over forty-fivers,' our principal concern for Ruhleben consists for the present in finding work outside the Camp for the younger prisoners, for, thanks to the recent decision of the Commandant, resulting from our repeated applications, such prisoners may obtain leave of absence provided they find situations. It is, of course, very difficult for those in the Camp to seek situations, and we are therefore making special efforts to find opportunities for work, induce employers to engage an alien and then conduct the negotiations. There are amongst those desiring to exchange their forced idleness at Ruhleben for productive work, many who are concerned to remain loyal British subjects."

The letters from which these three extracts have been taken are addressed to the secretary of our Camps Committee.

The following quotation from Dr. Rotten refers to a specially interesting intercommunication:

"We are delighted and thankful to see from your letter of January 31st that an unnamed gentleman in America has sent you the sum of £400, with instructions to assign half of it to our work for foreigners in Germany, and saying that the British Government at once gave their consent to the payment of the amount to us. It will be a great help to our work, and will be conscientiously used for British subjects and for the subjects of nations allied with England. For a considerable time our work has been such that we can take advantage of the relief agencies of other countries for the assistance of Germans abroad, and for that reason can apply the means placed at our disposal for the support of foreigners in Germany only. So our help is now practically confined to "alien enemies," because the subjects of neutral States, should they be in need, can obtain other assistance, and it is our uppermost wish to relieve those who, but for us, would perhaps be utterly friendless. It is, moreover, a great satisfaction and encouragement to us that outside your and our spheres the community of our work is so strongly felt that people desire to further the efforts of the two societies simultaneously. The confidence so kindly felt in our efforts even abroad incites us to an ever increasing devotion to our work, to the undertaking of new tasks, and to the fulfilling of the old ones with more and more care in every detail.—M. C. F., in The Friend [London].

CHILDREN'S HOMES.

[Some of our readers may have first-hand knowledge of this home in the Midlands.—Eds.]

Through the generosity of a Friend, we are able to send some of our delicate children to a Home in the Midlands. The first set of twenty were sent there in charge of one of our workers, and we give below the description of the children's enjoyment of their new experiences.

"When I first conducted twenty children, with their twenty parcels from St. Stephen's House to Euston Station, I was thankful to find the party complete upon arriving there. Some of the parcels were already showing signs of bursting, and these were first made secure and safely stowed away on the racks. By the time the train steamed out of the station, we were all settled down comfortably, except one mite of five years old who was not quite happy at leaving her mother. As soon, however, as we reached the open fields and she saw real cows and sheep, her troubles were forgotten and she became happy as the rest in the excitement of her new experience. To the astonishment of the children, the train ran on and on about two hours before it stopped.

"When we reached our destination, we were greeted on the platform by the Friend who is entertaining the party, also the matron of the Homes, who conducted us to a wagon drawn by two sturdy horses. How the children loved it! each dip and bump in the roadway caused shouts of merriment, and the wagoner considered them 'a rare lively crowd.' After about an hour's drive we reached the two cottages built for the purpose of Holiday Homes for needy children. In letters I have since received they mention their 'sunny bed-rooms,' and not one child omits to write home about the daffodils growing in a wood nearby. Another great attraction there is 'Gipsy,' the parrot who never fails to amuse. Such a stay in the country is indeed an enjoyable and beneficial change from the children's dull London surroundings.

"One little boy wrote to his mother as follows: 'My dear Mother, I hope you and the boys are quite well and happy. I do enjoy my holiday, on Friday the lady took all the children and I for a long walk and we saw a hen and all her baby ones running after her. When we was going home again we saw a house with a straw roof we go for ever so long walks along the country roads. I hope the boys are all good to you, last Sunday we had a date pudding for dinner and this Sunday we are going to have a apple pudding I will soon be with you and the boys again. Well goodbye dear a hundred kisses for you and the boys and daddy, love from your son, K. D.'"

We are now trying to open a small seaside home on the East Coast for children threatened with tubercular glands. We are only waiting for a second helper, who would not be required to take responsibility, but she should be fond of children and able, if possible, to give her services without remuneration.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"A MAIDEN CRUSADER."—St. Nicholas Magazine is giving its boy and girl readers a series of biographies called "Heroines of Service." One of these is Frances Willard, "A Maiden Crusader," who was indeed a crusader against the evils of intemperance.

But her story begins long before this—in her sunny childhood when little "Frank" was "dancing like a sunbeam," about the campus of Oberlin College, where her parents "were working hard to make the most of their long-delayed opportunity for a liberal education."

When her father's health failed, and an open air life was the doctor's prescription for him, the Willard family "joined the army of westward-moving pioneers."

As we, who live near Philadelphia, pass through our familiar Broad Street Station, how many of us look up at the fine bas-relief above the doors opening toward the train-shed, showing the march of the pioneers, and think that such a scene formed a part of the life of many of our great men and women.

"Can you picture," says Mary R. Parkman, who writes this sketch of Frances Willard, "the three prairie-schooners that carried them and all their goods to the new home? The father drove the first; Oliver 'gee-hawed' proudly from the high perch on the seat of the next. And mother sat in the third, with Frances and little sister Mary, on a cushioned throne made out of father's topsy-turvy desk. For nearly thirty days the little caravan made its way—now through forests, now across great sweeping prairies, now over bumping coroduro roads that crossed stretches of swampy ground. They cooked their bacon and potatoes, gypsy-fashion, on the ground, and slept under the white hoods of their long wagons, when they were not kept awake by the howling of the wolves.

"When Sunday came, they rested wherever the day found them—sometimes on the rolling prairie, where their only shelter from rain and sun was the homely schooner, but where at night they could look up at the great tent of the starry heavens; sometimes in the cathedral of the forest. . . .

It was truly a new world through which they made their way—beginnings all about. . . . Everywhere people were working with an energy that could not be daunted—felling trees, sowing, harvesting, building. As they passed by the end of Lake Michigan they caught a glimpse of a small, struggling village in the midst of a dark, hopeless-looking morass, from which they turned aside on seeing the warning sign, 'No Bottom Here.' That little settlement was Chicago.

Journeying northward to Wisconsin they found a spot on the bluffs above Rock River, with fertile prairie on one side and sheltering wooded hills on the other, and here the father hewed the timber that was made the beginning of the home "that grew with their life," a "low, rambling building, covered with trailing vines," and lovingly named by them "Forest Home."

Here "Frank" had her share of the daily tasks, but plenty of time for the fun, which "was never dependent on numbers or novelty." One other family of children lived near enough to be companions, and "sometimes when they found themselves longing 'to pick up and move back again among city folks,' they played that the farm was a city." This city "had a model government." It had also an enterprising newspaper, of which Frank was the editor. "Frank, too, was the captain of their good ship Enterprise. If 'we do live inland, we don't have to think inland, Mary,' she said. 'What's the use of sitting here in Wisconsin, and sighing because we've never seen the ocean? Let's take this hen-coop and go a-sailing. Who knows what magic shores we'll touch, beyond our Sea of Fancy!'"

"A plank was put across the pointed top of the hen-coop, and the children stood at opposite ends steering; slowly when the sea was calm and more energetically when a storm was brewing. The hens clucked and the chickens ran about in a panic, but the captain calmly charted the waters, and laid down rules of navigation.

"Perhaps, though, the best times of all were those Frank"

"A GREATER THAN MOSES IS HERE."

The evolution of the human conception of God as it broadens to the Quaker ideal, reveals, as do all growing things, almost all the stages of its growth at once. Patience with earlier ideals and a direction for teaching the larger hope has been clearly shown by Isaiah's prophecy, which is both history and an illustration of the variation that exists at present as well:

"His name shall be called Wonderful Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

The Indian stood upon the cliff at sunrise and worshipped the Great Spirit, the Greek saw the stars and the sea and worshipped those, the Hebrew Scriptures begin with the glory of creation. For centuries all possible magnificence has been built into both heathen and Christian temples in an effort to show the awe due His Majesty. Then people grew to regard God as the Counsellor, and Moses made Him a rule-giver even for the fringe on men's garments. Later forgetting that real might is not in armies, but in the quiet voice of conscience, Israel saw Him as Nationality, the Chosen People's God of Battles. To-day at this point stands that part of the nations which is exploited by rulers for gain in money and in power. The Psalms tell of the pity of a Father for His children, the care of a Shepherd for the sheep; and the world has since gone to the Everlasting Father like a child. But the purest reality of all is God as the Prince of Peace, the leader of a youthful, joyful force, a spiritual life that lifts as heat and moisture lift corn to full growth. There is no peace like this tremendous stillness of perfectly-controlled, but ever-increasing power to grow godlike, perfect.

Thus far we, as a people, are ready to go in thought, but we weakly hesitate to fight it out in deed. The best thinkers of the present time also go that far in thought. For two centuries we have led as a church, yet God can raise up children to Abraham out of stones, and we will be nothing but stones if we weakly resign our leadership now because we are degenerate—afraid to be radical. We must live our thought out in the life of to-day, even if we have no logical or exact form of living outlined for this generation. We now know just enough not to betray our Lord quite so often, therefore we can learn more. We know our life must not be a feeble imitation of the good life of colonial days—that would be more exquisitely cruel toward society than giving a stone for bread; a starving prisoner must be given the key and the cup of milk, not merely a sweet breath from history.

Each day, more and more, is revealed the great size of that inarticulate mass of people who seriously want to be taught what to think in order to be saved from irresponsible hordes who would leave all thinking to a President and leave all the consequences to chance and the future.

My friend proudly and innocently says that the daily income of one of her thoughtless pupils is over twenty-five times as much as her own yearly earnings have averaged during forty years of conscientious service. Neither this country nor any other can long endure such lack of balance.

We need a book to ground us again, one that shall be heroic, mercilessly logical, and happily colloquial—of learned dissertations we have a good supply—a book based on the Sermon on the Mount as a social and political creed, illustrated by facts from history and from social conditions in the world at present with definitions given for specific sins, like those definitions given by the prophets of Israel.

It should challenge the present dull acceptance of things as they are, by a passionate faith in the ability of the spirit of Christ to change them now, before a spirit of revolution changes them with bombs.

Instead of "overcome evil with good," which is vague and contains one word that is unintelligible to the mass of people, overcome fear with the glory of standing alone—in thought, without companions, in action, without a gun. Overcome dirt by cleaning things with your own hands, even in public places. "He that would be great among you, let him be the servant of all." Serve even the ungentle who laugh because you are "easy." But let the ungentle see your good works in such a clear light that the glory will go to your Father in Heaven. Teach rebellion to those who unwittingly starve their growing children of proteids.

and do without bath-tubs in order to forge iron for the bottom of the sea. Buy good clothes and wear them out to prevent over manufacture and flimsy materials. Get and pay good wages and make friends in all classes of society. Never accept a profit from investments above the limit of the common rate of interest, the rest belongs to the laborer and the consumer, not to charity. Make the things you can do the measure of education; not the things you say, even those you say rather effectively. Train yourself to enjoy and train children to enjoy, nature, religion, poetry, art—especially in the form to take into small homes as household utensils, chairs, wall-paper and blooming plants—there is a vast number of fairly-well educated Americans who do not know a geranium from an Easter lily—and, best of all, to enjoy people. Watch the freedom of the press and of the schools; army officers or foreign diplomatists must not tell adults all they are to think. Study to be patriotic; patriotism means service to the state. A capital city should be a central bureau for teaching self-reliant strength and the pride of industry to a free people in good homes. Now our government is merely a clearing-house for organized strength of money, the pride of bigness and the fear of true democracy. If any among us are parasitic, unwilling to serve by the work of their own hands, they are not Friends helping in Christ's Realm; since in the building of His House, one who sits upon the beam while others swing it into place cannot be called a builder, however much he may shout.

For Friends now there is to be no more of the peaceful life of our grand-parents, enjoyed in the midst of a striving and successful world. We have been speaking resignation, the language of defeat, for almost a generation. Now we must speak victory through passive, but passionate rebellion, holding the fort in a new war where real defeat is not possible. As the trained hand of an artist takes the pencil when another's drawing is crooked or untrue, our hand should reach to take the standard of leadership and then carry it straight through to the end whether that end means poverty or death. It can not mean death to our Prince.

Whenever defeat has come to me personally—and it has often—I have always known that it was defeat of myself, not of the hope for which I fight. I have felt for two years exceptional increase in the light of Christ's philosophy, and it does not weaken down for an instant, but "shines more and more." Its perfect day is many ages away, but its light can lighten the Gentiles right now.

A GREAT TEACHER.

So many readers of THE FRIEND are either teachers or otherwise interested in school work that it was thought that the following extracts taken from a review of the recently-published account of the life of John Smith, for a quarter of a century an Assistant Master of Harrow School, in England, might be of interest.

In the review alluded to, in a recent number of The Contemporary Review, the writer says:—"In the life of every school, probably, there arises a master, often an assistant master, who strikes a note that becomes thenceforward the moral note, the traditional note, of that school. His influence may become a national educational influence, as in the case of Arnold and Thring, but, whether that be so or not, in the particular school it becomes a permanent influence that may outlive even the memory of its first beginner. John Smith, an assistant master at Harrow from 1854 to 1880, was a schoolmaster of this type. This book . . . is the story of an apostolic soul, the story of a man who all his life 'went about doing good.'" John Smith was born in London, Second Month 16, 1823, the son of a warehouseman. In the year 1879, a hereditary strain of insanity that had smitten his father and ters attacked him, and he was eventually removed to St. Luke's Hospital, London, where he passed the last eleven years of his life, the Review states, "serving others as he had always served them, his noble nature shining through the dark clouds of his mental affliction. The danger was suicide, and when he was spared from all evil, and when he died, Twelfth month 12, 1893, a very noble man passed unspotted from the world." He was a disciplinarian of no mean order. In his own rugged person he set the example of perfect neatness and cleanliness. His motto was that cleanliness comes next to godliness, and woe betide the boy who was slovenly person or in work. For such there was no excuse. Carelessness, thoughtlessness, idleness, had no place in his form. Shut the door, lad, doors are not left open in heaven." "Nothing to do, laddie? Say a prayer, then; you can always say a prayer." "Show your hands, laddie! Those are not divinely ure—away and cleanse them." No boy dared to be late in his form. No boy dared to deceive, nor to shirk, nor to shrink. Swimming was his favorite exercise, and his form had to swim. See how all those wonderful fellows have gone head first before you; jump, laddie; feet first if you can't the other way. There's no shrinking in heaven." Despite the quaintness of his sayings, the peculiarity of his manner, he was no laughing matter with the boys. He was a perfect gentleman, and no boy ever wished even to take a liberty with him. He was, despite occasional ruthless punishment, worshipped. He touched the imagination, the poetry, the mystical sense of boyhood. He was the living personification of the law of love. His overwhelming sense of duty inspired, absorbed the boys. One day he said to a boy who had failed in his lesson:—"Dear fellow, when you and I get to Heaven, if you don't know your Greek grammar, the dear Lord will call me up and say, "Go teach this boy his grammar before you come into my presence." His mystical sense of the reality of the after-life thrills through and through this wonderful book as it thrilled through his life into that of others." The following quotation from the book under review shows how this remarkable man brought this sense to bear upon the little things of duty.

"Would the dear Lord be pleased if He came to fetch a boy in his sleep to-night, and found that he had left his things in such disorder? Will you do me the favor, in future, to fold up your clothes, and have them ready on your chairs?" And, once, Death did actually come to the school in the time of some-prayers. It was a most dramatic scene. John knew that a boy lay very ill in one of the houses, and had already prayed for him. He was concluding with the Lord's Prayer, when suddenly the penetrating sound of the high-pitched school bell was heard in the distance—"Ding!" John stopped. There was dead silence for some moments. Then again the bell came—"Ding!" There could be no doubt; it was the passing-bell, and John's voice broke out into a psalm of thanksgiving, without one touch of earthly grief or sentiment to mar it: "We thank Thee, O Father, for Thy great goodness, that Thou hast taken this dear lad to Thy glorious heaven; we praise Thee," but it is impossible now to recall the cadence of the triumphant strain which sprang so spontaneously from the well-spring of his great faith. The house rose from its knees, profoundly affected, and filed out in silence."

"His influence," says the Reviewer, "on the boys was endless, as was his love. During the week he prayed by name for every boy in the whole school. He was, indeed, one of the rare mystical geniuses of this world, a being in whom what might have been madness in a less pure creature became a renovating force and a light in the darkness of our time."

COUNTING THE COST.

"Oh! Jerusalem, Jerusalem! . . . How often would I have gathered you. . . . But ye would not."

I sat one Sabbath morning on the Mount of Olives, somewhere near where the Saviour sat with his Disciples and uttered His mournful cry, and I considered how history repeats itself in every nation and in all generations. It is everywhere and all the time the same—the Divine pity and the invitation of love met by man's indifference and refusal. The real reason for the rejection of the Lordship of Christ seems also everywhere and always the same, with high and low, within the organized Churches and outside them. The stumbling-block seems to be the realization of the tremendous demand which Christ makes upon the consciences and moral sense of those who follow Him. To be out and out for Him always involves self-surrender, and at times self-sacrifice. Frequently it carries with it the relinquishment of pleasures and pursuits that imperil spiritual growth. It checks lustful lookings and lustful longings. It reproves greed and avarice, luxury and license. It prevents hatred, revenge, and passionate anger. It may involve the restoration of ill-gotten gains, and the reparation of injuries. Savonarola visited Lorenzo Medici on his death-bed. "Three things," said the Friar, "are needed for absolution: First, a great and living faith in God's mercy." "I have the fullest faith in it," was the response. "Secondly, you must restore all your wrongly-acquired wealth, or charge your sons to restore it." Making a nod of assent, he grudgingly agreed. "And, thirdly, you must restore liberty to the people of Florence." At this Lorenzo angrily turned his back upon him and died unrepentant, yet torn with remorse. Similarly, a twentieth century merchant said to me: "I know you are right, and if I surrendered my heart to Him I could not be a half and half Christian. To me it is a question of all or nothing. At present I prefer to have, and to be, nothing." As William Penn puts it in a letter, "What mockery to call Him Lord and He not Lord of our lives; Master, and He not Master of our affections and beliefs; Saviour, and we not saved from our besetting sins."—FREDERICK SESSIONS, in Friends' Witness.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE outstanding feature of the term at Leighton Park School, England, was the carrying out of a food production scheme. After the break-up of the great frost, on the afternoons of three days the upper school was told off to work on the land. There were three squads, from the sixth, fifth and lower fifth forms respectively, and each squad gave two afternoons' work per week, about twenty senior boys being out on any one day. The hardest work was the breaking up of twenty poles of heavy land between the School sanatorium and the fives' courts. Outside the school, in Reading and Caversham, three gardens were dug, and a 10-pole piece of turf land was broken up. Perhaps chief interest lay in the help given to allotment holders on Manor Farm, in cases where the men folk have been absent in the army or have been ill. Groups approached workers on allotments, with the offer of service, and succeeded in making themselves so useful that they were made thoroughly welcome. Twelve 10-pole allotments were dug, to the satisfaction of their owners. The Allotments Committee of Reading Town Council recently expressed their warm appreciation of the work done. In the School garden, the gardener received good help in the spring digging; a good deal of which was done by a voluntary squad of seniors; a voluntary squad of juniors did excellent work in light digging on allotments and garden ground near the Park. The boys themselves bought forks and spades to the value of £6, mostly by public subscription. If more money is required, it will now be got from payment for work, which is asked for in certain cases.

A RECENT letter from Robert J. Davidson notes that more members were admitted to the Society of Friends in West China last year than in any other twelve months since our work in Szechwan was begun. He also reports the appointment of a permanent Yearly Meeting Secretary, or Recording Clerk, which is felt to be a step in the direction of more careful organization of the work of the Chinese Yearly Meeting. Fang Su Hsuen (S. H. Fang) has been appointed to the office, in which his knowledge of English will be of service to him.—The Friend (London).

Two books just appearing from the press will interest Friends. They are, "What is Quakerism?" by Edward Grubb, and "William Penn, Founder of Pennsylvania," by John W. Graham. It is understood they will be on sale by Friends' Book and Tract Committee at 144 E. Twentieth Street, New York City.

THE STORM IS STILLED.

This thrilling thought the troubled soul
 With ecstasy subdued imbues;
 When Time's unresting billows roll
 The voice, the inner voice renews
 The utterance, in accents still,
 And every fear is rocked to rest,
 Obeyed the whelming waves his will,
 And gently cradled on the breast
 Of love unlimited are we
 Yea, fostered by Infinity!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The Lancaster turnpike, one of the most important roads leading out of Philadelphia, is reported to have been sold to the Commonwealth, to be turned over to the State Highway Department and freed of tolls on Seventh Month 1st. It will be repaired immediately by the State.

Orders for 275 locomotives, to cost $14,200,000, were placed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company last week as its entire 1918 program for the lines east of Pittsburgh. Of the total, 245 will be made in the company's shops at Altoona. The remaining thirty orders were given to the Baldwin Locomotive Works.

The New York Evening Post reports that seventeen students of Harvard College will leave this country in a few days when the Pennsylvania hospital unit, Base Hospital No. 10, starts for France. Nearly all of them are Pennsylvanians or Philadelphia boys. Two or three of them are members with Friends.

A Ledger correspondent reports: Employing the best methods available for its calculation, one of the economic publications announces that New York's cost of living is $2.32 per capita or a total of $13,006,822 a day for the 5,602,841 inhabitants of the city.

Dr. John R. Mott announces for the Y. M. C. A. that almost all of the $3,000,000 required for war work by the Association has been pledged, and that while about 1,000,000 has been pledged by New York, other cities have been generous.

The Boston Transcript says: Two or three hundred of the Special Bible Study classes interested in the First-day campaign are still doing valuable work, and many of them probably will continue through the summer. Some have closed for the season, having had supper at their final meeting and adjourned with enthusiasm, looking toward a renewal of the service in the autumn.

Out of "Billy" Sunday's New York campaign there will be attempted in that city a new church on the lines of Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle, London. Like the London venture, it will have a Baptist basis, but will be independent of all ecclesiastical connection. Its head will be Joseph W. Kemp, until recently a pastor of Edinburgh, Scotland.

In its last bulletin the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics prints a comparative table of wage increases and the increased cost of food as reported by the principal trades in forty-eight of the leading cities for the past ten years. During that decade weekly wage rates rose 16 per cent., retail food prices 39 per cent.

Of all the makes and nationalities of motor cars in use behind the battle lines in France for ambulance service, the Americans are superior, in the opinion of Henry M. Wing, a Boston man who has just returned from six months' service in France as a driver in an American ambulance unit.

A prominent weekly says: Much has been learned from German experience in feeding the people which the United States can utilize with profit. For example, the German Government found that price regulation does not work well and that there was no profit in trying to compel people to eat by law. The farmers secreted much of their produce, that they might have enough for themselves and their families, and it was exceedingly difficult to stop individual waste. The Government therefore was obliged to institute a campaign of education, and although this took time it has worked well, Germany's present difficulty being due rather to a shortage of crops than to unintelligent planning or cultivation.

During the year 1916 the American Bible Society suffered from loss of income due to the war, and also was hindered in its distribution of Bibles. The year 1915 had been the largest in the Society's history in point of Bible circulation, 7,761,000 volumes having been distributed.

In 1916 the number fell to 5,170,000, or a decrease of more than a quarter of a million volumes.

FOREIGN.—Although several of the largest paper mills in England have been forced to shut down because the Government stopped importation of pulpwood, many others have managed to keep go by utilizing grass from Scotland, the Finlands and India. Printing pa and note paper is being made from grass mixed with other materials.

Among numerous efforts toward intensive cultivation of land a increased productivity of crops in England, perhaps none is more interesting than the subsidized experiment in growing cereals and other crops with the assistance of overhead electric current, writes Vice Com Hamilton C. Claiborne, Bradford. The purpose of the experiment to carry to a larger scale the successful work which has been done during the last few years near Dumfries, where in 1916 an increase of about fifty per cent. in grain and eighty-five per cent. in straw was obtained oats as a result from overhead electrical discharge.

DIGGING AND SOWING.

Who digs a well, or plants a seed,
A sacred pact he keeps with sun and sod:
With these he helps refresh and feed
The world, and enters partnership with God.
—EDWIN MARKHAM.

Is there in any of our hearts a sense of being out of harmony with the beauty of the springtime? Does the sowing of the "seeds of war" in the hearts of the people of our land fill our thoughts, so that we hardly notice the rich browns of the hill-fields as they lie open to sun and rain and take their portion of seed from the farmer's careful hand?

And does the cry of the starving babies across the seas ring in our ears, so that we can not enjoy, as we would, the cheery call of the robins?

Then perhaps we need, as a dear Friend says, to "look well to our foundations," to dig more deeply toward the Spring of Refreshment that should be in us "a well of water, springing up into everlasting Life," to sow in hope the seeds of Peace, recalling Whittier's lines:

Thine was the seed-time; God alone
Beholds the end of what is sown,
Beyond our vision, weak and dim
The harvest time is hid with Him.

Along with the war-excitement in our daily press goes a wonderful turning toward the land for help; and the farmer and gardener were never more important, or their calling more exalted than just now when the food supply of the world may prove so inadequate.

So also was there never such need of the spiritual sowing; and while the soil seems hard and stony, the seed is lodging here and there evidently, and perhaps to an extent far beyond what we suspect.

When we can rise above a sense of discouragement, and feel a willingness to take our part in this, as it is shown to us, various definite suggestions are put before us, which are being worked out by our Yearly Meeting's Peace Committees, and an effort is being made to unify and centralize these, so that they may prove more effective, and that our young people who are urged to join in the relief organizations which are under military control, will be able to point out to those who ask their help, that we have our own work, for the war victims, the non-combatants, who need help far more than the soldiers.

A chance remark overheard, concerning a young man who had just enlisted, ran something like this, "He asked when he would be called out, and they told him it might be to-morrow, or it might be two or three weeks." Just so, must not we, who feel that we also are "under orders," be striving after a quiet, yet watchful and ready spirit—looking for the service, listening for the call.

The attempt to organize Friends of America to work as a body for the preservation of life, and the reconstruction of the nations, is a stimulating and cheering movement. But let not the man and woman whom circumstances shut out from joining in these wider movements, fail to remember that there is left to them, and to all of us that good old "Quaker stronghold," the individual faithfulness to the individual concern. Some of the very best Peace work is done in this way. If we can meet our neighbors, who do not see the present crisis as we do, who may obtrude their point of view or try to impose it on us, and still maintain an atmosphere of peace and goodwill, perhaps we may find that we have "gained our brother." "Don't be a belligerent pacifist!" said a man laughingly to a relative who was warmly defending her point of view, and his warning is needed now, more than when it was spoken a year ago.

Yet we must remember, too, that a pacifist is an active person—"a peacemaker," not an idle bystander, mourning over what seems a mad world.

So when we are enabled to see, as George Fox did in his vision, not only the "sea of darkness," overflowing the world, but above it, the "sea of light" which overflowed the "sea of darkness," we are ready to "sow beside all waters," and dig deeply toward the hidden springs.

There is nothing new or original in these thoughts, only, it may be, a need of reviving them in our minds.

Again Whittier sums up for us the attitude our time calls for when he says:

In the maddening maze of things
The whirlwind and the flood,
To one fixed stake my spirit clings,
I know that God is good.

F. T. R.

OH, how many times can we most of us remember when we would gladly have made the most costly sacrifices to God, if He would only have excused us from this duty of loving, of which our nature seemed utterly incapable. It is far easier to feel kindly, to act kindly, toward those with whom we are seldom brought in contact, whose tempers and prejudices do not rub against ours, whose interests do not clash with ours, than to keep up an habitual, steady, self-sacrificing love towards those whose weaknesses and faults are always forcing themselves upon us, and are stirring up our own. A man may pass good muster as a philanthropist who makes but a poor master to his servants, or father to his children.

F. D. MAURICE.

EXTRACTS FROM A LETTER FROM JUSTINE DALENCOURT TO HANNAH P. MORRIS.

PARIS, Fifth Month 1, 1917.

Owing to pressure of work, days run torrentially, events, like the waves of a furious sea, threaten to swallow up nations. What a blissful condition to be in the Rock, cleft to provide a hiding-place for us—we are not moved at all, only bruised. The saddest circumstances cannot separate the redeemed from His love—their sorrow is not about themselves, but rather concerning those who are waxing cold. I feel as if my Lord had again to carry His Cross, and we were called lovingly to help Him to carry it, not by compulsion, as Simon of Cyrene did.

And thy friend, Agnes Nicholson, what has become of her? I wait in vain for her return. As to Cecile Boissiere, she surges further from us. I have not seen her for eight months, but I have sent her religious publications, hoping her faith may be vivified. She was employed in public work. I have heard that Annie Reich is married; she has not written me since she left Paris.

The times are dolorous, but if solemn, let us feel it an honor and a privilege to live in them. May the prophets of the Lord be faithful that nothing may hinder His message and that nothing be added to it. Think of me, before Him, asking not only that my dear pupils and I work with all our heart and strength for Him, but that we be made according to His Laws, filled with faith in His powerful wisdom.

My aides? My pupils? One has left me to take the place of her deceased sister, in an asylum for old men, near her invalid mother. Another went in vacation to her family, at Douai, then occupied by the enemy—as a prisoner she had to direct an ambulance caring for Germans and French—physically and mentally worn out by this, she had been sent by her friends to her home in the south of France for a year's rest, but the doctor doubts whether she can ever enter service again.

Another pupil of mine is anæmic and unable to read, write or sew, but she had been given some charge of our three centres in Paris. I have need of more aid, but she is devoted above all. "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" is the sweet experience.

My pupils? I had nine in the winter; they have all worked well, helping in Mothers' Meetings—studying the Bible, caring for our sick, etc. But I feel the necessity of elevating intellectually those who are spiritual, feeling themselves called but having instruction too rudimentary—the working class itself being better taught than formerly. It is because of grammar, etc., that the missionaries are acceptable, graduate nurses are demanded. They must pass examinations that cover two or three years. Perhaps I will soon accept only for evangelistic study those already provided with diplomas. The Master will guide us.

Of my nine pupils there only remain six, three went to hospital work. I love my dear girls who had little time for experience for they were disciplined, devout and moral. It is encouraging.

Our Gospel meetings are always well attended at our three centres. Although there is much work in the factories, for strong women, our halls are filled, which shows that a large number depend on us for consolation. One who comes only when she is off night duty and so deprives herself of sleep, the time of our gathering, said to me recently, "I am possessed of an evil spirit. I have a heart full of hate for all governments; I make bombs which I would willingly throw at my employer rather than at those whom I do not know—I come here and the devil goes out of me; when I leave I love, and I pity humanity; I wish to put myself between the enemies' camps, saying, 'Behold my life—take it if necessary, but let strife be over.'"

Since it is needful in my letters to avoid mention of war, I can only say we have much distress, physical and moral, many widows, many old women without sustenance, many broken hearts. Some revolt against that which they call the indifference of God—others, on the contrary, are brought to approach Him—it is because of this I believe that our gatherings are well attended.

My health continues very good, permitting intense and regular work; nevertheless, I am more easily fatigued than formerly—it would be unreasonable to wonder at this, since I am seventy-eight years old. I have much to bless God for, in His allowing me to pour His balm of Gilead on poor wounded ones in my neighborhood. I go soon to our country house, Fontaine Lavaganne, in the hope to plant potatoes, onions, etc., for next winter. For that it will be necessary that the plants or seeds which I left in 1916, hidden in my cellar, have not been taken, for all winter the military were lodged in the house. I fear that next winter will be more terrible than the last. I had then good food and coal. Dear sister, pray, and some friends with thee, that I and my adopted family may take up any task, any sacrifice, any privation, and that we regard constantly Him who is all in all.

Very affectionately thine,
JUSTINE DALENCOURT.

HEAVIER THE CROSS.

Heavier the cross, the nearer Heaven;
No cross without, no God within,— Death, judgment, from the heart are driven
Amid the world's false glare and din.
Oh, happy he with all his loss,
Whom God hath set beneath the cross!

Heavier the cross, the better Christian;
This is the touchstone God applies,
How many a garden would be wasting,
Unwet with showers from weeping eyes!
The gold by fire is purified;
The Christian is by trouble tried.

Heavier the cross, the stronger faith,
The loaded palm strikes deeper root,
The wine-juice sweetly issueth
When men have pressed the clustered fruit;
And courage grows where dangers come,
Like pearls beneath the salt sea foam.

Heavier the cross, the heartier prayer;
The bruised herbs most fragrant are.
If sky and wind were always fair
The sailor would not watch the star;
And David's Psalms had ne'er been sung
If grief his heart had never wrung.

Heavier the cross, the more aspiring;
From vales we climb to mountain crest;
The pilgrim, of the desert, tiring,
Longs for the Canaan of his rest.
The dove has here no rest in sight,
And to the ark she wings her flight.

Heavier the cross, the easier dying,
Death is a friendlier face to see;
To life's decay one bids defying,
From life's distress one then is free.
The Cross sublimely lifts our faith
To Him who triumphed over death.

Thou Crucified! the cross I carry,—
The longer may it dearer be,—
And lest I faint while here I tarry,
Implant thou such a heart in me,
That faith, hope, love, may flourish there,
Till for the cross my crown I wear!

This little record is of deep and moving interest—a beautiful picture of a beautiful life.

In a few skilful touches we are presented with a living picture of “the most vivid creature that imagination could conceive,” “grasping life with both hands,” a true, high-hearted, brilliant woman, full of charm and attractiveness. We are told of her literary work, her books for children and “The Child’s Life of Christ”; and that all her work was the outcome of a deep and living faith.

“Wherever people were, with whom religion was the passion of their life, she was of their freemasonry; and whenever she was in real difficulty, a difficulty of the soul, she fell back always on the thought of God.”

In the early summer of 1914, conscious of a little overstrain, she had taken a cottage in the Cotswolds, and there, in the middle of the most delightful holiday she had ever known, the news of the war came to her.

At first she could not realize it. Then she heard that the younger of her two sons, Christopher, was coming home from abroad to enlist. She wrote afterwards:—

“I began to think over my position. I knew that if I had been a man I could not have fought, for the way in which I read the words of Christ is that the Kingdom of Heaven is gained by a different method altogether. ‘Not by might, nor by power, but by Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts.’ It is a method which has never been tried by diplomatists. If an individual attempts it in his own life, and plunges into deep seas, it sustains him and he walks on the waters in a great amazement. What happens to an individual will some day happen to the nations, when they seek each other’s good rather than their own gain—but not yet. Till then we must learn our mistakes through great suffering.”

Who can read without a pang of sympathy for both, what Mabel Deamer tells of her beloved younger son:—

“Christopher was indignant at my apparent half-heartedness. ‘I can’t think what has come to you, mother,’ he cried, ‘you are generally so eager for the right,’ . . . and the boy broke off in angry disappointment.

“‘I can’t help it, my dear,’ I replied. ‘I can’t hate my enemy. I have spent my whole life trying to learn a different lesson. If you feel you must go, you must go; it will be right for you to go. You offer your life—that is always good—you can’t do more.’

“He went away unsatisfied, and I envied the proud mother who sends her sons, proud of them, proud of the war that calls them out, proud of the God of battles. But that God is not my God, and my heart was heavy.

“My eldest son went next. Then Stephen Gwynn. . . .

“There was no doubt at all that he thought war was right. ‘I don’t pretend that any war is Christian,’ he said. ‘But this is a just war. If you are a Christian I don’t see how you can fight at all. To be a Christian to-day seems to me to court annihilation.’

“‘Yes,’ I said, ‘just that—to be ready to throw away one’s life for the Kingdom of Heaven, but for nothing less. It has always meant that. That is why its Founder was crucified.’”

The foregoing, we learn from her biographer, is taken from the first chapter “of a very personal book” which she began in Serbia. She wrote only this chapter, and it she rounded off characteristically with a laugh. But there has come to me one other passage—a pencilled scrap of paper, barely legible, which after her death was found in the mud-stained bag that she kept in her little tent. It gives, I think, the keynote to all her thought and all her action in the last phase of her life. “To the Greeks foolishness, to the Jews a stumbling-block.” Christianity can never teach common-sense. It teaches the Kingdom of Heaven. It may permeate common-sense with the tincture of its ideals, but the more common-sensible it becomes, the less it is Christianity. It is the folly only possible to the supremely wise.”

“She who wrote thus had in the practical affairs of life more shrewdness, more common-sense, than anyone with whom I have ever taken counsel. That permeation of common-sense by Christianity, and of Christianity by common-sense, which she describes, was well illustrated in the fact that her attitude to the war alienated no friend. Yet there was another reason for this. She who condemned war loved courage and loved self-devotion. The war was there, and with it the call to action and to sacrifice. If her sons had chosen to go out into the street as missionaries and denounce the war as an outrage against Christianity, as a crime that no nation should commit, even though it were to be trampled into powder, she would for that have gladly seen them beaten, imprisoned or put to death, and gladly have taken her place at their side. This was the courage that she most valued—the courage to die, but not to kill; and if the world had enough of this courage then, she thought, there would be no wars.

“But she did not, for all that, withhold either her sympathy, or her approbation from those who were prepared to follow their own ideals where they might lead. The boy who came to her with his first ardors of patriotism and went away unsatisfied, yet found in those following months no better comfort than she could give. I remember how she told me that never in all their lives had her sons shown such a desire to be at home, nor come so close to her in talk.

“Yet, for all that, she was isolated and a little lonely. Perhaps her mind worked the more strongly and was all the truer to its own instincts.”

In the spring of 1915, Dr. Deamer was appointed Chaplain to the British units, comprising some 300 doctors and nurses, then working in Serbia, and he was asked to start almost at once.

The arrangement was all made so suddenly that his wife knew nothing of it till she heard it announced publicly at a farewell service for the unit which he was conducting.

Here, she felt, was her opportunity, and as soon as the service was over, she asked if she too might go with the unit, and was accepted as a hospital orderly.

Mabel Deamer’s revealing letters from Serbia addressed to Stephen Gwynn, her literary adviser and personal friend, reflect much of the charm of her vivid personality, and were there space, one would like to quote largely.

It says much for the quality of the friendship between her and the soldier friend who has since been called to act as her biographer and literary executor, that she could write to him frankly and unreservedly of what she felt and thought about war, and that he has suppressed nothing of this.

She liked to recount the good deeds of the Austrian doctor of their hospital.

Once she wrote:—

“Everything is so curiously mixed up. We are friends and enemies all together—half our wounded are Austrian—and, strangest of all, the head doctor of the Serbian Hospital is an Austrian prisoner. He is a wonderful man, and looked after and treated 200 wounded all alone. He was taken prisoner, and never stopped his work of saving life—first as an officer of his own army, then as a doctor among the Serbs.”

And again, later:—

“The ‘enemy’ came to tea to-day—the Austrian doctor who is a prisoner here, and has worked for the Serbian wounded so nobly that he is head of the Military Hospital—and a prisoner.—Oh, isn’t it strange? He has in bad times dressed 500 wounds a day—besides operations—sleeping for a few hours at a time and eating when he can—and this for the enemy. Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his enemy.”

Later she wrote:—

“When I see these wounded here, I have got a new obsession. I don’t see you and Geoff. [her eldest son] and Chris. hurt, but I see all the men that you and Geoff. and Chris. are going to hurt—and that is the unbearable thing. If you are hurt you can bear it to death, for you have ideals—but they, poor lambs, they curse and rave and suffer and don’t know why it happens or what it all means. There is an article in the English Review (which thank you for)—an article on 'Nationality'—which I feel in my bones is true. It is this madness of Nationality, this false patriotism, that makes wars. As long as men grab land and think it noble to die for their own bit, there will be wars. As though a nation depended on its land! It depends on its spirit and its ideals. The Jews are a nation and they have no land. There—I can't argue, but what I felt dimly at Oakridge I know clearly now. This war will not bring peace—no war will bring peace—only love and mercy and terrific virtues, such as loving one's enemy, can bring a terrific thing like peace. . . . Oh, I will stop. But it goes into everything, the tiniest action—the hardest fight is to love the person you want to fight and to seek his good rather than yours."

Mabel Deamer died of typhoid at Kragujevatz that summer (Seventh Month 11, 1915), at the age of forty-three. To the fearless woman who had dared to stand alone for her faith, and to risk all that she might help the suffering, was given the honor of laying down her life for the service of man, and to the mother was given the happiness of going before her son Christopher, who fell at Suvla Bay. With all her intense love of life, she had thought of death as the last great "adventure" . . . "the last unspeakably good thing of all the unspeakably good things that have come to us," and as she had lived she died—gladly.—From Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

POCONO MANOR NOTES.

Spring has been more than usually belated in the mountains this year. We have heard regular residents say they "hardly remember a time when vegetation was so backward." In any event, now at the end of Fifth Month, the trees are only beginning to show unmistakable signs of life. As usual this beginning has been heralded by the white bloom of the shad bush. Until used to it the whitened forms, dotting the mountain side, startle one with the belief that a sudden snow drift has appeared. In strong contrast to the white, the brilliant tender red of bursting buds soon becomes dominant. This is quickly followed by the lively green of the birches and aspens. It is then an endless pageantry to note from hour to hour, from day to day, how the mountains and fields "clothe themselves as with a garment."

All this scene of enchanted beauty is enlivened with the birds, their ceaseless movements and intermittent songs. An ornithologist like William Baily can count more than sixty varieties of them; to most of us they are numberless and often nameless, too. Evidently many of them seek human habitations and respond to some attentions of feeding with undoubted gratitude. One other natural attraction demands a word. Arbutus has been everywhere. In places the northern slopes have been matted with it, and for size and waxy appearance and pinkness we have rarely seen it rivalled.

The activity of development at the Manor which was reviewed last year, has continued. Three cottages are nearing completion, several have been liberally enlarged and improved, and architects and builders come and go with a sure augury of other additions. One easily realizes that it is not merely the attraction of location that has this effect. The Association has proved itself capable of serving the cottage colony in many ways that make living easy. Of course there are the advantages of light and water and sewerage for all, but labor by the hour or by the day is furnished; carpenters and masons can not only be secured, they can be directed by the management; supplies of all kinds are kept in stock, the store at the Inn will furnish anything from a yeast cake to a can of ice cream. One must be most exacting and unappreciative not to realize that the modern spirit of co-operation has been made a practical basis of a good business management here on top of the mountain.

Nearly a month ago we were hearing that cottages to rent were at a great premium; since we have had occasion to know it by private solicitation at our door. War conditions may have some bearing on this situation, but those who know the charm and ease of living in the colony accept it as a natural outcome.

The Inn has opened nearly a month in advance of previous records. This in the main is in pursuance of demand. Many improvements have been carried through in anticipation of the opening. Guests of the Inn and cottagers will be rejoiced to find "Baily Park" in its usual hospitable order. It is understood that the heirs of our good friend intend for the present to maintain it as heretofore and to extend the courtesies to the public that their father bestowed with such liberality and pleasure. As visitors thus enjoy its resources of beauty and of surprise they realize afresh something of the sentiment in the lines:

"The best thing any mortal hath,
Is that which every mortal shares."

"THE PRESENT DAY MESSAGE OF QUAKERISM."*

This is a small book of 106 pages with four chapters, as follows: "The Basis of the Quaker Faith," "The Guide of the Quaker Life," "The Creed of the Quaker Church," "The Field of the Quaker Message." It is printed apparently on the responsibility of the author alone—no Society, no meeting has sanctioned it as an official utterance. It belongs to a class of work now quite common, being no less than an effort to put the Quaker Message into modern phrase. So often have these efforts been subject to one qualification or another, either a misinterpretation of motive or a failure to discern active principle under human limitation, that the success of this author in avoiding these defects is only the more welcome. After a critical reading of the little book, we find not a single question mark on the margin anywhere. The specific differences that separate Friends into kinds have been wholly surmounted. The book keeps to its subject—it deals with Quakerism not from the point of view of any body of Friends, or kind of Friend, but clearly as a mode of expression of the Christian life. But the work is not done vaguely. The mode stands out clearly; the Quaker is generic and is justified in his family characteristics.

As an illustration of the success in not stumbling over what are at times called peculiarities, we may note one instance. Some efforts at modern statements have announced as discoveries that "Quakerism is not a form of dress or a peculiarity of speech." Here is Charles M. Woodman's treatment of the subject: "As a question of ethics, the peculiar use of a pronoun may to-day seem a small thing to insist upon, but, nevertheless, the 'plain speech' of the Quaker is a living witness of a one time sincere effort to stand for reality in the little as well as the great things of life." This is typical of the treatment. It strikes us as sympathetic—constructive.

In style the book is plainly popular—in places perhaps it approaches the sophomoric. This is due to the fact, no doubt, that the addresses were written for public delivery. It will only add to their value for many uses. Under the title, "Creed of the Church," one expects to find some jarring notes. If they are there, we have not discovered them. The chapter is a somewhat unique expression of the fact that Friends are at once creedless and yet in unity with the great truths of religion that the creeds have imperfectly embodied.

The type of thinking in the book as well as the style will appear from two quotations:

"He (the Friend) rejected every social custom that trod with thoughtless feet upon the sacred precincts of man's personality; he plumbed his business methods with the perpendicular ethics of the Sermon on the Mount; he maintained that what was morally wrong could not be politically right." [page 97].

"In a time when one war followed another in rapid succession, when fighting was the real business of strong men, when the nursing of hates and grudges was the prime occupation of governments, the Society of Friends denounced the whole program. For them the peace propaganda was never a question of good economics; it was a question of good religion; there could be no Christianity in fighting, because the Christ laid down laws of love, service and sacrifice, and placed a premium upon the sacredness of man's person."

SERMON OF ELEAZOR BALES.

[Our friend E. B. Carter has sent us a report of a sermon preached by Eleazor Bales at the opening of Summit Grove Preparative Meeting in 1873. With some omissions and editing we are carrying out his suggestion and printing it for our readers.—Eds.]

The object of our coming together this morning is of great importance to us, to our children and to our neighbors. It is nothing short of a duty that God has assigned to His people that they should thus meet together to worship Him and to adore the excellent name of Him who has abundantly blessed us with everything we need. Although we are poor and weak, if we wait in faith and patience and believe His promise that "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength," He will enable us to journey on through depths and heights to that blessed home which He has promised to His children.

There is work which the Church has to do under Christ who sits as Head and Law-giver. Yet we are told everyone is free and can choose where he will serve and whom he will serve. It is, however, a Scripture doctrine that we believe, that they who do not work under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit shall be punished in the world to come. We know, too, that of ourselves we cannot do anything that will advance Christ's cause or will glorify His name in the Church. I have been thinking of the great work that the Church militant has to do and how important it is that we should return to first principles. This Society has always acknowledged Christ as Head. As we work under His direction, we shall work together in harmony. It seems to me if all the individual members would work in this way, there would not be jars or law-breaking or such unrighteousness among us.

I have desired, my dear friends, that you of this portion of the Church, which is now entering on the great work of taking care of one another, may be thoughtful and considerate all the time that you are working under the great Head of the Church. This will regulate you as individuals of God's Church, it will regulate you in all your movements, in all your intercourse with your neighbors, in trading and in dealing with one another. It will so regulate and guide you that you will manifest to mankind wherever you are that you are not ashamed of your Head, that you believe in Him and that you believe your eternal interest depends on Him.

I want us to be more serious and considerate as accountable beings and as laborers in the great work of the Church. I do not seem to have words to convey to you my desire and heartfelt exercise that you may be found prosperous here, that you may have an influence here. I believe as you do live under the guidance and teaching of the Holy Head of the Church that you will exert an influence over your neighbors and they will love you and will acknowledge that you are lovers of the Lord Jesus Christ and that you are not ashamed to own Him wherever your lot is cast. You will love God and love man and the breathing of your spirit will be "peace on earth, good-will to men." These teachings of the Holy Spirit will do away with all wars and fightings, for God has told us that we cannot love Him and hate our brother. It would be inconsistent for us to raise up a weapon to wound our brother, to injure his body or his feelings.

Now, my brethren, we may try ourselves by the law and know whether we believe or not. It seems to be a very essential thing that we believe because without faith it is "impossible to please God." We believe in the great saving doctrine of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we do not, we are not traveling in the narrow way that leads to happiness. We may further test our love; do we love God supremely and above everything else? We love Him because of His earthly blessings, but do we love Him because He sent His son and opened the way to heaven? Do we love our friends and neighbors as ourselves? Do we love those who hate us, despitefully use us and persecute us? Can we pray for them or do we engage in retaliation? There is a great deal for sinners to do to become divested of sin, but we cannot go to heaven with our sins. We must be born again, take up our cross, deny ourselves and follow the Captain of our salvation from day to day. Then we are all one in Christ. We all want to be happy while we live and we all want to be happy when death comes. If through the providence and grace of God, there has been an overcoming of the world, through this same Power there will be victory over death, hell and the grave. We can then exclaim with Paul: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

[Some of our readers have had the privilege of listening to lectures by T. R. Glover. They and others, we believe, will enjoy reading this rather racy review of a recent book of his.—Eds.]

THE JESUS OF HISTORY.*

This book has grown out of lectures which the author gave in a good many cities in India during the winter of 1915-16. To some of his readers they recall vividly hours in the lecture room at Woodbrooke shortly before Dr. Glover sailed for India, when he drew out the sympathy and thought of English students as to the message to students needed in India. We found then, and the thought receives fresh emphasis now, that the message which men's hearts need the world over is the same; it is Jesus Christ who satisfies the human heart. The book will be specially welcome to many who have heard Dr. Glover lecture, as they recognize lines of thought which he has opened out to them and which we are glad are now reaching a wider public. We understand the first edition of the book is already exhausted, and that a second will be available shortly.

Dr. Glover approaches Christianity as the historical and classical student, basing his argument on the appeal to facts, and on this basis of experience he provides a foundation for thought which is always seeking to carry us on further. Religion is not something superimposed on ordinary life; it "is a natural working of the human spirit, and as students of history we reckon with the religious instinct as a factor of the highest import." Our author goes on to show what "a force of unparalleled power in human affairs" the Christian Church has been. Referring specially to the questioning of old systems of religious belief in India to-day, he shows that this owes its impulse to the missionary faith that believed "that Jesus Christ was still a real power, permanent and destined to hold a large place in the affairs of men."

If we attempt to sum up in a sentence or two the main thought of Dr. Glover's book, it is that we are in danger of underestimating Jesus Christ, that we do not see how far He reveals to us the mind and purpose of God and so our interpretation of Christian faith is too often narrow, poor and thin. The words of Jesus to Peter (Mark viii.33) are rendered into modern English, "You think like a man; you don't think like God," and to this phrase Dr. Glover returns frequently to illustrate mistaken thought of God. "The first thing Jesus had to do, as a teacher, was to induce men to re-think God. Men, he saw, do not want precepts; they do not want ethics, morals or rules; what they do need is to re-think God, to re-discover Him, to re-explore Him, to live on the basis of relation with God."

The greater part of the book is an attempt to make us see afresh "the fact of Christ" not in dogma or theory but as one who shared and fathomed the depths of human life. The result, as all who know Dr. Glover's lectures will expect, is to give us an extraordinarily vivid and inspiring picture of Jesus. A sentence from the Confessions of St. Augustine quoted more than once—"One loving spirit sets another on fire"—is characteristic of the book itself as well as of its theme. The brief chapter entitled "Childhood and Youth" is charming in its suggestions of what Jesus saw and learnt in the years at Nazareth. "Jesus grew up in an Oriental town with poor houses, bad smells, and worse stories, tragedies of widow and prodigal son, of unjust judge and grasping publican—yes, and comedies, too," and we have pictured the carpenter's shop and those who would go in and out of it. "Are we to think that all the tenderness of Jesus came to Him by a miracle when He was thirty years of age? Must we not think it was all growing up in that house and in that shop?" So, sharing the life in a small country town with its intimate knowledge of the lives of others, we find One to whom "God is real, living and personal," "a real Father with a real father's heart," and who "brings men to the new exploration of God, to the new commitment of themselves to God, simply by the ordinary mechanism of friendship and love."

A genuine faith in God's concern for the ordinary daily lives of men is surely one of our great needs to-day. "The practical working religion of a great many of us rests on a feeling that God is a very long way off." Dr. Glover does a great service in showing that the religion which Jesus reveals brings man into direct contact with God in all the relations of life. "The type of holiness which Jesus teaches can be achieved with an ordinary diet, and a wife and five children." And again he points out "there is little need of special machinery for contact with God," and quotes a sentence from Harnack—"a living faith needs no special methods." So it comes to pass that "Jesus never feels that men have any need of a priesthood to come between or to help them to God; God does all that. There is no common concern, no matter of food or clothing, no mere detail of the ordinary round of common duty and common life, but God is there." We get a long way from this kind of thought of God as a rule, and we blame Him when we have wandered away from Him and got "lost." Dr. Glover has some illuminating pages on what Jesus meant by the lost He came to save. While there is little allusion to the present strife, the book is none the less a message which should bring hope and cheer to many who need it.—H. M. N., in The Friend [London].

REVEALING THE RISEN LIFE.

"They came, not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead."

The world was watching this man who had been raised to life; they watch every one who has new life in Christ. What sort of a testimony are our lives telling forth? A young woman came before the session of a Presbyterian church and said she wished to unite with that church. No one present knew her; she made an unusually clear confession of faith, impressing the minister so much that he asked her how she had been led to Christ. "Through Dr. S.," she replied. "Is Dr. S. a friend of yours?" she was asked. "No," she said, "I have never met or even seen him." She was a telephone operator and had had night service from 9 P. M. to 3 A. M. Receiving many calls for this physician she had more than once rung his bell by mistake. Always he answered not only with courtesy, but with a voice that showed no trace of impatience. It was such a grateful relief from the surly sleepy voices of others awakened at midnight, or the harsh expressions directed at her when she called a wrong number by mistake, that she finally became deeply interested and wanted to know the secret of the difference between Dr. S. and other men. She learned that Christ was supreme in his heart and life. Soon Dr. S.'s Saviour was her Saviour.—From the Sunday School Times.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

POPULAR SOPHISTRY.

'Twas a dangerous cliff, as was freely confess'd,
Tho' to walk near the crest was so pleasant,
But over its terrible edge there had slipped
Some statesmen and many a peasant,
Till the people demanded protection be given,
Yet their projects did not at all tally,
Said some, "Put a railing along by the cliff,"
And some, "Put an ambulance down in the valley."

But the cry for the ambulance carried the day,
As it spread thru the neighboring city;
A fence might be useful enough in its way,
But the hearts of the many were brimful of pity
For the crippled and dying who fell from the wall.
So the dwellers in mansion and alley
Gave pounds or gave pence, not at all for a fence,
But an ambulance down in the valley.

Then an old sage said, "It's a marvel to me
That people give far more attention
To repairing results than to stopping the cause;
'Twere wiser to study prevention."
"Let us stop at its source all this mischief," he cried,
"Come, neighbors and friends, let us rally;
If the cliff we but fence we may almost dispense
With the ambulance down in the valley."

"Oh, he's a fanatic," the people rejoined;
"Dispense with the ambulance? Never!
Ain't we picking up people as fast as they fall,
And reaping a blessing forever?
Why should people of sense go put up a fence
While the ambulance works in the valley?"

THE AMBULANCE PHILOSOPHY still has its ardent defenders among the manufacturers and dispensers of intoxicants, and seems to be accepted pretty generally, though sadly, as the "only thing we can do" in connection with war. But the number of those who perceive the causes, and who are trying at least to close the spile, is increasing. "This ought ye to have done and not to have left the other undone."

THE UNITED STATES BREWERS' YEAR BOOK for 1916 is interesting and not unprofitable reading to all who desire to see that Association, and the industry it seeks to promote, put out of business. The book is similar in size and binding to those of previous years—having more than 300 pages—but this edition is not illustrated. Readers who are not in sympathy with the aims of the Brewers' Association will gather encouragement from their admissions. Thus in the Introduction we read, "At no time in the world's history has public attention been given so largely to the question of drink. It is by far the chief social question of the day, and not even in Europe, where a dozen nations have become engulfed in a war of unparalleled dimensions, has it been obscured. On the contrary . . . it is not an exaggeration to say that the proper method of dealing with it has come to be recognized as a matter of war policy, taking its place with that of raising armies, building navies, increasing revenues, planning campaigns, and the actual fighting of troops on the battle front." The famous declaration of David Lloyd-George of England does not appear to be quoted, however. He said, "We are fighting Germany, Austria and Drink, and so far as I can see, the greatest of these deadly foes is Drink." But, to quote further from the Year Book, we note with joy the admission, "Here in the United States the question has become pronouncedly national within the year. Encouraged by spectacular victories in several States, the prohibition forces laid siege to Congress. They demanded the passage of the bill intended to establish prohibition in the District of Columbia, and the adoption of the proposed Constitutional Amendment, which, if duly ratified, would forbid the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages throughout the whole United States." The passage of the District of Columbia Bill is not noted, but a thirty-page "postscript" gives the Webb-Kenyon decision of the Supreme Court and a symposium of newspaper opinion of all kinds regarding it. The anti-liquor press hails the decision as a great victory for them, giving States that have outlawed the traffic a fair chance to enforce their prohibition law. The liquor press, on the other hand, finds a gleam of hope in the suggestion that "one of the chief props of the argument in favor of national prohibition has been taken away" by the Webb-Kenyon Act. The "prop" referred to was the claim that "States are powerless to bring about effective prohibition; therefore, if it is to be had at all, it must be had through Federal action."

OTHER MATTER IN THE YEAR BOOK is equally significant. Let us classify some of it. 1.—Reform. That there are many evils incident to the "business" is frankly admitted. The President of the Convention, Gustave Pabst, offers several suggestions "which may be influential in stemming the growing sentiment in opposition to our industry." (A) Discrimination in granting licenses. (B) Gradual decrease in the number of licensed stands. (C) "An aggressive campaign in the interest of truth respecting our industry and its product." Unfortunately for President Pabst and his following, the statements which they classify as "truth" are not universally accepted as such. Thus in his opening address he begins by saying, "Elections have been held in eight States. The 'wets' won by large majorities in California, Maryland, Missouri and Vermont. The 'drys' won (nothing said about majorities or of other States that voted) in Michigan, Montana, Nebraska and South Dakota." The cold fact is that prohibition won four States out of eight and the liquor men did not win any. They merely retained with a weakened grip what they held before. 2.—Compensation. Foreseeing their doom, the liquor men are now preaching the wrongfulness (?) of "confiscation" (refusal to renew a license) and pleading the justice (?) of "compensation." 3.—Whiskey does the mischief. Recognizing the force of an awakened public that is beginning to see the real truth about the liquor trade, the brewers are endeavoring now to allay public indignation by condemning whiskey and praising beer. They are succeeding well in this ruse, for people as a rule are charitable towards evil, but the facts about beer are rapidly becoming known. It may yield a larger profit to the manufacturer and distributor because it does not kill its victim so soon, but the mischief and ruin it works is more than the public will tolerate when once the people perceive it. 4.—Tobacco, Tea and Coffee. The liquor men are doing everything within their power to induce the tobacco trade to join with them in their fight for continuance. They endeavor to confuse the issue and becloud the facts by claiming that these "prohibition fanatics" are seeking other worlds to conquer. 5.—The Anti-Saloon League is the one organization that the brewers seem most to fear, condemn and endeavor to stigmatize. "In every State where it has brought about prohibition, the League has been stirred to greater activity and to bolder grasping for power," says Hugh F. Fox, Secretary for the Brewers. He characterizes the work of the A. S. L. "usurpation of governmental authority." He charges them with "organizing crowds to invade court-rooms and brow-beat judges and juries in liquor cases." Did the reader ever engage in this kind of militant work—"brow-beating judges and juries?" The climax of the suggestions of "frightfulness" is that if the A. S. L. should succeed in bringing about national prohibition they might assume the police function in national affairs. Was not the State Superintendent of the League in Virginia selected as "Commissioner of Prohibition" with "power to appoint an army of deputies?" Probably these high compliments to the A. S. L. from the Brewers' Year Book may be explained by the fact that things did not go as the brewers wanted them to down in Virginia and West Virginia and in other places.

SOME STATEMENTS OF INTEREST (if true).—In a paper called The Other Side, having as a motto, "The truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth," published by the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association at Cincinnati, we find this interesting assertion and comment, viz.: "Alcohol is indispensable to the manufacture of the only kind of powder that can be used by the U. S. Army and Navy. In case of war the present production of alcohol would be hopelessly inadequate for that purpose. Two years or more would be required to restore the capacity already lost by the passage of prohibition statutes. Could an enemy of our country, therefore, accomplish more for his cause than by bringing about the enactment of 'dry' laws?"

In the same publication we read also an estimate that "the present annual output of alcohol in this country would not be sufficient to supply one-third of the smokeless powder consumed in a four days' engagement at Verdun." And again, "It is a good time to take stock and get back to the old safe doctrine of 'live and let live,' if we do not want to encourage discord and even revolution in this country."

The Anti-Prohibition Manual is another publication that has come to hand recently, having been forwarded with other literature of its class from a librarian in Massachusetts who writes that "such stuff" is intended for the library reading table, "but never gets there." It is to be hoped that other librarians are similarly discriminating. So long as the reading public are so credulous in regard to what they see in print, is it not as much a duty to protect the gullible adult as the open-minded child. Friends in every neighborhood should see that the local library is supplied with reliable literature on the temperance question, and librarians should be asked to give the subject of misleading literature their careful attention.

NATIONAL AND STATE BREWERS FINED.—A fine of $10,000, the limit under the Federal penal code, was levied against the United States Brewers' Association, of New York, by Judge Thomson, in the United States District Court at Pittsburgh.

In bringing the famous brewery probe to a close, 33 brewing corporations of Pennsylvania and the Brewers' Association pleaded no defense to raising a fund exceeding a million dollars to influence the 1914 election of a United States Senator and 36 members of Congress in Pennsylvania.

The Federal Prosecutor said: "The Pennsylvania State Brewers' Association was one of the associated organizations. The defendant companies, through this Association, undertook to control the nomination and election of virtually every public officer elected within the commonwealth, from Governor down, including members of Congress and United States Senators.

"The expenditures that year exceed $1,000,000. The very fact that the records were destroyed warrants the conclusion that there may have been other funds of which the government has no knowledge."

AN INTERESTING REPORT comes from the Temperance Committee of Pasadena Monthly Meeting (Hickory Grove Quarter, Iowa) showing the scope of their work during the past year. Without the activities of such committees the members of a monthly meeting are apt to be ignorant of the opportunities when their assistance is most helpful, and to become discouraged or indifferent.

OUR truest praying is that which we cannot express in any words, our heart's unutterable longings, when we sit at God's feet and look up into His face, and do not speak at all, but let our hearts talk.—J. R. MILLER.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

THE GOLDEN CLEW.—By G. Crosfield.—Chapter ix.—THE LESSON OF THE RESTING TREES.—(Extracts.) Dorothy's favorite seat was in the orchard. The flower-garden was delightful in its way; but here among the fruit-trees she felt there was more purpose, and though she had never thought out the reason, perhaps the sight of the laden branches pleased her earnest nature. She was a little dismayed, therefore, when, one morning, late in the autumn she sought the sheltered spot, whence she could see them hitherto stretched in fruitful lines before her, to find that the gardener had stripped them nearly all the day before; and the place, shorn of its glory, seemed filled now only with barren stems, round which the leaves were already rustling, for the dryness of autumn frost was upon them.

As she turned to the book she had brought to study, she heard voices near, and recognized her aunt talking to the gardeners. Dorothy asked her aunt to sit down for a moment beside her.

"It is not a very comfortable seat, Aunt Mary, but I liked it because it was just where I could see the trees so nicely. Now, however, all the fruit is gone, and I don't think I shall come here again."

"Why not?" said Aunt Mary. "It is very dry and sunny here, there is a pleasant old-world sense of quiet among these resting trees, now that their work for the year is over."

"That is just it," said Dorothy. "The fruit is all gone. I like to look at the fruit. Now—"

"Now what?" said Aunt Mary, laughing. "Surely we are not so unreasonable as to suppose they would always be laden with apples? Now the time has come for the trees to silently gather together their forces for the crop next year. Perhaps they don't look so nice, that is all."

"No, they don't," said Dorothy. "They look dying and lazy, almost stupid; they don't inspire me a bit."

"That is just as well, I think," said Aunt Mary. "Sometimes lately, I have been afraid thou was crowding thy life too much, and making thy life work almost a worry instead of a joy. Of course I know, dear Dorothy, why thou art trying to live every moment of thy life well, and I love thee for it. But no one can go on working successfully without resting, too. There must come 'seventh-days' in our lives, if the work is to be 'very good'—real rest in the sense of refreshment and change, and gathering strength in every way; new thoughts, new pleasures, new avenues for interest and hope, when, like the fallow ground, we lay ourselves open to all the gentler influences around us; the breezes from heaven breathe over us; the dews of the earth fall, and we drink them in. Let us be like these trees—a time for blossom, then for fruit, then for rest. There would be no fruit if there were no rest. We want time to read, time to think, time to do nothing, and let the different seeds swell and sprout and spring up."

While Aunt Mary was speaking, Dorothy drew a letter out of her pocket. It was from Marion, who had been back at school a few weeks.

"It is curious that when Marion wants thy advice, dear aunt, she sometimes asks me to find it for her, she loves thee so very dearly; how is it?"

"That is the reason, I think," replied her aunt. "Those who love each other most, often find greater walls of reserve between them, which do not exist with comparative strangers. I quite understand Marion, for I remember the same feeling of shyness I had at her age towards those I loved. But when I have had the courage to overcome it, I have been richly rewarded for the effort it has cost me. We want to be more simple and frank, and then these difficulties would melt away. As thou grows older, thou will see how much needless worry and unhappiness, and ill-health, people give themselves in this strain to be always doing; sometimes from pure ambition, lest others should go beyond them and surpass them; sometimes from a restless anxiety to use every moment of their short life well. Such hurry defeats its end. We lose the freshness and brightness and elasticity which help us to do things quickly and readily. The work becomes a drag, and at last we often cause anxiety to our friends through exhausted health, if we do not become a trial, through our nervous, irritable temper. Get into a good habit of taking rest, when it comes to thee. 'God works in the silence of God,' and often in these silent times of rest we learn most."

"I have certainly often noticed," said Dorothy, "that nothing helps me more than my quiet time for Bible reading, when I get it. It is not only the teaching out of the Bible—the quiet seems to help me."

"It is both, I expect," said Aunt Mary, "there is a great, steady power in the daily study of the Bible. It gives, as it were, an anchorage for the day; that is, when that study becomes by prayer a real message to our hearts. Such study forms and molds the character; gives it weight and dignity, wisdom, as none other can give. We seem, while we read, to enter into an atmosphere. It is the deepest, grandest quality of mind and soul. We are powerless to understand it, if the Holy Spirit does not Himself teach us what it means. And then, too, when we have tested for ourselves the truth of the Bible, and have found out, time after time, how wonderfully its message to us has fitted into our need day by day, we begin to look upon it almost as a personal, living friend, and turn to it with confidence, sure that it will always guide us, and never disappoint us. And in this way we are secure. It is useless to try and convince those whose faith has been built up by daily and hourly proofs. Truth of this kind becomes part of ourselves, it cannot be shaken."

The pale, chastened sunlight was gradually clouding over, and a somewhat chilling breeze swept suddenly through the orchard. Aunt Mary got up and folded her shawl around Dorothy, who was beginning to look cold.

As they went, stooping now and then under the arching boughs, Dorothy said:

"I feel almost as though I had been thoughtless and unkind toward these poor trees. After all, perhaps, they are doing God's will better than I am."

"They are simply doing His will, that is all," said Aunt Mary. "When we have learned to do the same we enter into rest."

Dorothy said nothing, but picked a withered leaf off one of the boughs as she passed. She slipped it into her Bible when she got home. She meant to keep it there, lest she should ever forget what the resting trees had taught her that morning.

A PACIFIST AMONG SAVAGES.

THE NEW TEACHER.

A short time after my experience, in response to an appeal for a teacher in Satanta's camp (another Kiowa chief, of whom we shall hear later), a man offered his services and was accepted.

One day, not feeling very well, he lay down at the root of a large tree, when suddenly he heard the twang of a bow-string and an arrow whizzed just above his head and stuck in the tree—quickly following was another, and another; a whole cloud of arrows all a little too high to harm him, if he lay still, but so close that he dared not rise. Had he made a few quick turns over, sprung up and taunted them about their awkward shooting and offered them a better chance, manifesting a little of the true spirit of bravery, he might have been a serviceable man in their camp, but they continued to torment him during the next ten days, making him miserable, until they went to the Agency for their rations, and he went with them. When within twelve miles of it, Satanta and his son rode up, one on each side of him, giving the mule he was riding a sharp cut with their riding whips and keeping it up all the way to the Agency, making a shorter trip than was usual. The poor man came in looking so badly all were alarmed at his woe-begone appearance. This first trip to the Indian camp was his last. He thought it preferable to return home. When the agent questioned them as to why they hustled him in so hurriedly Satanta replied—"I look at him while his mule drink, I think he going to die, and I no want him to die on my hands."

This same son of Satanta was body-guard for Thomas C. Battey, when he was in the Kiowa camp, and was very faithful later on in his watchfulness over him.

After being in camp about two weeks, arrangements were being made to remove to another place, and the agent sent men and a team who took my tent and fixtures, and proceeded in advance of the tribe. After raising my tent, the Agency men went to the timber about a mile distant to procure some wood for me.

During their absence an Indian came galloping along, some distance from my tent. He passed by it, turned and rode back and forth several times in front of it, each time a little nearer, but riding fast, giving no time for a shot should it be an enemy's tent.

I was sitting in the tall grass in front of it. When he approached so near that I thought he might see me, I arose and placed my hands in a position to show I was not armed, gave him the usual salutation and beckoned for him to approach. He stopped when he saw that I was unarmed, but continued to sit with his bow strung and some arrows in his hand. I slowly stepped towards him and offered him my hand, which he hesitatingly took, asking if I was alone and who I was? I answered—"I, Kiowa: Who are you?" He replied—"Kiowa," and asked, "If you Kiowa—who your chief?" "Kicking Bird," I replied. "Kicking Bird!" he repeated in great surprise, and asked if I knew Stumbling Bear. I told him that I did, that he and others with their people would soon be here. He then dismounted, but kept his bow strung. By this time the Agency wagon came in sight, with a load of wood; he manifested some anxiety when he saw it, until I informed him who it was, when he settled down again.

He informed me he had been with some warriors into Colorado and was just on his return, that his men were encamped in some timber about two miles away; that seeing my tent he had come to see who was there, and would wait to see the Kiowas when they came.

About an hour afterwards Stumbling Bear and several other chiefs came with their people and encamped nearby.

The Indian with whom I had thus made acquaintance proved to be Catt, a Kiowa war-chief, just returning from a raiding expedition in Colorado, whither he had gone immediately after driving off some two hundred mules from the guarded corral under the guns of Fort Sill, which daring exploit made him famous with his tribe.

From this time he attached himself to the friendly element of the tribe and was ever after a warm friend of mine. Had I been armed these good results might not have followed.

PATRIOTISM.

Patriotism is a passion of love to the community, and of national brotherhood.—LOEB SHAPTESBURY, 1711.

Love is an essential part of Patriotism.

Hatred of other countries leads to Oppression at home and invites Antagonisms abroad.

The Patriot labors—

To improve and create, not to injure and destroy.

To raise his own country, not to degrade another nation.

To promote International Friendship and Helpfulness, not to arouse a boastful and quarrelsome spirit.

The man who lives to better the condition of his fellow-men and add to the happiness of their lives; to raise up a people strong in limb, true in word and deed, brave, sober, temperate, chaste: this man truly serves the State.

He conserves its fundamental strength.

He truly loves his country.

He is a real Patriot.

Every day life is full of opportunities for practicing such patriotism.—Issued by William C. Allen, San José, Cal.

NEWS ITEMS.

FIFTH MONTH 26, 1917.

OFFICE OF THE FRIEND, 207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia:—

DEAR FRIENDS—Under this date our Committee of the Representative Meeting for the collection of funds in aid of war sufferers are forwarding draft to Isaac Sharp, London, to be applied as follows:

Friends' Ambulance Unit.....	$ 145.00
War Victims' Relief Committee.....	285.00
Emergency Committee for the Relief of Aliens.....	167.00
Belgian Relief Committee.....	54.00
Subject to Allocation by the Sub-committee of the Meeting for Sufferings.....	1,033.16
Total.....	$1,684.16

Very truly,

JOHN WAY,
For the Committee.

It is understood that Agnes L. Tierney, Joseph Elkinton, Max I. Reich and Albert H. Votaw were in attendance at New York Yearly Meeting.

FOUR dormitory cottages at Penn College have been given names that will link them to important types of Quaker character, viz: Margaret Fell, Elizabeth Fry, Mary Dyer and Sybil Jones.

THE Yearly Meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets, adopted this minute: "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, in session at Fifteenth and Race Streets, hereby declares that it is uncompromisingly opposed to all wars, believing them to be evil and inefficient methods of advancing human interests."

It is reported that seven Haverford men have been accepted by English Friends for their reconstruction work in France.

THE death of John Frederick Hanson is reported from Portland, Oregon. He came to this country in 1856 with his parents from Norway. At the age of seventeen he united with Friends and soon began in broken English to speak in meeting. He was a recognized minister for over fifty years. His several religious journeys abroad and his extensive travel in this country made him widely known. He was in Denmark at the thirty-fifth anniversary of the organization of temperance work there. His experience in riding at the head of a procession of fifty thousand people, greeted with hurrahs, where thirty-five years previous he was scoffed and jeered, and addressing a great mass meeting in the park, makes one of the most notable instances of modern Quaker history. At the same time he also attended and spoke at the unveiling of the monument between Norway and Sweden, commemorating their one hundred years of peace. He was in his seventy-sixth year.

LEVINUS K. PAINTER has given information in the American Friend of two informal Friends' meetings in which our readers are much interested. We adapt the following from his letter:

The group in Cornell University meet each First-day evening for worship in Barnes Hall on the University campus. They have been actively engaged in the work of the Fellowship of Reconciliation and other constructive peace agencies. A part of the group have been in training in the University Ambulance Unit.

The second group is at Syracuse University. They meet regularly for First-day morning worship at the home of Prof. Tatnall, 101 Clarke Street, Syracuse. Members of the group have been active in the University International Policy Club and in the Consumer's League of the city. They have some funds at their disposal, so they are able to secure speakers to address them along lines of constructive patriotism. This group has set itself to working out a feasible plan of war relief and reconstruction that will apply to all nations alike, believing that such a plan, if launched on a sufficiently large scale, would be a large factor in promoting international good-will. The plan is being submitted to several organizations of national scope.

These groups of Friends in educational centers where our views are almost unknown are seizing their opportunity to spread these views. They find many who agree with them and who are glad to work with them.

The Yearly Meeting of Friends that is held at the Moses Brown School, Providence, R. I., includes the week from Sixth Month 25th to Seventh Month 1st. It is announced that rooms at the Boarding School range from eighty cents to $1.50 per day, board $1.00 per day. Friends desiring accommodations should write to Frances E. Wheeler, Moses Brown School, Providence, R. I.

M. NAKAMURA, of Tsuchiura, Japan, spent a few days among Friends and others in Pasadena recently, and spoke briefly one evening at the "Friendly Circle" on the Peace Work of Gilbert Bowles.

The Federal Council of Churches recently in session in Washington, made some concession, in their declaration, to the Quaker point of view as will appear in the following. This was due to the presence and pleading of two members of the Society.

What is the mission of the church in this hour of crisis and danger? It is to bring all that is done or planned in the nation's name to the test of the mind of Christ. That mind upon one point we do not all interpret alike. With sincere conviction some of us believe that it is forbidden the disciple of Christ to engage in war under any circumstances. Most of us believe that the love of all men which Christ enjoins, demands that we defend with all the power given us the sacred rights of humanity. But we are all at one in loyalty to our country, and in steadfast and whole-hearted devotion to her service.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.—The annual Spring gathering of the Alumni Association was held at the School Fifth Month 18th. The late afternoon was an informal social occasion. Supper was served in the School dining-room, and in the evening F. Schuyler Mathews, the artist and naturalist of Cambridge, Mass., lectured on "Bird Music."

Another lecture on birds was given by one of our old students, Henry J. Fry, on the afternoon of the 24th. His main theme was the individuality of some of our common varieties of birds.

The closing exercises are to be held this year on the afternoon of Sixth Month 8th, at 3 o'clock. J. Henry Bartlett is to deliver the address to the graduating class.

Gertrude Roberts Sherer, who has been spending the year in study at Leland Stanford University and the University of California, is expected to return to the School as a teacher of English next year. She was granted the degree of M. A. from Leland Stanford on the 22nd.

Alice Owen Albertson, who has been serving as a substitute in Gertrude Sherer's place during the present year, expects to return next year as teacher of German.

Elizabeth W. Warner, Jr., a graduate of Westtown in the Class of 1916, has been appointed Assistant Teacher in the Primary Department.

Mary Althea Doan, of Indiana, a graduate of Guilford College, who spent a year in graduate study at Bryn Mawr, will assume the duties of teacher of mathematics in place of Mary A. Wickersham, who has been granted a year's leave of absence for rest and study in California.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

It was announced at Bryn Mawr College that Helen Herron Taft, the only daughter of President Taft, had been elected unanimously dean of the college by the directors. She is a graduate of Bryn Mawr, having won the first matriculation scholarship for Pennsylvania and the southern States, awarded purely on grade, when she entered Bryn Mawr in 1908.

Congress appropriated $17,700,000 for food survey or census, and for increasing production, conserving supply and preventing waste of food. Representative J. Rankin had the following amendment added: "In the work of survey, women shall be employed 'as far as practicable.'"

The Lawyers' Club of New York has formed a $50,000 corporation, hired 400 acres from the Stewart Estate near Garden City, L. I., and will raise vegetables. It was at first proposed that each member be pledged to cultivate an acre, but instead an expert superintendent is to employ farm labor—which will produce better results.

The small diocese of Arkansas has just led the Episcopal Church of the country in electing a colored man a suffragan bishop, and also in electing two suffragans, the limit allowed by law, for one diocese. It is stated that this leadership of Arkansas was taken only after consultation with other Episcopal dioceses in the South, and that at least four other colored suffragan bishops are to be chosen.

A new gift by John D. Rockefeller of $25,000,000 to the endowment of the Rockefeller Foundation was announced at New York last week by Dr. George E. Vincent.

In the Year Book of the Congregational Churches in the United States for the year 1916 we find that there are among them 2278 churches which have fewer than fifty members to a church. That expresses the present condition of more than one-third of the Congregational churches in our land.

The month just closed has seen the inauguration at the University of Chicago of the William Vaughn Moody lectures, on a foundation of $20,000, and after the same plan as the Barbour-Page lectures at the University of Virginia and the Lowell lectures in Boston.

FOREIGN.—Compulsory military service on a selective basis at once to raise to least 50,000 and probably 100,000 men to make good the wastage in the Canadian army corps in France, was proposed to Parliament at Ottawa, Ont.

The Franchise Reform Bill being pushed in the British Parliament, grants the vote to 6,000,000 women, as well as to 2,000,000 men hitherto outside the pale for one reason or another.

A despatch from London says: "The number of women who are acting directly as substitutes for men in field, office and workshop has now passed the 1,000,000 mark, according to figures printed by the Board of Trade labor gazette."

It was announced by Premier Lloyd-George in the House of Commons at London that the government proposed to summon immediately a convention of representative Irishmen in Ireland to submit to the British Parliament a constitution for the future government of Ireland.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions announces that on Third Month 31 the last ounce of opium was sold in China. Thus ends the prohibition movement which began ten years ago. The foreign syndicate of Shanghai offered the Government $7,000,000 for the privilege of continuing sales of the drug another six months, in order that they might work off their remaining stock. At that time China was beseeching the United States for a loan of $5,000,000 to meet a special emergency, and was being refused. Nevertheless the Shanghai offer was declined. Does history offer a greater example of moral determination on the part of a nation?

NOTICES.

SCIPIO QUARTERLY MEETING of Friends will be held at Poplar Ridge, N. Y., Sixth Month 9, 1917. Select Meeting the afternoon previous.

A PUBLIC MEETING for Divine Worship will be held in Wilgus Hall, at Hathoro, Penna., on First-day afternoon, Sixth Month 17, at 3.30 P. M. The Meeting has been arranged by a Committee under appointment by Abington Quarterly Meeting, held at Germantown. An earnest and cordial invitation is extended to the public generally.

MID-WEEK MEETINGS for worship at Twelfth Street will be held at 10.30 A. M., after Sixth Month 1st (until Tenth Month 1st). Monthly Meetings will follow the morning meeting for worship—the first one occurring on Sixth Month 20th.

A MEETING for Divine Worship will be held at Friends' Meeting-house at Stony Brook, near Princeton, N. J., on First-day, Sixth Month 17th, at 3 P. M. A cordial invitation is extended to all who feel interested to attend. Trolleys for Princeton, leaving corner of State and Montgomery Streets, Trenton, at one o'clock, one-thirty and two, run by the meeting-house grounds. Leave car at stop number 40. Returning, trolleys leave Stony Brook at 4.30 and 5.00 o'clock, reaching Pennsylvania Railroad Station at Trenton at 5.40 and 6.10, connecting with train for Philadelphia at 6.14, due at Broad Street Station at 7.00 o'clock. For further information, address Jos. S. Middleton, Crosswicks, N. J., Wm. B. Kirkbride, 908 Berkeley Avenue, Trenton, N. J., Dallas Reeve, 2 Southard Street, Trenton, N. J.

MEETINGS from Sixth Month 10th to 16th:—Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting, at Moorestown, Fifth-day, Sixth Month 14th, at 10 A. M.

HUMANITARIAN INVESTMENTS.

From almsgiving to a method of help that encourages self-reliance and self-respect—a change of practice from merely administering relief to a system of cure and even of prevention—marks the forward movement and the forward look of civilization and philanthropy. Simply to pity the unfortunate and to give something toward the amelioration of their sad state will not satisfy all the demands of an enlightened modern conscience. Neither will benevolent autocracies supply the place of the recognition of the just claims of manhood and of humanity in the affairs of social and economic relations. More and more the principle of co-operation is being acknowledged and applied, and the demands of justice (including that of the right to opportunity) are being increasingly pressed upon our attention, or were being pressed before the pall of war settled so heavily upon the world. Even this calamity will doubtless make some of these demands more clear.

There are, it is true, many thousands of instances in which relief and care must be administered without any prospect of bringing the recipients into a condition of self-help, and the number of these will be tremendously increased by the disasters of war. It is likely that for many years to come there will be the call and the opportunity for the well-to-do to share their comforts with the needy and to make free provision for the comforts. Happily, the sense of responsibility in the possession of means, a vision of the duties and privileges of stewardship, and the exercise of these on a basis of sympathy, have not been wanting in thousands of people, who have nevertheless been hampered, so to speak, by the age-long systems of business and the conditions arising from them. But in a revised order of industrial and commercial policies—such as we may look for in the not very distant future—much of the “giving” will doubtless take the form of greater co-operation and a more liberal sharing of opportunities.

The particular thought, however, indicated in the title of this essay has to do with the application of capital when a moderate income or interest from it is contemplated, the investment being, at the same time, made with particular reference to the benefit it will bring to needy people. This idea (by no means a novel one) goes even beyond the maxim that any business, to justify itself, should “benefit both sides”. It carries with it also a consideration of something besides the security of the investment and the reputation of the business: it means the operation of a philanthropic principle, which cannot always be judged or expressed by common notions of a “fair exchange”. The numerous enterprises founded and conducted (with varying degrees of success) under the names of homes, lodges and the like, are evidences of benevolent purpose and public-spirited interest on the part of many individuals and communities; while the work of housing commissions in improving the character and condition of city tenements counteracts to some extent the evil results of the plans of sordid investors, even though many of the better tenements are still, as Jacob Riis said, “built for revenue only”.

An illustration of the principle which the topic of this paper implies, is given in the management of the Dawes Hotel in Chicago, and of branches or similar establishments in other cities. These hotels have been built and furnished with a view to accommodating, in a comfortable and wholesome manner, a class of men who, without such provision, probably could not well meet the expenses of a like degree of comfort. Accordingly, the plan has been to make the lowest charge that would meet the costs of operation (with some allowance for liabilities, we may suppose), and leave a balance of profit answering to a moderate interest, say $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The results, so far as learned, have been gratifying, and the men who take advantage of the home-like comforts thus afforded have a satisfaction in the thought that they are not accepting these without paying for them.

Another interesting example of the same principle (though adapted to rather different conditions) is furnished by an experiment in lodging-houses and restaurants under the care of some Friends in the south of Ireland. The Friend (now deceased) who apparently started the system in that place, and followed it up until he had demonstrated its success, proceeded with true generosity to share the results of his experience, and to encourage others to work in a similar way. He published two pamphlets setting forth the methods employed, with full details of furnishing, management, prices, profits and so forth. On one of these appears a sub-title, “A new idea for philanthropic workers”. Since the decease of this Friend, other members of the family have continued the enterprise, exerting a helpful influence, one may believe, as well as bringing the benefits of good food and lodging within reach of many who are in sad need of them. At one of these houses a bed might be had for four pence; a breakfast of bread and butter and tea for two pence; and a dinner of soup, meat and vegetables for four pence. Yet these establishments have proved more than self-supporting.

Careful oversight and systematic attention to business details, as well as a real interest in the welfare of the people served, would of course be essential to success in any such experiments or undertakings as those we have been considering; but it is interesting to see that a very fair degree of success in the way of financial returns may actually be attained while a philanthropic purpose is perhaps the paramount consideration. Many persons who are not in a situation to give away large sums outright, may at least look about for such investments of capital as will directly help some who are in need of help, and thus yield a double satisfaction in the returns.

GETHSEMANE.

Sometime, somehow, somewhere, we are all introduced into a Gethsemane. As our Lord partook of our experiences, so do we of His. As He suffered, so will His followers suffer, and as His agony was an introduction into death to be succeeded by a resurrection unto endless life, so will it be with us.

According to the usage of the Jewish Passover, Jesus and His disciples had most probably an hour before at the supper-table, chanted the hymns in connection with the simple meal of which they had partaken, being the 113th to the 118th Psalms, inclusive. As He contemplated His impending doom, how our Lord must have felt the sharp cry of despair revealed in the 115th Psalm:

The dead praise not Jehovah,
Neither they that go down into silence.

How His heart, so human yet Divine, must have been for the moment comforted as the little band concluded that wonderful hallel:

O praise Jehovah all ye nations,
Laud Him all ye peoples.
For His loving-kindness is great toward us;
And the truth of Jehovah endureth forever.
Praise ye Jehovah!

We read that immediately thereafter our Lord led His followers out into the blackness of the night up to the little garden where He so often loved to go. The tired and anxious group sat down. No doubt the stone wall seemed close and hard and dark about them and the shadows of the olive trees depressed them, but the tinkle of the little stream as it fell upon the rocks soothed them with its familiar music whilst the Teacher said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death; tarry ye here, and watch with me."

And then He prayed. He prayed whilst they slept. Was there ever such a prayer? Were His few words not the culmination of all prayer? Were they not intended to be the final prayer of all His people when they say, "Not my will but Thine be done"? Is this not the prayer that God can always answer? Does He not desire us to make it?

His agony was terrible. The cold night wind failed to check the great drops of sweat that coursed His cheeks. The sins of the world rested upon Him. Those who have sinned and brought shame to themselves always have reason to bear the burden of their sins, but the result of their disobedience does not stress them alone. Their relations or friends oft-times partake even more deeply of the weight of their follies or wrong-doing. A nation may be led into Gethsemane because of the wickedness or errors of its leaders. Our sinless Christ that dreary night bore the burden of the huge aggregate of human woe—the just for the unjust—that on the morrow we, through Him, should be reconciled to God.

The spiritually dead can not praise Jehovah. Those who have been quickened by Christ will ever do so. We are the debtors to Gethsemane. Its deeper lessons we may never learn. But we can remember the cup of sorrow He drank that weary night, and partially realize its import to the world. As we think of it our very thoughts may join in the refrain from Judea's hills:

Praise ye Jehovah!

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

The following brief excerpts from the reports of Dublin Yearly Meeting are taken from The Friend (London) of Fifth Month 11th:

The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, open to all Friends, which precedes the opening of the Yearly Meeting was held on the afternoon of the 2nd inst., about sixty Friends being present; of these two-thirds were women and about the same proportion of the whole were members of Dublin Monthly Meeting. The noticeable decrease in attendance of Friends from the Provinces may have been partly owing to the discontinuance by the railway companies of reduced fares; perhaps also to the prevalent feeling of unsettlement if not of insecurity.

About 100 persons were present at the opening of the Yearly Meeting. Ernest addresses were delivered in the time of worship and the voice of prayer uplifted for all in need of guidance and comfort and for those in authority in this and other countries.

The Nomination Committee recommended the reappointment of W. Frederick Bewley as Clerk and of Sarah Barcroft and Edgar A. Pim as Assistant Clerks, and the recommendation was adopted.

The Clerk stated that while a number of Epistles had been received from the American Yearly Meetings, there had been no communication regarding the Five Years' Meeting, which in regular course would be held in the autumn, and to which Dublin Yearly Meeting in former years had been invited to send fraternal delegates. He thought it probable that the usual invitation had been sent, but had been lost with other letters through the action of war. He queried what action, if any, the Meeting would take. Would Friends send a message, assuming that the invitation had been sent? Under the prevailing circumstances he thought the Meeting could hardly ask Friends to cross the Atlantic as representatives.

After deliberation, it was decided to empower the Yearly Meeting's Committee to deal with the matter, when the exact circumstances had been ascertained.

Some Friends urged that the danger of the ocean voyage was not a sufficient reason for not appointing representatives. Ministers of the State could cross the seas, and men braved the greater dangers of the battlefield in the path of duty. Surely members of the Society of Friends should be at least as brave as they.

The Clerk said he drew a very clear distinction between a Friend under a clear individual call of duty facing all dangers and privations in obeying that call, and the appointment of delegates by the Society or the asking of Friends to go to America under present circumstances.

FIFTH-DAY EVENING.—About 300 persons were present at this sitting, which partook somewhat of the nature of the conferences which formerly occupied the evening sittings.

WAR VICTIMS' RELIEF.—The subjects taken up were the work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit and the War Victims' Relief Committee.

A minute was recorded expressing the interest of the Meeting in the work thus described.

The Statistical Returns presented showed a membership in Ulster of 1,136, in Leinster 900, and in Munster 207, an increase of 23 over last year, chiefly in Ulster. There were 8 births in Ulster, 2 in Leinster, 0 in Munster; of deaths there were 13 in Ulster, 16 in Leinster, and 4 in Munster. The increase therefore is owing to admissions by conviction, etc. (44, against 6 resignations, etc.), and the balance of removals-in over removals-out to other Yearly Meetings (9 net).

Louis F. O'Brien noticed in the returns that the last twenty years showed a decrease of 281 members.

SIXTH-DAY EVENING.—THE KING'S FOOD PROCLAMATION.—A communication from the Castle was read, asking that the Meeting would direct that the proclamation of the King regarding the necessity of conserving the supplies of food in the country should be read at the morning service of each congregation. The Meeting at once signified its consent, and a minute was made asking the several Preparative Meetings to comply.

In the consideration of the State of the Society, James N. Richardson said that some of the addresses had exaggerated the unsatisfactory condition of the Society in Ireland. For his own part, he marveled that the State of the Society was as good as it was. We had done something, even if but a little, in helping to break down barriers and to compose differences. It was to him wonderful that so many had gathered to that Meeting, with no temporal advantages in view. Jonathan Goodbody encouraged young Friends to press forward, not staying to probe their own feelings too deeply.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.

Western Quarterly Meeting was held at West Grove on Fifth Month 25. The attendance was rather larger than usual for this time of year, and we were favored with the presence of ministers and others from a number of distant meetings.

Following a period of solemn silence, prayer was offered, after which we were recommended to place first things first; the things of the Kingdom above things temporal; conditions resulting from the world war were referred to. Another minister used the familiar though impressive and vital quotation: "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Christ Jesus." This was the leading thought of the service which followed.

A minister from the home meeting used the quotation: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." The worldling is satisfied with the things of the earth, but those influenced by our Saviour's love are concerned about the things of Heaven, a being lifted up above the sordid things of earth.

The business meeting was opened in joint session; the first matter taken up after the opening minute, was the concern of a visiting minister, regarding the decline in the ministry among our women Friends; there being but seventeen recorded women ministers in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; he acknowledged gratefully the faithful service in fields not a few by our women friends, but felt it laid upon him to bring the matter to our attention, that those addressed might seriously consider whether there is a further and perhaps more important service for them to undertake in the Lord's vineyard.

A portion of the extracts of Men's Yearly Meeting were read, those from Women's Meeting being left until our Eighth Month session.

In the separate sessions which followed, the routine business of the Quarterly Meeting was carried through, followed by adjournment.

Many of us remember the old custom of Friends from a distance going to the homes of those nearby for a Quarterly Meeting dinner; sometimes we might have twenty-five guests, then again the number would be reduced to a half dozen or less. The present general custom of a lunch at the meeting-house for all and the social intercourse connected with it is a better way we must acknowledge, though possibly not fully approved by all at the first.

Lunch over, there was a conference held in the main meeting-room to consider social and economic problems; two Friends from a distance were the chief speakers, members of the Committee appointed by our last Yearly Meeting; this was attended by a large proportion of those who were at the sessions of the general meeting, showing by their presence their interest in this important subject.

ONLY ONE DAY APART.

A song of sunshine through the rain,
Of spring across the snow,
A balm to heal the hurts of pain,
A peace surpassing woe,
Lift up your heads, ye sorrowing ones,
And be ye glad of heart,
For Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's saddest day and gladdest day,
Were just one day apart!

With shudder of despair and loss
The world's deep heart was wrung,
As lifted high upon His cross
The Lord of Glory hung.
When rooks were rent, and ghostly forms
Stole forth in street and mart—
But Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's blakest day and whitest day,
Were just one day apart!

No hint or whisper stirred the air
To tell what joy should be,
The sad disciples grieving there,
Nor help nor hope could see.
Yet all the while the glad, near sun
Made ready its swift dart,
And Calvary and Easter Day,
The darkest day and brightest day,
Were just one day apart!

Oh, when the strife of tongues is loud,
And the heart of hope beats low,
When the prophets prophesy of ill,
And the mourners come and go,
In this sure thought let us abide,
And keep and stay our heart,
That Calvary and Easter Day,
Earth's heaviest day and happiest day,
Were but one day apart!

ANNUAL EDUCATIONAL MEETING.

The annual Spring meeting of the Friends' Educational Association was held at Haverford College on the twelfth of Fifth Month, 1917.

At the afternoon session the minutes of the previous meeting were read and accepted.

The report of the Treasurer, Walter W. Haviland, was adopted. It was as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Balance from Last Year.....	$ 88.76
Contributions.....	293.70
Total.....	$382.46

PAYMENTS.

Printing, Postage, Addressing.....	$ 51.45
Fees of Three Speakers.....	85.00
Sundry Expenses.....	12.50
Appropriation to the Superintendent of Yearly Meeting Schools.....	75.00
Total.....	$223.95
Balance on Hand Fifth Month 12, 1917.....	$158.51
The motion to appropriate seventy-five dollars for the Superintendent of the Yearly Meeting Schools for the coming year was carried.

The following officers, as proposed by the Nominating Committee, were elected for the ensuing year:

President—Walter W. Haviland.

Secretary—Caroline Nicholson.

Business Manager—Alfred Deyo.

Treasurer—Mary Anna Jones.

James G. Biddle, President of the Association, introduced the speaker of the afternoon, Arthur J. Jones, Professor of Secondary Education at the University of Pennsylvania. His subject was, "Some Elements of Strength and Weakness in the Friends' Schools."

Arthur J. Jones is a firm believer in the public schools, feeling that they are the only safeguard to democracy, because they form among the people the two great ideals necessary to democracy. First, a common basis of knowledge, habits and ways of thinking. Second, the necessary feeling of sympathy which comes from a knowledge of one another.

He believes the private schools are, in essence, undemocratic, but proved by illustrious examples that they have produced many democratic leaders. But, unless they do something better than the public schools there is no reason for their existence. He believes that there is "no place in America for a school carried on with the idea of perpetuating a religious denomination," and expressed himself as feeling that this is not one of our aims.

He had visited only the High School classes, and therefore confined his criticisms to these. Because he had been asked to criticize he did so to help us, remarking that it is often wise "to see ourselves as others see us."

He believes there is great danger in conservatism. It is right to stick to ideals, but often dangerous because the ideal is held long after its need is past. Therefore Latin should not be required of each pupil, since its usefulness as a universal study is past. He believes that our sources of study and grading should be much more flexible; that we should have more supervised study and longer hours.

Dr. Jones praised our corps of teachers, for, while some are below the average, enough are above to give us, on the whole, a class of superior instructors. He feels very strongly, however, that these teachers are being treated unfairly, since they are held without sufficient salaries because of their loyalty to the schools and to Friends.

"No school can be well managed by a large committee. It is inefficient, hard to locate responsibility, and very slow to act."

In the discussion that followed the speaker, Maria Scattergood, spoke of our great opportunity to teach the Bible, and Edward Wildman made the suggestion that we should have Max L. Reich teach in our schools, for his ability and marvelous understanding of the Bible and history are well known.

The subject for the evening session was: "Some Lines Along Which Our Schools Should Progress in the Future."

Walter W. Haviland read a very interesting and helpful paper in which he "assumed a future" for our schools. He said, "The greatest work of our schools is the Christian influence we are able to exert and the 'atmosphere' we have maintained. The school is the best way of keeping in contact with the outside world, and our aim should be to offer to Friends and others who wish it scholarly attainment, the highest type of citizenship and development to the highest power. We should utilize all human resources and train for production. Education should be life itself and the great aim not individual but social development."

His greatest plea was for our schools to be unified under one system with one competent head, Isaac Sharpless, whose unequalled ability has for many years been proven.

Edward Wildman made the meeting think very seriously of the competition we now have to face in our public High Schools. Philadelphia prescribes more for its High Schools than any school in Washington, Baltimore, New York, Chicago or St. Louis, and it is these schools "of unlimited means, flexible curricula and enormous equipment" with which we compete. He believes the teachers' salaries should be much higher, and feels it not safe or fair to "bank on their loyalty." In closing he suggested that a committee of thirteen, twelve of whom should be representatives from our largest schools, should be appointed to systematize and unify the schools.

The last speaker of the evening, Eliza S. Nicholson, said in part: "Just because we all know so little, just because schoolmasters are so hampered by tradition and organization, just because parents are so helpless in making practical suggestions, for these very reasons the complacent following of tradition is the most inexcusable of attitudes.

"In regard to Friends' schools in particular, we believe in them, we love them. They seem to be a special trust, an inherent duty.

"I have, however, long been watching our co-educational High Schools, and while I know this is heresy, I shall have to be concise in saying that I prefer boys and girls of high school age to be educated separately.

"I cannot urge too strongly the need of big personalities in our schools who are aroused to the world need of better soul culture.

"Friends' schools with others have believed in such severe athletics and gymnasium work, and the result, I am afraid, when all that makes the woman is considered, is not altogether satisfactory.

"I hesitate now to say what I have in mind for fear of being misunderstood as critical. But this is very far from my feeling. I take issue with the Friendly acceptance of the term, 'Guarded Education.' We become too insular and lack an understanding of our fellows in general and do not feel at ease with them. I should like to see Westtown, for instance, open its doors to big personalities as teachers who are not necessarily Friends, but who have the vision. We cannot claim the whole corner in this line and we need the influence of the best in others.

"The work of the world calls insistently more and more for men and women of great soul and great initiative.

"So with courage and not fear let us go forward."

ISABELLE THOMAS,
Secretary.

KEEPING THE FOUNTAIN PURE.

THE SACRED DUTY OF THE GUARDIANS AND GUIDES OF CHILDHOOD.

(From an address to the graduating class of the Wheelock Kindergarten Training School by Willard L. Sperry, pastor of Central Congregational Church, Boston.)

I stand here in behalf of your country and your religion to confirm you in your choice of a life work, and to tell you that there is no group in the nation to whom these days bring a higher duty, a greater opportunity for the service of their State and their church, than to you who in some very special way are to be the guardians and guides of childhood. You have thought of yourselves, perhaps, as living far behind the battle. As a matter of fact you are in advance of the battle. You are the pioneers of the world's to-morrow. It lies with you, and those like you, to decide what shall be done with that world of security and order which the present generation proposes to insure to the next generation before it signs its treaties of peace.

It is to be your sacred office to take a little child and stand him in our midst and tell us that whatever else we may have to do, we are not to prejudice the hope of our country or our religion by sacrificing any of the life of that little child, his bodily health, his mind, his heart—his childlike trustfulness in God and man—to these grim years. You are to stand as the appointed guardians of the inalienable rights of childhood to the beauty and mystery of its own age. You are to forbid us to starve the bodies, and stunt the minds, and embitter the souls of little children. You are to compel us to keep this treasure intact, to guard this pledge of the world's to-morrow against all specious grown-up pleas of present need. You are to forbid us, in the name of God and humanity, to yield to the pagan temptation to sacrifice our children on the altar of these years. You are to stand in our midst as your Master stood, the friends, the champions, the interpreters of little children. You are to serve your country by this holy custody of the next generation; you are to serve the world by reviving within us this lost vision of the mystery of childhood. No other task upon which you could embark is nobler or more necessary than this. If you are faithful in the fulfillment of your duties, faithful to the tradition and teaching of your country, faithful to your high calling, you will be rendering to your country and your religion a service second to none. We bid you, in a time of tumult and war, to think not less worthily, but more worthily of your chosen life work.

You know that in the schools in Germany at the outbreak of the war the teachers were ordered by the Government to teach all the little children Lissauer's "Hymn of Hate" against England. It would seem that Germany has since come to a better mind, and has repented of this sacrilege committed against the souls of her little children. For now, we are told, the teaching of that hymn of hate has been stopped, and Germany is trying to erase from the memory of its childhood the evil and fateful lesson that was taught at the opening of the war. It is too late. The lesson can not be unlearned, the memory can not be erased. Teaching children to hate was a sin against country and God, as grave as the crime of the Lusitania. That was poisoning the wells. That was mortgaging the soul of the future.

Over against that grim and evil picture which has come to us out of Prussia let me put another picture, full of promise for the future of our own country, of all the world. In the course of my parish work I came the other day upon a little child, lying out upon the floor reading an open Bible. I found that she was reading the Sermon on the Mount, and she told me that her teacher had asked all the children in her school to learn the last verses of the fifth chapter of Matthew, about loving enemies and forgiving those who do us ill, and she said in her naive way, "We have to do that, don't we, because that is what God does to us." And my heart went out to some loyal teacher somewhere in this city who has seen the vision and heard the call, who is trying to fulfil in some classroom her high calling as a Christian and a patriot. And I know that in the figure of that little child lying on the floor learning the neglected words of Jesus lay the true hope of the world.

It is for you, my friends of this class of 1917, to decide what the future is finally to be—whether the soul of the next generation is to be embittered by the memory of the grown-up enmities of these years, or to be safeguarded through these years, or to be reconsecrated to some fresh quest after the lost mystery of our universal childhood to God the Father. May God help you for the sake of the children who are to be committed to your trust, for the sake of your country which you would now serve to the fullest measure of your devotion, for the sake of our religion in which lies the secret of our peace, to choose the better part.—From the Boston Transcript.

CHRISTIAN LOYALTY.

SUBMITTED BY FRANCES TATUM RHOADS.

What should a Christian man do when his country is threatened by another, when long-established rights are invaded, or when some weak nation is ruthlessly oppressed by a hostile power?

There can be only one answer to that question. The Christian man should get to his knees and pray for Divine guidance and then go to the source book of Christian teaching, the New Testament, and try earnestly to find out from it what Christ would have him do.

If he tries to answer the question from the point of view of business, expediency or nationality, he is going to confuse the issue and risk a wrong choice. For the Christian there is but one supreme loyalty and that is to Christ and His Gospel. If anything else conflicts with that so much the worse for that other thing. Duties to country, to home, and to family must always give way to that larger loyalty which alone is capable of taking them up and giving them full significance.

In seeking an answer for myself to the current problem, I went back to that source which I have mentioned, and I want now to share the results of that investigation.

The outstanding features of the Gospel of Christ, if we may trust the leading commentators, are summed up in the idea of the Kingdom of God. By that kingdom Jesus meant "an ideal (though progressively approximated) social order in which the relation of men to God is that of sons, and (therefore) to each other, that of brothers." Into that conception of the Kingdom practically all of our Lord's teaching fits, giving the principles upon which we as individuals can act so as to live in the kingdom and bring others into it. Roughly grouping that teaching, it falls into two parts, that regarding our estimate of ourselves and our possessions and that regarding others.

In Christ's sight it seems clear that one's personality, possessions, and even life are of secondary consideration compared with the welfare of others and the progress of the Kingdom. "Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on." "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness and all these things shall be added unto you." "Whosoever would save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it." "How oft shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? . . . till seventy times seven." The importance of self is never the test of conduct.

Towards others the only conduct that is allowed or recommended is that of active love and kindness toward both the evil-doer and the righteous man, in order to transform them all into proper members of the Kingdom. Our Lord's spiritual interpretation of the ten commandments forbids us to hold thoughts of anger, hatred, lust or covetousness against others. "Judge not that ye be not judged" goes with the advice to "cast out first the beam out of thine own eye" before trying to correct a brother's fault. On the positive side we are directed, "as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." "Thou shall love thy neighbor as thyself." "And whosoever ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against anyone." "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you."

As I read it, then, the attitude of the Christian is to be one of not harboring bitterness, hate or ill-will on the one hand, and on the other is to be one of putting forth good-will and love and forgiveness without limit, and thereby breaking down the opposition of evil doers. It is not a passive attitude, but one that is essentially active and aggressive, standing and working for the right against all odds no matter what the immediate consequences might be. Even aside from the words of His teaching, those principles could be learned from the life of our Lord in every act up to the final giving of Himself on Calvary.

He taught insistently, never overlooking an opportunity to drive home the truth. In spite of attacks, sneers and criticisms, He maintained His attitude of readiness to help, and even in the agony of the cross still prayed for his enemies: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

After thus studying again His life and teaching, I find it quite impossible to believe that people can be true to the things which He taught and the example which He gave and at the same time take part in war; for war is the organized destruction of our enemies and it is always accompanied by hatred and bitterness, thus necessitating an attitude of mind and course of conduct the opposite of that enjoined by Christ.

However, lest it be thought that in some way I have misread the Gospel, I would refer you to the writings of the four leading Apostles in the New Testament, to see how they understood their Master.

St. Paul says, "Render to no man evil for evil." "Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but give place unto wrath." "If thine enemy hunger, feed him." "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

St. James says, "But the wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits."

St. Peter says, "For so is the will of God, that by well-doing ye should put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." "For this is acceptable if for conscience toward God a man endureth griefs suffering wrongfully." "Not rendering evil for evil, or reviling for reviling; but, contrariwise, blessing."

St. John says, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer."

It is unthinkable that these men would have taken any part in a war or in preparation for one. And I need only to refer to the example of the Christians of the early centuries who preferred to die rather than to go into the army and cause someone else's death, to show that they all interpreted our Lord's teaching in the same way.

As a matter of plain practical conduct fitted to meet a condition and not a theory, I feel perfectly sure that active, aggressive, militant, good-will founded on the example and teaching of Christ is the only power that will effectively preserve real spiritual values in the world. That, however, is a question of expediency which does not come within the scope of this paper.

The question with which I started was, What can a Christian man do under the present national circumstances? I have gone in search to the sources of our Christian standards, and in the light of what I find there, as I love my country, I must protest against her doing what I would not do myself, because it is contrary to our Lord's teaching. To prosecute war means to kill men, bringing sorrow and suffering upon women and children and instil suspicion, fear and hatred into the hearts of the people on both sides. No matter what principles may appear to be at stake, to deliberately engage in such a course of action that evidently is un-Christian is repugnant to the whole spirit of the Gospel.

As a Christian bishop, charged with the responsibility of leadership, I would be deserving only of contempt did I remain silent in the present crisis, when the Christian standards of judgment are apparently being entirely ignored. The day will come when, like slavery which once was held in good repute, war will be looked upon as thoroughly un-Christian. At present it is recognized as an evil which nobody honestly wants, but not yet has it received its final sentence at the bar of Christian morality. Only when Christian men and women and churches will be brave enough to stand openly for the full truth that their consciences are beginning to recognize, will the terrible anachronism of war between Christian nations be done away.

PAUL JONES, Bishop of Utah.

FRIENDS COURT-MARTIALED.

On the occasion of his third court-martial, at Salisbury, Douglas R. Bishop spoke as follows:—

"It is exactly a year ago to-day since I was arrested for refusing to become a soldier in an earthly army; and through the year that has elapsed I have remained faithful to my convictions, which I have held for several years, that all war, that all preparation for war, is contrary to the spirit and teaching of Christ. My two long imprisonments in civil prisons, and my detention in various camps and guard-rooms, though greatly weakening me physically, have in no way altered my deep convictions that the only final method of destroying evil is to overcome it with good. All earthly armies rely on force; their method is deception; and to gain an end which to them seems right, no means of destruction are too awful. In the other army I find the great method of conquest is love; and truth, regardless of consequences, takes the place of deception. I have gone through hours of prayer and thought to try to find when the two can be combined, and the more I have studied and the more I have actually seen the method of war applied, I find there can not be any connection between these two great armies of the world, the one adopting the method of quietness and love in order to attract all that is good and best in man, whilst the other, in its highest aim, by methods of force tries to destroy the evil.

"Much as I dread the thought of imprisonment through a second summer, I dislike still more the thought of being apparently useless to the community, especially at the present time.

"In view of the fact that the present law entitles me to absolute exemption and that I have already suffered a year's imprisonment and detention for my convictions, I would request that the spirit and letter of the present law be put into force, and that I shall be dealt with under Section 44 of the Army Act (page 416), clause 'L'; and then when entirely outside the scope of national organization for war, I shall be able to render the best service I can for the good of the community, believing that whatever work one undertakes should be done conscientiously."

At his second court-martial, at Gravesend, Rendel Wyatt, after affirming his belief that a man must be loyal to the teaching and spirit of Christ, said:—

"If we are killed as a result of loyalty to our convictions, we believe that our death would contribute to the establishment of the reign of love, just as a soldier's death may contribute to victory. . . . I am eager and willing to help my country at all times, and I consider that, as a school-master, I was already rendering my best service. To change that for some less useful occupation, or to submit to any form of military conscription, would be, for me, to barter my conscience, to betray those who have suffered and died for this cause in times past, and to assist in the fastening of conscription upon this unhappy country. Until we are free to render what we believe to be our best service to humanity, we have no alternative but to suffer in order that freedom may be won."—From The Friend (London).

TRULY the signs of the times are awful, and everything enforces, with emphatic language, the necessity of dwelling near or within that impregnable fortress, where these things cannot move us from the calming, consoling persuasion of Divine sufficiency. May our minds be mercifully stayed in holy quiet. Often does my spirit long that we, as a people may gather more and more into this precious habitation, out of that spirit which produces tumult, or mingles with it; and thus exalt the pure, peaceable principles, which through all I can not but steadily believe, is making its own way even gloriously in many minds, and will spread in the earth, until men beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

Never did a more convincing evidence attend my mind than of later times, that a great work is on the wheel of Almighty power in this favored nation; where there are truly many righteous, whose fervent intercessions are no doubt availing, and many others evidently inquiring the way to the kingdom of inward settlement. To these the Gospel message is joyful and precious is the liberty felt in proclaiming it.

—MARY DUDLEY, written about the year 1790.

HAPPY the heart that keeps its twilight hour,
And, in the depths of heavenly peace, reclined,
Loves to commune with thoughts of tender power,
Thoughts that ascend, like angels beautiful,
On shining Jacob's ladder of the mind.

—PAUL H. HAYNE, in the Baptist Commonwealth.

ACROSS THE SEA.

Across the sea I heard the groans
Of nations in the intervals
Of wind and wave. Their blood and bones
Cried out in torture, crushed by thrones,
And sucked by priestly cannibals.

I dreamed of Freedom, slowly gained
By martyr meekness, patience, faith,
And lo! an athlete grimly stained,
With eorled muscles battle strained,
Shouting it on the fields of death.

I turn me, awe-struck, from the sight,
Among the clamoring thousands mute;
I only know that God is right,
And that the children of the light
Shall tread the darkness under foot.

I know the pent fire heaves its crust,
That sultry skies the bolt will form
To smite them clear; that Nature must
The balance of her powers adjust,
Though with the earthquake and the storm.

God reigns, and let the earth rejoice!
I bow before His sterner plan,
Dumb are the organs of my choice;
He speaks in battle's stormy voice,
His praise is in the wrath of man.

Yet, surely as He lives, the day
Of peace He promised shall be ours,
To fold the flags of war and lay
Its sword and spear to rust away,
And sow its ghastly fields with flowers.

—WHITTIER.

C. O.'S IN PRISON.

In bringing to the Meeting for Sufferings a concern for conscientious objectors in prison, Henry T. Hodgkin said that he did so with great hesitation, recognizing the weight of the objections made, especially by some of the men affected, who had urged that attention should be given to constructive work for Peace, rather than to efforts to procure their liberation. But all were not able to bear their sufferings with cheerfulness and joy. As one imprisonment follows another, they suffer a severe strain, both physical and mental. Such suffering, however, was the main reason for taking action; many men who have joined the army are losing limbs, eyesight, even life itself, from a high sense of duty. If, however, Friends, as citizens, kept silence, their silence would be misunderstood. Of 4,000 conscientious objectors arrested, 2,500 had been court-martialed once, 636 twice; 61 had been before the court-martial three times, and 2 four times, after having thrice served their sentences in prison. He wished Friends to urge (1) The Conscience clauses of the Military Service Acts were designed to allow exemption to these very men; (2) The men are being imprisoned several times for what is practically the same offence; (3) Whatever had been the case at first, this continued imprisonment was simply persecution for religious and moral convictions, and was unworthy of England. Many of the men had been doing work of real national and international importance, and their imprisonment meant waste, both material and moral. He urged that the Government should be asked to take immediate steps for the release of these men, not limiting the appeal to Friends only.

Many Friends agreed that it was the duty of the Society to try to create a strong public opinion, and to make the men in prison sure of our sympathy; but not to try to influence Government departments; and the Clerk drew a minute in this sense, commending the matter to the attention of Yearly Meeting.

"DAUGHTERS OF THE CZAR."

In an outlying district on the eastern border of Russia a party of English Friends are now working among the refugees who have drifted there after long wanderings and must remain there indefinitely. In one village these Friends have reopened the local hospital and with a staff all too small and stores and equipment all too limited deal with a daily stream of out-patients and the nursing of more serious cases. In another village they have established a sort of emergency dispensary and convalescent home, and in another there is a pioneer party investigating conditions of disease and distress and making plans for future relief. This latter party consists of two women Friends from Birmingham, both of them experienced social workers in their own city. Curiosity is naturally rife as to who these ladies are who have arrived in the village, as it were from nowhere, and who visit the priest and other officials on affairs of importance. It is rumored that they are the daughters of the Czar. But now that they have come back a second time and have settled down in one of the houses in the place, the quarters they occupy and their manner of arriving hardly suggest imperial rank or luxury.

To quote from a recently received letter:

"A cart piled with our belongings, bedsteads, mattresses, kettles, brooms, trunks, etc., went first—then in the contrivances that pass for carriages here, came F. B., the Russian girl who acts as our interpreter and myself, packed round with all sort of things, including a tin containing our dinner, a bottle of alcohol, and another of carbolic. As the roads are unmade and the carts have no springs, but are only canvas arrangements filled with straw, it was a little difficult to keep the different ingredients from getting mixed! We have taken up our abode in part of a house, and we enter our domain through a doorway four feet high and go through an unceiled mud-floored place where part of the landlady's family sleep. Then we enter a kitchen-bath-room-entrance-hall where is a baker's oven and through that we come to our bed-sitting-drawing-room. There you would see two ghostly white erections, which are the mosquito nets over our beds. These nets are absolutely priceless possessions and enable us to sleep in comparative security, though they are not quite invulnerable, neither do they keep out the noise of barking dogs. We possess one table, a bench round two sides of the room, a chair that we can't sit on and a cupboard. There is also a Russian stove behind which is a little recess just big enough for our interpreter to sleep in. You would be amused at the various bags hanging round the beds and at our contrivances for clothes, but what are you to do when you can't hang things against the walls because of the inhabitants thereof? Then we have a sort of kitchen where we do our cooking on a Princess stove. We get eggs, milk and bread (this last brown and rather sour) from our landlady who lives in a sort of out-house in the yard. We are leading the simple life in its simplicity—there is no chance of doing anything else, even if we wished it, which with all the misery around us we do not, and our little limitations and inconveniences fade into insignificance and we feel almost luxurious when compared with the suffering and deprivation being endured so patiently and uncomplainingly by others. Visiting the refugees is awfully sad work and will be sadder as winter comes on. Many of them were sent to Tashkend before coming to this district, and nearly every family lost one or more members there of typhus, typhoid, cholera, etc. One woman lost all six of her children, ages sixteen to three. Then on the journey families got separated and have now quite lost trace of each other. The women look twice their age and so careworn. Few of them have any clothes but what they stand up in, but the majority are wonderfully clean, considering their conditions—sometimes twenty in a room and often sleeping in windowless hovels. The men were farmers at home and most of the women can knit, weave and embroider if only they had material. Their coarse homespun linen garments are often very effectively embroidered in red and black cotton. The refugees are almost all such nice people and they all say how good the peasants are to them; they share their houses with them and their scanty supply of food. The better-class peasants are wonderfully hospitable.

"This village is prettier than some. It lies along a depression between low hills and at the back of the houses is a little stream with willow trees. The gorgeous sunsets here and the vast sweep of country, slightly undulating but almost bare of trees, with flocks of geese in the foreground, are a joy which counterbalances much. Most villages have quite an imposing looking church painted white and green. It is difficult to judge of the depth of religious feeling among the people, as there is so much outward demonstration—bowing, crossing, and prostrating themselves with their foreheads touching the ground. But they look as if it were a very real thing to them. A funeral service which we went to one day was really quite impressive. Rather gruesome, though, for the corpse is carried to the church in an open coffin and near the end of the service the people flock up and kiss it, even holding up the children to do the same. Of course infection does not count. There is a good deal of typhoid about and some malaria, lots of eye-cases, etc. We wish we were doctors, nurses and a few other things rolled into one."

Even short of these qualifications, it is not hard to believe that workers such as these with good-will, sympathy, experience, moving about among the people and in close touch with their conditions will be able to render effective service, especially if supplies of clothing, medicines and other stores can reach them for distribution.

They are hoping shortly for a consignment of Russian felt-boots and other warm garments in preparation for the dreaded winter. Though they do not claim to be "daughters of the Czar," they are yet undoubtedly linked on to "the little father," as the peasants love to call him, by the service they are endeavoring to render to his children.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

"MY FATHER WORKETH HITHERTO, AND I WORK."—Once upon a time, according to the fable, an Ox and an Ass lived together in the same stable and worked for the same master. It so happened one day when it was time to go to the field, that the Ox lazily stretched himself and yawned and took another mouthful of hay and stretched and yawned, and said, "Guess I won't go to work to-day, Jack. You tell the Boss I'm not feeling well." So the Ass patiently went off alone and at night came wearily home and found the Ox lazily and contentedly chewing his cud.

"How did you get on to-day without me?" inquired the Ox. "Pretty hard pulling all alone," said the Ass.

"What did the Boss say?" asked the Ox.

"Nothing," replied the Ass and they both fell to eating.

The next day when it was time to go forth to the fields the Ox stretched himself and yawned as before, and thought how well his excuse had worked yesterday. Tossing his head and flicking his tail, he said to the Ass, "Jack, tell the Boss I'll not be on the job to-day, either, I'm not feeling well."

So the Ass went off alone and returned in the evening dusty, tired and dejected, for he was doing double duty.

"What did the Boss say to-day?" asked the Ox. "Nothing," muttered the Ass, but as he was rolling in the dust to refresh himself, he continued, "On the way home, though, Master stopped and had a long talk with the Butcher."

One of the hardest things we have to learn in life, young folks, is the dignity of working and the meanness of shirking. The saddest hour of a young man's life is when he thinks he has discovered some way of getting something for nothing. Those who have tried it invariably meet later on—with the Butcher.

I rejoice with you, young people, in these inspiring words of Jesus, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." He spoke these words when He was about thirty years of age, but do you know He made that discovery when He was twelve years of age? "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business." Shame on the boy who is ashamed of his Father's business! But shame on the Father whose business is such that his boy must needs be ashamed! Shame on the boy who is ashamed to work, but thrice shame on the home where he learned to despise honest toil! What a fine thing it would be for all of us here, boys and girls, to learn that God has some work for us in this world that nobody but us can do. How are we preparing for it?

In the home are you putting your work off on little brother or sister? In the school are you getting your own lessons, or is some one else doing your problems, writing your compositions, making your translations? In the church are you one of those who will stay for the sermon if Willie will? In other words, are you a shirker, a cud-chewer or a worker?

I know of no message we need more, and none that will put iron in your blood and "pep" in your life better than this reminder of our Saviour to work. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."—C. A. SPAULDING, in the Religious Weekly Review.

PEACE COMMISSIONS MEETING.

The American commissions preparing for the Peace Conference of all Friends to be held at the invitation of London Yearly Meeting after the war met in Philadelphia on the eighteenth and nineteenth of Fifth Month for an informal preliminary conference. All the chairmen, several members of the commissions and a number of other interested Friends attended the three sessions. The scope of the discussion followed the outline issued by the English Friends and published in THE FRIEND. Rufus M. Jones, as chairman of the first commission, had prepared two papers, one on the fundamental basis of the Peace testimony of Friends, a historical inquiry, the other dealing with the nature of conscience. The first of these was read and discussed. Several members of this commission are engaged in examining the actual conduct of American Friends during the wars of their history, but were not ready yet to provide their reports.

The second general division on "the implication of the testimony in national life and international relations" has been divided into two. Isaac Sharpless and William I. Hull explained how they had divided the field among the score of persons who are working on this topic, and briefly defined the scope of the various questions that it includes. The question of a league of nations has been chosen for special study by several of the commissioners and was discussed by several Friends present at the preliminary conference.

For the third commission Jesse H. Holmes, the chairman, read a paper dealing particularly with the moral end by which our social relations are to be tested, the definition of simplicity, and the solution for social evils proposed in socialism and the single tax. There was some discussion of the last of these topics.

The fourth commission presented as its report papers dealing with two of the subjects falling within its wide field, one by William W. Comfort on the functions of our colleges in teaching peace, the other by George A. Walton on adjusting the high school curriculum to peace education.

The fifth commission offered a summary of suggestions which had been sent to its members with regard to the strength and weakness of the Society in relation to the peace testimony. This analysis of the situation was followed by some suggestions as to how the Society can be made more effective in the interests of peace.

Elbert Russell, chairman of the sixth commission, presented the results of an elaborate questionnaire sent to Friends throughout America. By studying the methods of propaganda which have been used way has been prepared to make some recommendations for the future.

Although the reports were many of them fragmentary and tentative the preliminary comparing and conferring done in this informal conference will greatly help all the commissions to proceed with their several tasks and to understand them in the light of the whole. Friends everywhere in America were encouraged to study privately or in groups some or all of the subjects mentioned in the outline and to communicate with the commissions studying them. It is desirable that before the conference the whole Society of Friends should have grappled earnestly with the difficult questions so that much light may come from an international discussion after the war.

Secretary of the Executive Committee.

NEWS ITEMS.

The following from the American Friend will interest our readers:— It is certainly cause for satisfaction to Friends everywhere that President Wilson has vested in Herbert C. Hoover, Quaker born and reared, the stupendous responsibility of virtually feeding this country, and its friends in need, during the present struggle. First, because we may rest assured that the right man has been chosen in him who has preserved the Belgian people from the destruction that wasteth at noonday and who by his masterful administration in connection therewith, has pointed the way to food conservation to England and France who are adopting his methods. In the second place, H. C. Hoover's work is at once the symbol and the embodiment of the Quaker position in such a time as this. While others are bending all energies toward destruction and the taking of life, his efforts are directed toward construction and the saving of life. And in his invaluable service there enters sacrifice, giving up as he has his profession of mining engineering in which, as one of the best known engineers anywhere, he received a princely income. In entering upon his new work he stipulates that he is to receive no compensation. The Nation's Food Administrator thus exemplifies in his position of trust and leadership, the Quaker ideals of service and sacrifice. It is for us Friends in the ranks to prove our worthiness to be thus fittingly and ably represented.

CHARLES M. BAILEY, of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting, Maine, is known to not a few of our readers. Although in his ninety-seventh year he was recently at Quarterly Meeting. He is a large and successful manufacturer, but he said in one of the meetings that the time spent in Gospel work had been the happiest portion of his long life.

It is proposed to hold a meeting at old Shrewsbury Meeting-house, Shrewsbury, Monmouth County, New Jersey, on Sixth Month 17th, at 2.30 o'clock. This old house has been closed a long time and there are a great many Friends and Friendly people in that vicinity whom it is believed would be interested to attend this meeting.

Any New York or Newark Friends who desire to attend can leave New York on Pennsylvania R. R. train 11.12 A. M., from Penna. Station, arriving at Red Bank 12.22 P. M., where they will be met by a representative of the meeting. They should provide box lunch.

AMONG the speakers at the Young Friends' Conference at Westtown, to be held the latter part of this month, is John Nelson Mills. He traveled extensively in foreign countries for pleasure, and became so deeply interested in the work of the missionaries that he made a careful study of all mission work and the relationships between our country and other countries.

During recent years he has devoted himself to further study along these lines, including the field of diplomacy and business abroad. He has spent much time lecturing on these subjects and stirring up missionary interest throughout the various Christian denominations.

Being a man of independent means, he refuses to accept any honorariums for his work. The Young Friends' Conference feels itself exceptionally privileged to have him to address the Class on International Service, on Fourth and Fifth-days, Sixth Month 27th and 28th.

IMPROVEMENTS AT TUNESASSA.—$3,500 have been subscribed to the Improvement Fund. As it was necessary to start on the cottage for Henry B. and Eliza Foster Leeds in order to insure its completion during the summer, the work has been commenced. The site is between the School Building and the tenant house.

Some of the other improvements have been made and plans are under way for the rest; $1,500 more is needed to carry out the plans approved by the Committee.

ENCOURAGING progress has been made in the contemplated improvement at Friends' Indian School. Of the $5,000 which is the estimated cost of the cottage, wagon-shed and other improvements, $3,476 has been received. Lumber, cement, shingles and other materials have been purchased and plans for the cottage approved.

It is a comfort to learn that our friend Rendel Harris has reached his home in Selsey Oak, Birmingham, in safety. He arrived there Fifth Month 8th. A niece who gave us this information also reported that he still has visions of service for His master. With such liberal measure of the apostolic experience of "perils oft" his stewardship of the good things his hands have handled will be most acceptable in widening circles.

FRIENDS who go to and from Atlantic City by the Camden and Atlantic R. R. have the opportunity to see that a portion of the enclosure of Newton Meeting in the borders of Camden has been put under the plow in the interest of food increase at this time when the air is heavy with reports of starvation in Europe and in the East.

THE MEDIA FELLOWSHIP.—Every First-day evening since the fourteenth of First Month, 1917, the young Friends near Media have held very interesting little meetings. We have discussed and tried to learn more of our reasons for being Friends; what part we as Friends should take in the present crisis; our attitude toward amusements, and many other problems which we have to face. The meetings were all very well attended and most helpful. Our last gathering for this Spring on the nineteenth of Fifth Month was a camp supper near Crum Creek. We were very fortunate in having William Dennis with us, who spoke most beautifully about Friendship. We were very much inspired by his talk and our meetings next Fall will surely profit by it.

TABLEAU STATEMENT OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING.—The membership recorded is just over 20,000, the increase for the year being 58. The number of deaths is three times the number of births, but the numbers are maintained by 360 admissions by conviction. There are 346 Particular Meetings and 65 Allowed Meetings, in each case a slight increase on the number reported last year.

FEELING a need for deeper spiritual guidance at this critical time, the Peace Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has appointed a general meeting at No. 20 S. Twelfth Street, for Sixth Month 17, 1917, at 3.30 o'clock, in which Friends may meet for prayerful discussion of our present problems, with special relation to those of our members of conscription age.

PROGRAM.

- 1.—Our Peculiar Temptations.
- 2.—The Traditional Quaker Position.
- 3.—Our Attitude to the Exemption Clause.
- 4.—Alternative Service; Compulsory and Volunteer.
- 5.—Forms of Emergency Service.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The reference in this letter to Isaac Pennington's "sense" of Parliament will surely interest Friends. They will probably be glad to refer to an article by Isaac Sharp, entitled "Isaac Pennington as Politician" in Friends' Quarterly Examiner, Fourth Month, 1917.—Ens.]

38 FOREST DRIVE EAST, LEYTONSTONE, LONDON, E.
Fifth Month 8, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND J. HENRY BARTLETT:—

I read with much interest thy letter in the issue of THE FRIEND of the 19th ult., on "The Sense of the Meeting," with the accompanying account of the interview which the late William Jones had with Cardinal Antonelli. It is, perhaps, to Friends, the most interesting of the many interviews he had with persons holding positions of distinction the world over. I knew him for many years and frequently enjoyed the recital of his remarkable experiences.

Thy leader has reminded me of a passage in one of Isaac Penington's political essays, written in 1651, on "The Fundamental Rights, Safety and Liberty of the People." In the consideration of the four things necessary for the careful settling of a new foundation he refers to a free and equal [i. e., adequate] Parliament. In this connection, he says that whilst the vote is necessary in some cases, every law should be decided upon clearness, and upon evidence to common sense. The vote, he adds, implies an absence of this clearness and evidence. It would appear, that Isaac Penington, in this respect, anticipated the custom of Friends and desired the "sense" of Parliament as Friends take the sense of the Meeting.

Thine very sincerely,

ISAAC SHARP.

CALGARY, Alberta, Fifth Month 26, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND:—The time is approaching when United States tourists may be making trips for recreation or education to this portion of Canada, and I have no doubt whatever but that quite a sprinkling of Friends will be found amongst these tourists. Therefore I would ask if they would not kindly insert an invitation in THE FRIEND from Calgary Monthly Meeting asking all traveling Friends to call upon us if possible. We hold our Meeting for Worship at 7.30 on the evening of every First-day at 1309A Twelfth Street, West, in our own little meeting-house, and the door always swings open. Frederic Sara and his family live in the adjoining house and some one of them will probably be found at home should visiting Friends be stopping over in the city on any other day than First-day.

Very truly thy Friend,

HERMAN H. SHARPLESS.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Girard, in the Ledger, says the oldest thing in Philadelphia is not the Blue Anchor, but a church bell. When in its recast form it rang on the 10th from the steeple of ancient Gloria Dei it sounded for the 274th year its message:

"I to the church the living call
And to the grave do summon all."

The National American Woman Suffrage Association announced from Washington it had received assurances from the Pennsylvania Railroad that it has accepted the principle of "equal pay for equal work," wherever women are employed in places of men.

Public school superintendents and principals from all parts of Pennsylvania have been summoned to a wartime conference at State College by Dr. Nathan C. Schaeffer, State Superintendent of Public Instruction. He fixed Seventh Month 11th for the meeting, which will continue for two or three days. In his announcement he said the war should not be allowed to interfere with educational activities. He urged a full attendance of educators so they might discuss "the effect of war upon our school system, normal schools and other technical and professional schools."

Arrangements have been completed by the Baldwin Locomotive Works for closing the largest order in its history. The order amounts approximately to $14,000,000 and consists of 250 heavy freight engines for Russia.

A careful analysis made recently shows that there are 3,000,000 motor cars of all kinds in service in the United States to-day. Of this number one-half of the mileage is used for business purposes, and literally this means that only one-half of these cars are used for pleasure.

The number of operations performed in this country by men not qualified to undertake them is entirely too large, said Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan, of Chicago, before the section of the American Medical Association on surgery. After he had finished a resolution was passed, calling for the appointment of a committee of ten to study the problem and report next year on the best way to solve it.

The aim of the Lohr Bill, at Harrisburg, which is being backed by the Philadelphia Wool and Textile Association and which is a part of the great national movement to grow more mutton and more wool to cut the cost of living, is to eliminate the roaming dog that is of no value to anybody and does incalculable damage to flocks.

Infantile paralysis is communicated by personal contact with slight and nonparalytic cases as the most frequent sources of infection, according to the conclusions of the special committee appointed by Mayor Mitchell and financed by the Rockefeller Foundation to aid the Department of Health in combating the paralysis epidemic.

The reason why the Negro leaves home to go North have been studied by W. E. B. Du Bois in the Crisis, and while the primary ones are economic, "bad treatment" is frequently assigned as a strong second place. Dr. Du Bois, who has covered the whole South by questionnaire, comes to the conclusion that a quarter of a million Negroes have moved northward.

In a report to the Council of National Defense, Herbert C. Hoover declares 1,000,000,000 bushels of cereals and enormous quantities of meats, fats and sugar must be shipped from the United States to meet the needs of the Allies and a few neutrals. Home consumption must be radically reduced.

Professor Herbert H. Beck, of Franklin and Marshall College, says the spring of 1917 will be remembered by observers as a season when rare bird visitants were as plentiful as common varieties. The present migration period has been remarkable for its extraordinary flight of warblers.

G. Sherwood Eddy and sixty university students of Princeton and Northwestern have arrived safely in France. G. S. Eddy picked the men personally to assist in Y. M. C. A. work on the continent in order to replace British men who have been called for service.

FOREIGN.—A despatch from San Juan Del Sur, Nicaragua, under date of Sixth Month 8th, said San Salvador, the capital of the Republic of Salvador, with a population of more than 60,000, has been totally destroyed, probably by an earthquake.

From an average annually of 35,000 for 1912 and previous years, immigration to Cuba has increased to 45,000; for the year ending 1916 more than 55,000 immigrants arrived in Cuba, notwithstanding war conditions which affected all the countries of North and South America, particularly the United States and Argentine.

ANOTHER ITEM IN THE EVIDENCE.

William Dean Howells, in his recently published book, "Years of My Youth," narrates a circumstance which furnishes one more testimony in the case against war. It occurred in connection with his meeting James A. Garfield about the year 1870, when the memory of the Civil War was still vivid in the minds of the men and women who had lived through that crucial period. As Howells and Garfield, with some neighbors of the latter, were sitting together in the long summer evening, they talked of Lowell and Whittier and other American men of letters, until, "under the spell of those inarticulate voices," the conversation began to take on the character of "intimate and mystical experience." Then Garfield related an incident connected with his own personal knowledge of war and of its moral injuries. It happened in the early days of the great struggle, when he had not yet become accustomed to fields of death. As he passed along with his troops through (or into) a certain valley, he observed a number of men lying, apparently asleep, in a meadow; but presently the realization that these were dead men, "whom other men had killed," swept over him, and then at the sight, "something went out of him . . . that never came back again: the sense of the sacredness of life, and the impossibility of destroying it."

"In the leading of his confession," says Howells, "he went on to say how the sense of the sacredness of other things of peace had gone out of some of the soldiers and never come back again." Grown used to plunder and violence and deceit as a part of war, they could not easily and readily bring themselves back to the standards of orderly society and normal living. "You would be surprised," said Garfield, "to know how many of those old soldiers, who fought bravely and lived according to the traditions of military necessity, are now in the penitentiary for horse-stealing."

The relation so feelingly given by James A. Garfield that evening, with the silence following some of his "solemn words," probably carried into the hearts of his listeners more conviction than a carefully wrought thesis would have done.

The commentary was unanswerable; and it may have been the lesson thus impressed upon the mind of William Dean Howells that in part guided his own later judgment when he characterized all war as "cruel and foolish."

The strong principles and the refined nature of James A. Garfield saved him from that degree of moral collapse which men of less strength so often and so visibly suffered, albeit less consciously perhaps than he. It is not alone in "blood and treasure" that losses are to be reckoned, but in the moral robbery and spoliation of manhood as well. The devious methods and sinister policies of war, joined with these irreparable injuries, can hardly be more forcefully epitomized than in a saying of the wise man of old: "That which is crooked cannot be made straight, and that which is wanting cannot be numbered." ALONE.

"I am not alone, because the Father is with me." (John xvi: 32.)

When in a far eastern country a few years ago, it was my privilege to meet with one of the finest Christian ministers I have ever been brought into contact with—the native pastor of a native church. His face illuminated with ecstasy when he told of his joy in Jesus. It was his habit before break of day to go out to the mountains near the city in which he resided and there alone pray to God on behalf of his country and its spiritual welfare. His vigils often physically exhausted him. Was he alone in the dew of the mountainside long before the break of day? Not at all. In that trusting place he held high communion with the Father of all men, and there found power with God.

In the Holy Scriptures we do not find much commendation for those who are alone. Only once or twice is such a position referred to as applying to a single individual. But when our Lord partook of the common lot of all men he included the solitary periods that so frequently enter into the experiences of men.

God pity the young man or woman who sometimes out of the severe exigencies of modern business and social life is compelled to live apart from others. This may be during the hours not devoted to daily toil. The rooming-house too frequently has temptations and discouragements within itself or leads to indulgence in temptations abroad. Happy and safe are those young persons who have learned the secret of comradeship with God, and who, as their Lord said, know that the Father is with them. Their feet are planted upon a rock. They feel the very presence and protection of the God of all the families of the earth.

When our earthly props have failed or death has entered into our homes, it is often well for a season to be alone with God. How desolate is the human heart when the sweetest ties of nature have been sundered. How bitter is the grief and loneliness when we realize that loving companionship has forever ceased. Our human ambitions may seem a mockery.

The Divine permissions respecting us may seem cruel. In the language of John Oxenham we exclaim:

"All that I love has passed,
And left me at the last Alone!—Alone!"

The Christian in times of trial finds comfort in remembering that just when his Christ most needed the sympathy and devotion of His little band they forsook Him and fled, and left Him alone. Is not the lonely Christian the companion of his Lord?

Paul tells us that when he was threatened with the lion, "the Lord stood by me." The Christian looking to the past experiences with the Son of God can say, as he feels the everlasting arms about him, "I am alone, yet not alone, because the Father is with me."

THE REGISTRATION.

The public press at large, the New York Sun in particular, has heralded the outcome of registration as indicating a "new era" of history for our country. Not a little surprise is expressed at this tremendous evidence of a new national consciousness, springing into the arena for "service." It seems to inspire fresh hope that democracy has produced on our shores a type, not of manhood merely, but of citizenship, calculated to challenge any and every product of old world patriotism. One would be quite blind not to recognize the point and the scope of these observations. Under the stimulus of a world war America has reached this end, somewhat slowly perhaps, but none the less surely, in a way to attract the world. The national consciousness that has emerged from our century of practice in a democracy is truly a "new thing" in the world's history. Now that we see it as a fact what shall we do with it? What shall the world do with it?

It is a national characteristic that we speak very quickly, but think and act often very deliberately. The quick-speaking in the present instance has adopted the term "universal service" to express the inside significance of the unresisting registration of nearly ten millions of young men. We say "adopted" in mentioning "universal service," for we remember that universal service was no great time ago branded with the adjective "Prussian." We would accuse no one of intentionally advocating that system for our country. What seems to us of immediate moment is that we should so clarify our thinking, so insist upon clear thinking on the part of others, that there can be no doubt of the explicit meaning of this call to loyalty. Let us believe in universal service, but let us insist that it shall not mean universal military service.

In our reflection on the subject we can not forego the advantages of contrast. If as the New York Sun says we have registered the most momentous expression of nationalism history has ever known, shall we at once ignore the process under which this has been developed? Europe has given us illustrations enough of the types of national consciousness possible to methods of conscription. Are these types better than our own? The implications as well as the plain statements of our most astute political philosophers are that the voluntary system of training has produced a product of peculiar merit and promise. Let it be so.

Preferred Christianity has often been a failure for individuals and for community because of the difficulty of recognizing the corporate consciousness—the corporate conscience even. We must obey what we believe to be the voice of God in our soul. But we are hardly adapted for this world, unless we are constrained to "seek out" "ten others", or a hundred others, or a thousand others, who are ready to unite with us in an earnest effort to apprehend the Divine will. This of course is the basis of what we call the Church and Friends mostly have written the word with a capital, because of their desire to be co-ordinated with something larger than their own denomination. The present unparalleled situation of our national history may well serve to put this fact into bold relief. Have we not as Friends a special contribution to make at this time to the world-wide effort to get at an expression of the Christian consciousness, now so often hidden in denominational rubbish? Is not that plainly the way out of the condition that makes war possible? If we analyze it closely does not the exemption clause, in the Federal draft act, point that way? It does not trust the individual conscience against war, but it is willing to trust a corporate conscience. What would have been the general situation were all the denominations united in a Church consciousness based on the Sermon on the Mount!

Universal service then demands for safety this corporate conscience. If as a Society we have helped to give even a small degree of this content as expressed in exemption to the Federal act, shall we not now strive to expand this territory? Shall not our efforts be to make "universal service" "universal Christian service"? Shall we not join in a drive to teach the State to recognize God as supreme, before it gets started headlong on the path that leads to the old world doctrine of the State as supreme?

OLD SCHOLARS' DAY AT WESTTOWN.

The "W. O. S. A. Special" is very much like Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on wheels. Friends of all ages and from all localities fill the several cars with that restrained hum of happy conversation quite characteristic of our best traditions. Even the conductor pauses to say, "it is a very orderly crowd." Accessions at Lansdowne and Media make the impression of gathering interest more vivid, multiplied automobiles at Westtown Station properly introduce the unstinted hospitality of the day. Everybody is at the service of everybody else. That is a side of the occasion that no one proclaims, but it has tremendous social and ethical value.

Once at the School, how much at home we all feel! It is a great comfort not to be registered and labeled and guided. We are in our own world, and it is all our own! If we have an audible wish, some one responds to it, whether it is for a glass of water or for an automobile ride to see the Lake, the Orchard, the Old Dam, or Walnut Hill. If we wish to wander away uninterrupted to haunts of our childhood, a fine discrimination on the part of numerous aids quickly perceives the situation and we are unmolested.

At eleven all currents are directed to the great tent. How well that thousand or more people know how to enter into the sanctuary of devotional silence! Then more than at any other moment we are all participating in the one lesson that no loyal Westonian failed to learn. This silence contains the cementing bond that in spite of our multiplied individual characteristics makes us all one.

To an audience thus cemented the program of exercises appeals with undoubted interest. The president's plea for loyalty had ample background of specific outlets for expression in needed improvements. Westtown does not fail constantly to justify its claim as a true child of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. It is all the while outgrowing its clothes! The half million investment in material plan seems only to have emphasized certain "imperative needs."

The testimonial to Thomas K. Brown on his retirement after forty-three years of unstinted service seemed to have taken appropriate form. It was well not to have made the occasion hard for him, but many wanted more details than Charles Evans gave. Doubtless they will be forthcoming. Thomas K. Brown's response was dignified in utterance and impressive in the feeling that was evidently beyond utterance. In his address he showed that like other young men he can "see visions and dream dreams." If now a great school architect like Frederick Rowntree, who has done such a service for Friends' Schools in England, could prepare a comprehensive plan to anticipate a half century of Westtown's needs, how it would seem like a fitting projection of Thomas K. Brown into the future. This idea is dropped by the way in the hope that the W. O. S. A. will heed it.

The new Principal was in no easy rôle, but he acquitted himself in a very friendly way. Without the least ostentation he made the impression of stability and weight as well as of vision. The Robert Louis Stevenson incident with which he closed will make a text for much of the Westtown that lies just before us. It appears the youthful Stevenson had drawn a picture of a man, and after exhibiting it to his mother with a glow of youthful pride, had exclaimed, "And now, mother, shall I draw his soul?" A new, but welcome, way of emphasizing "religious education"!

It would have been an inexcusable omission in the face of the world crisis not to have had that large audience pause to consider our present responsibilities. Leadership in this part was assigned to Rufus M. Jones and he did full justice to the opportunity. His address was impromptu, but our friend Benjamin Doan, of New York, very kindly reported it for us and we are able with the speaker's permission to print it herewith.

After the exercises in the tent, dinner and play claimed appreciative attention. The Old Scholars' Association has thus another un-expressed function—it keeps the circle of Friends at play, or interested in play, so that custom can hardly lie upon us with a "weight," "heavy as death and deep almost as life."

Hurrying through the evening from this year's Old Scholars' day all were thankful for fine weather, good fellowship and a certain strength of unity in being combined together to serve a worthy Alma Mater.

J. H. B.

A CONSTRUCTIVE QUAKER POLICY IN THE PRESENT NATIONAL CRISES.

RUFUS M. JONES.

My subject is necessarily a very serious one. Many of you have stood, as I have done, on the edge of the Great Canyon of the Colorado, in Arizona, and you have looked down into that tremendous gorge—6,000 feet down—cut through the solid strata of the slowly piled rocks of the continent, and you have seen at the bottom, roaring, tumbling along, the turbulent river that is slowly cutting this channel. And you have seen the many colors flashing and playing on the jutting rocks of the strata, and you have felt east over you a sense of awe and sublimity and majesty, such as perhaps you have never felt in any other spot in the world, that made your whole being tremble with an emotion as seldom happens to anyone gazing on any other scene.

To-day we stand on the edge of a chasm which cuts down, not through the strata of the earth, but down through the slowly piled layers of a world-old civilization and cleaves down to the very bases and pillars of that civilization—a chasm into which the slowly accumulated wealth of the world is being tumbled—a chasm into which the millions of young men throughout the world, from the universities and the schools, the skilled workers of the world, are plunging headlong, never to come back. And we are gazing down at that continuous running crimson river at the bottom of this chasm, which gives us not merely a sense of awe, but an overwhelming sense of terror in the presence of it. And a thousand times I have asked myself what I ought to do with my life in the presence of that tragic situation. No less urgently I have asked again and again what the Society of Friends, which from my earliest youth has been the most precious thing in the world to me—more precious always than life itself—what this beloved Society of ours ought to do in this desperate hour.

Always I come back to the same conclusion. It is this: That there is no service which we can render in this tragic crisis greater or more important than will be the luminous exhibition of loyalty to our historic principles and the sacred ideals of our Christian faith. If the world were asked now what it most wanted from us in this hour, I feel sure that it would choose that we should continue to give absolute dedication of our lives to the spiritual task which has been laid upon us by Almighty God. When this war is over—when the reign of hate is at an end—those who have kept the faith—faith in the all-conquering power of love—faith in the Kingdom of God—faith in the weapons of the Spirit—those persons will be the ones who will be seen and recognized as having made the greatest contribution to the higher life of the world.

The exemption which has been granted our Society is a great recognition of the estimate which is given to the worth of our spiritual service, and it is a challenge to us to remain unwaveringly loyal to those historic ideals. Never has there been a greater need than just now of a remnant left in the world to bear testimony to the power of the spiritual forces of the universe as against the destructive forces of man. But this testimony cannot be borne in any passive way. We must act! We must be virile.

Some of you remember these splendid words of a contemporary of George Fox when he said, "My mind was not at rest because nothing was active, and thoughts ran in me that words and writings are nothing and must die. For action is the life of all; and if thou dost not act, thou dost nothing." Oliver Cromwell came one day into a cathedral in England, and, pointing to the statues of the Twelve Apostles carved in silver in that cathedral, he said, "Who are those men there?" The verger told him that they were twelve saints that the church had picked out as representative saints. "Well, what are they doing there?" asked Cromwell. "Melt them up and coin them into money and put them into circulation in the realm."

That was Cromwell's way of dealing with the situation. But it is the way to use saints!—to put them into circulation; and I long and pray that our saints and our near-saints shall be in circulation. It would be pitiful if our patriotism, our loyalty, our consecration of ourselves, were to fall behind that of the soldiers who have unsparingly given their lives and all they had to what they believed was the great cause of the hour. Far be it from us, who take a different position, to assume an attitude that in any sense seems to be one in which we desire to save ourselves. We must not have as our creed, "Safety First." We must be ready for risks, and we must be ready for the highest call that comes to us to dedicate our lives.

It is peculiarly fortunate, I think, that just now has come to the Society of Friends a great chance to serve and to take the risk. We have been asked to prepare a great Quaker unit, to be Unit No. 1 of the Society of Friends in America, to go out and help rebuild a wrecked and ruined world in the vacated war zones of Northern France. I say it is fortunate, for as this work has to be done it certainly is fortunate that some of that work should come to us, and that the first chance for America to undertake this work should be ours. We are calling on young Friends—at first the men, and later it will be the women—from all over the Society of Friends in America, to send in their names for this service. But especially to-day I am asking those present here that this service will call for a very great sum of money; and very much of that money must come from the very men and women in this tent to-day.

Probably not less than $125,000 will need to come from this Yearly Meeting for this constructive service. Some here will find it necessary to say good bye—"Farewell" is the Quaker way—farewell to sons and daughters; and others will have the easier task of putting some money which they have saved up into this service.

It is not, however, merely reconstruction work in France that comes to us to do. Wherever men and women live and toil there is a call for consecrated, devoted men and women who will go out to the farm and take part in the great human task of saving the world from famine. Our President has certainly done right to lay upon America this great task of to-day. It is not raising food to feed an army. It is raising food to save the world from famine; and the need is far more urgent than many of us here to-day recognize. Fortunately, here again, Friends are to have a very great part in that work.

But what I want to say finally is this: That there is a still greater mission upon us to-day than either one of these of which I have spoken, great as will be the blessed result of giving to these terribly wrecked regions and making it possible once more for scattered families to come back and live in the little shacks we build, and to start once more to till the fields that look now as though nothing would ever grow upon them. Great and fortunate as is the task to help produce the food for the mouths and the bodies, I feel the greatest single thing that comes to the Society of Friends to-day is the mission of helping our poor stricken humanity once more to find God! Great as is the danger of food-famine, vastly greater just now is the danger of spiritual famine. It was the spiritual famine that caused the war. Behind this awful thing was the loss of spiritual vision. Behind all this desolation that was ruthlessly going through humanity has been a profound materialistic conception of life.

It is our business to help turn the tide, to call men back once more from false trails and bring them face to face with the tremendous spiritual realities of the universe, and make them realize the everlasting love of God and the sacrifice of Christ for men; to make them see what love really means. And to this great task as the supreme mission of our lives I call Friends to-day.

One of the noblest, one of the most gifted of all the young men who went out never to come back—cut down in his youth, stricken down in the creative period of his great life—I mean RUPERT BROOK—obeyed these words in the great sonnet which he wrote in the beginning of the crisis:

"Now God be thanked who matched us with this hour!"

I can not yet feel that our Society of Friends is matched with the desperate need of this hour. I long and pray that such an awakening may sweep over us—such a sense of mission will once more possess us—that others may say when the work is done, "Now God be thanked, those Friends have been matched with the hour."

"AS THY DAYS ARE."

Fear not, although the road be rough and long
Which thou must travel, and the dreary day
Shows storms that linger in the heavens gray,
Though hard to tell the right path from the wrong,
Though weak and worn when thou must needs be strong,
Dreading the struggle, longing down to lay
Thy weary burden, and to flee away.
Dear heart, take courage; raise thy voice in song,
And go with joy on thine appointed road.
There is no need for thee to be afraid;
Thy heavy burden shall be borne for thee;
For One shall guide thee, rest on Him thy load.
Think on the promise which to thee was made,
That as thy days are, so thy strength shall be.

STATEMENT OF AMERICAN FRIENDS' RECONSTRUCTION UNIT.

The American Friends' Service Committee has arranged to begin training Seventh Month 1st, at Haverford College, Haverford, Pa., a unit of 100 young men for reconstruction work in France. It is expected that later other units, including probably a unit of women, can be trained and sent.

The members of the unit will be supplied with all expenses of training, equipment, transportation, board, lodging and medical attendance from the time they leave their homes until they return. No salaries will be paid. All who can pay a part or all of these expenses are urged to do so through the general treasury.

The work will include building, repairing, agriculture, horticulture, sanitation, medical aid, social work, and all forms of ministrations to a stricken people. Although much of the work must be learned on the field, specially desirable qualifications are a reading and speaking knowledge of French, and some training or experience in the above lines of work.

Preference will be given to members of the Society of Friends, and it is not yet clear what arrangement may be made with our Government as to the inclusion of others. Applications of others, however, who have conscientious objection to military service and wish to identify themselves with this service of Friends will be considered for this or later units.

The question on the application blank as to conscientious objection to military service does not indicate that such Friends only will be considered. The question is merely for the information of the Committee, particularly in view of the provision in the conscription law as to conscientious objection as a basis for exemption.

Application for this service should not be made without careful consideration of conscientious duty in other fields, including the duty for work at home and for the preparation for life in the normal course of education.

An application blank and a medical certificate blank accompany this statement as mailed to Friends and others.

The full form of application and other information may be had from Vincent D. Nicholson, Executive Secretary, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

CONFERENCE OF DENOMINATIONS OPPOSING WAR.

On Fifth Month 23rd a small group of persons representing churches which from a religious standpoint advocate peace and the avoidance of all war, met at Washington, D. C., for the purpose of seeking some means of co-ordination of effort, especially in the matter of our representation before Congress and government departments. An interesting discussion preceded the drafting of a statement, a copy of which follows:

STATEMENT OF VOLUNTARY COMMITTEE REPRESENTING CERTAIN RELIGIOUS BODIES ADVOCATING PEACE AND THE AVOIDANCE OF ALL WAR.

Without prejudice to our Government: averring our loyalty to the civil authorities, and desiring to serve our country in the peaceable arts and productive industries; and seeking the continued privilege of worshipping our God and living according to the dictates of our own consciences:

We, the undersigned, members of the Brethren (or Dunkers), Mennonites and Friends (or Quakers), met in voluntary and informal conference, have prayerfully considered our common obligations and duties as Christians, and as the inheritors of a tenet of faith, consistently maintained through many generations, that carnal warfare and blood conflict are contrary to the teaching and example of our Lord.

Our denominations have been linked together by a common bond of peace-loving and peace-making principles, and are exempt from military or naval service under the recent Conscription Act. While accepting this as a gratifying tribute to the consistency of our forefathers, we must at the same time realize that it entails responsibilities impossible for us to avoid.

It places upon us the two-fold obligation, first, of reaffirming and revitalizing within our own limits the Christian Gospel of Peace, and that the teachings, life and death of our Saviour are the only fundamental and ultimate basis of peace, and that we should follow His example, wherever it may lead; and secondly, of so relating ourselves to others and letting our light shine before men that these principles and testimonies may be extended and become effective in our national and social life.

To further these ends, and believing that any pronouncement of these principles or presentation of them to the Departments of our Government will be better received and be more effective if set forth under one general plan than by each of the bodies working single-handed, we recommend that the various Conferences, Yearly Meetings, or delegated Councils, appoint one or two persons duly authorized to act for their respective bodies, to constitute a Committee which, in a united and concerted way, may have watch over the situation, devise plans, present our position and claims to the various departments of our Government, and labor together in the interests of our time-honored and Scriptural testimony of peace, as needs may arise.

FRIENDS' WAR VICTIMS' RELIEF COMMITTEE.

Annemasse, that flat, uninteresting, not to say disappointing, little town, will live in the memory and history of thousands who never heard of it before the war. After having passed through the level country via Dijon, Ambrion and Culos to Bellegarde, at the foot of the mountains and the banks of the Rhone, in the great quarter-mile long P. L. M. express, the appetite is whetted and the interest increased so that one expects something very different. Still, the little township at the gates of Switzerland, with its tramways to Geneva, will be passed down to generations as the spot on friendly native soil where their ancestors arrived after twenty-four and thirty months in the hands of the invader.

As I left the station the snow was 15 to 30 centimetres deep; but a small track led from the board indicating "Direction à Samoëns," past a large shed inscribed with the words "Bagages des Repatriés," to the local railway with its little engine and two or three tram-like coaches which awaited the arrival of the Paris mail (when it was not more than three hours late) before setting off on its three hours' pull of 36 to 40 kilometres up the Giffre valley (famous in times of peace for its trout).

Not expecting to hear anything but foreign tongues, and being very interested in the surroundings, particularly the dray-loads of luggage entering the above mentioned shed, I was agreeably surprised to be greeted in a familiar northern accent and escorted to the train. One of our workers was taking up a baby and five other children, afterwards known as the red-haired family. How patient was ——— with the little crying mites and helpless infants!

The train wound with the road up the valley, ploughing through the snow. I stood on the platform of the coach with two boys of eleven, getting a little information regarding their experiences and telling them about the great mountains and snows which they were now seeing for the first time, and which soon sent into oblivion the nightmare of their hardships and sufferings. As we ascended, the snow became deeper and the mountains closer, whilst the little engine had to stop now and again, even between the many villages and halts, to gather fresh energy.

Will those poor people, after being driven from pillar to post, half-starved for lack of food in the villages of their birth in the Aisne, the Marne, the Ardennes and adjoining districts, after their nights and days in trucks through Germany to Switzerland, and thence to France, ever forget the welcome they received on arriving at Samoëns? Every little mite, irrespective of appearance or condition, is received into the loving, willing, outstretched arms of our workers, and carried off triumphantly to Bellevue. The bigger children and women follow, whilst their bundles of worldly possessions, those weary looking packages knotted into dust-sheets generally, with occasionally a wooden box, are carried for them by their compatriots who have preceded them to this haven of refuge by a few weeks, or perhaps only a few days. Already was evident the wonderful change sympathetic care, clean habits, clean beds and good plain food make in a short time on the most desolate looking. Naturally, great interest is taken in all newcomers, and they are soon made to feel at home by everyone.

No better place could have been selected for a sanatorium or convalescent home than in this favored zone, far from the noise and strife, nestling there—although over 2,000 feet up—at the foot of the majestic Criou and other mountains 6,000 to 8,000 feet high, clad almost to their summits with "le bon sapin" planted in the cracks, crevices and on the face of the terrain, however perpendicular, by "le bon Dieu," and erecting their heads straight to the heavens through intense winter cold and strong summer sun.

Hotel Bellevue on one side of the road, with its annexe on the other, can accommodate about a hundred repatriés, women, children, and sometimes an old man. The two buildings are a strangely continental mixture of strength and weakness, with their concrete floors and stairs; great cracked wooden roof joists; outer walls of solid stone over two feet thick, cemented together at the base with a substance as hard and difficult to negotiate as the stone itself, whilst the inner walls will not stand a nail; warped doors and windows, with scarcely a pane absolutely square.

The winter has been rather severe, and for weeks shortly after sunset the thermometer registered 15 degrees below zero centigrade, whilst at times in the night it fell to 20 degrees and 25 degrees below. However, we were able to keep up a fair heat night and day in the radiators, and thanks to the lack of wind it was quite easy to stand the cold.

Right past the hotel is the best luge (toboggan) run in the district; and after the descent of a few sledge loads of timber it was splendid. Early in the morning, with the frost in the air at 10 or 12 degrees centigrade, i. e., eighteen to twenty degrees below freezing Fahrenheit, the children were so keen on their new sport that they came out with their breakfast in their hands, and whilst eating it demanded "le traineau, monsieur"; or a little chappie of 4 or 5, in countless jerseys and scarves, would look up and say, "Je voudrais bien le luge, monsieur." The "petit canadien" made on the premises was a great favorite; however, they were of all sizes and makes. Sometimes a papa on "permission" would find a second-hand one for his children he had not seen until then since the beginning of the war. Needless to add, they were constantly under repair.

When the snow went and sledging became impossible, walks and rambles in search of snow-drops and primroses, etc., were arranged; and occasionally a little physical exercise was given to the bigger children, and they all entered into these recreations and pastimes with zest.

As the days went by, relatives were found to take some of our guests, homes for others, situations and apartments for the women, and with what gratitude in their hearts and tears on their faces did they leave us. One day, when the war is over, and the families who have come under our care are reunited in homes of their own, perhaps also provided and built for them in the Dôle Building Camp, will they not think of "les Anglaises" and be encouraged to live the open, free and healthful life on which we tried to start them?

Would we had a score or more of these places, for there are thousands of refugees crowded together in Paris and other large centres, developing tuberculosis and similar ailments which it will take years to eradicate, whereas, if we could only take them out of these pent-up, stuffy rooms and garrets, into a sanatorium for a few weeks' rest and cure, then send them to smaller towns and villages until they could return to their own villages, what a fine thing it would be.

WESTTOWN YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE.

AS noted in THE FRIEND some weeks ago, this Conference is scheduled for the five days, Sixth Month 23rd to 28th. Detailed programs have been freely circulated. They show two evening addresses by Rufus M. Jones and two by Elbert Russell. Albert G. Shepard, Henry T. Brown and Anna R. Ladd conduct a Conference four days, with the general subject, "The Local Meeting and the Community." The "Social Order Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting" has assigned topics, under the general head, "Social Problems," also on four days; Clarence E. Pickett on "Helping Young People," Agnes L. Tierney on "Some Basic Elements of Religion," Henry J. Cadbury on "Modern Ideals in the Prophets," Thomas E. Jones on "A Successful First-day School," George Nasmyth on "Christianizing International Relations," and Emily G. Balch on "War vs. Peace," are scheduled daily. Carroll L. Brown is to be in charge of a Quaker Forum.

All this liberal provision of activities is to be interspersed with recreation. The resources of Westtown in these lines are well understood. The familiar car supper is included in the program for Second-day, Sixth Month 25th.

Board and lodging for the whole time, or for single meals, are advertised, but notice should be given in advance by those desiring accommodations. Address all inquiries to Secretary Young Friends' Conference, Westtown, Pa.

THE T. WISTAR BROWN TEACHERS' FUND.

On Fifth Month 11, 1917, the Trustees of The T. Wistar Brown Teachers' Fund completed their first year of service.

The following notes upon the uses of the Fund may be of interest to the readers of THE FRIEND.

During the year the Trustees received fifty-six formal applications for grants from the Fund in addition to letters of inquiry. Of these fifty-six the Trustees approved fifty-three and declined three.

Of the fifty-six applicants, nine were men and forty-seven were women; forty-two were members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, thirty stated that they had attended Westtown School, nineteen had attended college for one or more years; all but five had had some experience in teaching.

It is of special interest that all the grants were made under paragraphs (a) and (b), defining the primary provisions of the Trust which read as follows:—

To encourage young Friends by some pecuniary aid who wish to qualify for teachers and instructors and are desirous of obtaining the needful instruction and cultivation to qualify them for their chosen profession.

"FIRST. (a) Such Friends as are members of Meetings included in and subordinate to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who are twenty-one years of age and older and who have had the usual school education and are choosing the profession of teaching and desire to take a one year course in a university or other preparation for their profession, to be aided to accomplish it.

"(b) Teachers wishing to attend summer schools or other places of instruction open during the vacation season."

Thirteen grants were made under paragraph (a) and forty under paragraph (b).

The income of the Fund available for this purpose was about $14,000, and the grants approved amounted to $13,804. Since Fifth Month 11th, several of the applicants have relinquished their grants because of ill health or kindred reasons and the Trustees have been able to make others.

THE PARADOX OF LIFE.

The painful things of life are polished lenses
Through which celestial glories brighter shine;
The angry billows of life's sea will lift thee
High on the bosom of the love Divine.

The bitter cup from which thy soul is shrinking
To sweetest cordial heaven will transform,
And arched across thy homestead's desolation
God's rainbow smiles upon the passing storm.

Why, fainting heart, bemoan thy disappointments?
They are but graving tools to cut the gem;
It needs the painful discipline of sorrow
If it would grace the royal diadem.

The bleeding balsam tree gives forth the perfume,
And besten of the sanctuary light;
Without the pruning knife no fruitful branches,
And stars reserve their beauty for the night.

The smitten rock replied with living water,
From buried wheat the garner's joyful gain,
From blinding tears the clearer inward vision,
The sweetest harmonies from hidden pain.

The nameless thorn is sent to keep thee lowly,
The furnace burns the fetters of thy hands,
God puts His treasures into earthen vessels,
Dark clouds with blessings break when He commands.

With garments fresh and feet unwearied
The wilderness is crossed on eagle's wings;
Till Zion's festal halls are reached with singing,
The vale of weeping proves a place of springs.

EXTRACT FROM EMERGENCY PEACE COMMITTEE.

[The following is from a somewhat lengthy report made to the Yearly Meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets. It is reprinted by request.—Eds.]

We hope Friends will meet the responsibilities of their ideals with courage and with dignity. It is true that all members of our Society do not agree as to their duty, as our country enters upon a war which many regard as righteous, and whose purposes as seen in the minds of most of our fellow citizens are high and noble. We would lovingly urge upon each, whatever his conception of his duty, to follow it unflinchingly. But the Society of Friends as a whole has a consistent, historic position, which is recorded in our official statements, in our Discipline and Advice, and which is still maintained by most Friends. So closely is this stand associated with the Society that it has been recognized in the laws of England and America, and in the mind of the general public to be a Friend is to be opposed to war.

This permanent testimony is not binding on the conscience of any individual; since each must loyally follow his own personal leading. But we would affectionately counsel Friends whose duty leads them along other paths, that they avoid involving the Society in their personal variation from its testimonies. Our members vary from the accepted ideals in many ways in every generation; but the Society has no more permanent and characteristic testimony than that which condemns all war as evil and indifferent methods of dealing with international difficulties. We would urge all Friends to realize that this position was not lightly taken, nor has it been easily maintained. It is founded on the plain and unequivocal teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. It is sustained by the long roll of injustice and misery which the centuries have recorded in the life blood of the helpless of all ages. War has been the support of tyranny, the bulwark of despotism, the means for the stifling of democracy. Heralded always as waged for great and good ends by all parties to the strife, it has been the cloak of every brutal excess, for unbridled passions, for unchecked cruelties. Each war has its plausible statement, its claim of necessity, its assumption of exclusive patriotism. Each will attain to great good by means of admitted evil. It is an oft told tale and we believe it false. We do not believe that civilization moves forward on the powder cart; we deny that good can come of such methods; we mark the deterioration of the nations at war—the slaughter of their best, the progress of disease, the debasing of their motives. We recognize the noble ideals of President Wilson and of all who believe as he does. But we mark already the denial of free speech, the efforts at coercion, the suppression of freedom of action, the growth of intolerance on the part of the militarist element which has forced this war upon an unwilling people. We see the cowardly holding back on the part of the noisy advocates of war, and the thrusting into places of danger of our school and college boys, whose ignorant enthusiasm makes them easy cat's-paws of the selfish and cowardly. We observe the grasping after gain already in evidence on the part of many who have fomented the war spirit, and we see the readiness of the wealth of the nation to shift the burden of payment for war to the already overloaded shoulders of the poor and the helpless unborn of the coming generations. In all this, the deterioration of war is at work; and it will go on. It is for us to stand firm against the whole system and thus to prepare ourselves to prevent the next war, though we have not been able to prevent this one. It is for us, too, to strive with all our powers to keep high the ideals of our country in the struggle which cannot now be averted, and in every possible way to combat the growing evils which will certainly be in our midst in the hard days to come. It is for us also to serve our country and humanity in all right ways, counting as nothing any personal loss which will count as support for the tottering ideals of Christianity and civilization.

We are entering a testing time: may we be loyal,

"Then to side with truth is noble, when we share her wretched crust,
 Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just;
 Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
 Doubting in his abject spirit, 'til his Lord is crucified."

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

The Senior Class held their Class Day Exercises at the School on the evening of Fifth-day, the 7th inst. The Class presented a reading stand, with an electric reading lamp, to the School as a testimonial of their appreciation.

The Graduation Exercises were held on the afternoon of Sixth-day, the 8th. The Class numbered twenty-seven, of whom seven were Friends. After Scripture reading by Albert H. Votaw, Clerk of the Instruction Committee, and a brief period of devotion, Charlotte Easby, the Class President, read an "Essay on Education for Efficiency"; Robert S. Cowperthwaite delivered an oration advocating "National Prohibition"; Ruth C. Dibert, with a few introductory words, recited a number of selections from the poetry of John Masfield; Wm. R. Whitacre presented a character study of Joan of Arc; and Dorothy A. Buckley, chosen by the teachers for high standing as a student and as representing the best influences in the School, delivered the Valedictory.

Promotion and Graduation Honors were announced by the Principal, Walter W. Haviland. The Honor Graduates were Charlotte Easby, whose general average in all subjects during the last two years was 87.8; Dorothy A. Buckley, whose average was 91, and Robert S. Cowperthwaite, with an average of 92.5.

Diplomas were then presented, after a few general remarks by the Principal.

J. Henry Bartlett, who was Superintendent of the School at the time several of the graduates entered, was much appreciated for his excellent address to the Class, which followed the presentation of diplomas, and closed the exercises. Following this, the members of the Class received their friends in the School yard, where ice cream was served.

The Class gave up the floral decorations which have been customary for Class Day and also the banquet in the evening of Graduation Day, in the belief that they ought this year to use the money which these would cost in some unselfish helpful service.

Of the graduates who expect to pursue further educational courses next year, one expects to go to Westtown, as one Westtown graduate, Charles S. Satterthwaite, came to Friends' Select School this last year for advanced and supplementary work. Several expect to enter colleges, including Cornell, Goucher, Haverford, Smith, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania State, Temple and the University of Pennsylvania. Others expect to enter the Philadelphia Normal School for Girls and the Drexel Institute.

NOTES ON NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

The two hundred and twenty-second annual session of New York Yearly Meeting convened on the 25th ult., at the meeting-house on Gramercy Square, N. Y. City, and adjourned on the 29th ult., to meet next year at Glens Falls. Usually there were three business sessions each day, preceded by a devotional meeting at 8.30 a. m. The membership of the Yearly Meeting is about the same as that of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, but the attendance is much smaller, since the various meetings composing the Yearly Meeting are scattered over a much larger area than our own. The meeting appeared to be a meeting of delegates, though the proceedings were entirely democratic, all members who attended having an equal voice in the discussions.

James Wood, the presiding Clerk, efficiently and courteously guided the deliberations of the body, and his minutes may be pronounced models of clearness and phraseology.

Among the visitors from other Yearly Meetings were Allen C. Thomas, of Baltimore Yearly Meeting; David M. Edwards, of Iowa; John Carey, of Indiana; Joseph Elkinton, Max I. Reich and Agnes M. Tierney, of Philadelphia.

The Trustees of Oakwood Seminary laid before the meeting a proposition to remove the School from Union Springs to Poughkeepsie or vicinity. There was considerable discussion, the preponderance of sentiment being favorable to the change, though it was doubted whether the present time was the most suitable for making this removal, which will involve much expense. For building, equipment and endowment, it is thought that ultimately a half million dollars will be needed.

In the week beginning on the 28th inst., the Friends of the other branch held their Yearly Meeting. As both bodies of Friends were equally and vitally interested in the questions issuing out of the deplorable European War in which unfortunately our nation is now involved, the Friends, known as the Orthodox branch, invited the other body to meet with them to consider this momentous subject. The invitation was cordially accepted, and on the evening of the 28th inst., the two bodies held a joint business session at the Twentieth Street Meeting-house. The two Clerks, James Wood and Elwood Birdsall, together served as presiding officers. For the first time in about ninety years, Friends were united in holding an official session of the Yearly Meeting, the business transacted being an integral part of the proceedings of each body. The number of Friends from the Fifteenth Street Meeting very much outnumbered the Friends of the Twentieth Street Meeting. Their meetings in New York and vicinity are much larger than those of the so-called Orthodox body. One of the leading addresses was delivered by Isaac Sharpless. Very solemnly and earnestly were our duties in this present crisis considered, and it was generally felt that Friends should shrink from no sacrifice, however great, in sharing the burdens imposed on the nations by this awful war.

FRIENDSVILLE ACADEMY.

The history of this School is closely connected with many Friends of Philadelphia and it would, without a doubt, be interesting to many Friends.

The School was first organized as a Monthly Meeting School in 1857, under the name of the Baltimore Association. The main work was done then by the Morgan brothers, who afterwards founded Penn College.

The School continued with a varied history until about 1870. At that time Rebecca Allinson, having the interest of the Friends of East Tennessee at heart, accompanied by Marmaduke Cope and his wife, Sara W. Cope, members of the Western District, Philadelphia, visited the School. They found quite a large body of Friends, who had migrated from the western part of North Carolina during the early days of the nation's history. There was a growing population of boys and girls, badly in need of education and home training. On their return home these Friends called together a few others and made known the conditions there. Friends were interested to the extent that they purchased houses and remodelled them for homes, where the boys and girls might have the proper care and training, while attending the Friendsville Academy. The girls' home was named in honor of the distinguished English Friend, William Forster, who died at Friendsville, as he was visiting the Governors of the slave-holding States and appealing to them in behalf of the down-trodden Negro. His modest grave may be seen enclosed in a neat wire fence at the Friends' burial ground, Friendsville, Tenn.

The William Forster Home for Girls is now under the direction of an Association of Friends of Philadelphia, while the Academy and the Boys' Home are under the supervision of the Friendsville Quarterly Meeting.

About 1900, Elizabeth Farnum, a kind and lovely woman, was so interested that she built a beautiful new academy, which was known as Farnum Hall. In the fall of 1914, this building was destroyed by fire and was replaced by the new Farnum Hall.

The building is very comfortable and can accommodate the one hundred and seventy-five boys and girls in attendance. Since almost all of the library and equipment was destroyed in the fire of 1914, the School finds itself badly in need of equipment.

Herman G. Tener, Principal, is in Philadelphia now and is trying to raise one thousand dollars so as to start the School on the industrial plan, and to make the institution self-supporting.

HERMAN G. TENER.

Having been aware for some time of the need of increased and improved equipment for the Friendsville Academy, I earnestly commend the foregoing article to the sympathetic and generous consideration of Friends—that the faithful and devoted work of the Principal may be more effectual for the training and religious welfare of the young people of Friendsville, East Tennessee.

CHELTENHAM, Pa., Sixth Month 11, 1917.

A VISIT TO NEW CASTLE, DELAWARE.

FRIENDS' HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

On the afternoon of Sixth Month 2, 1917, members of Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia and their friends, made an excursion to New Castle, Delaware, upon the invitation of Henry Hanbey Hay, who lives in one of the oldest houses there, and is much interested in the history of the town.

New Castle is many years older than Philadelphia, having been settled by the Swedes and Dutch before it came into possession of the English.

Under the Dutch government the town took the name of New Amstel; later in 1664, when "the crown of Great Britain was restored to Charles II, he granted to his brother James, Duke of York, territory embracing New York and New Jersey—and later that which comprises the State of Delaware," the name of New Amstel was changed to New Castle.

During the visit of George Fox to America in 1672, he stopped at New Castle, both on going to and returning from New England.

He records in his Journal:—

"We began our journey by land to New England; a tedious journey through the woods and wilderness, over logs and great rivers. . . . We rested a little while at a plantation by the way, but not long, for we had thirty miles to ride that afternoon, if we would reach a town; which we were desirous to do, and therefore rode hard for the town, with some others whose horses were strong, got to the town that night, exceedingly tired, and wet to the skin; but George Pattison and Robert Widders, being weaker-horsed, were obliged to lie in the woods that night. The town we went to, was a Dutch town, called Newcastle, whither Robert Widders and George Pattison came to us next morning. We departed thence and got over the River Delaware, not without great danger to some of our lives."

In reference to the return from New England he wrote:

"We passed over a desperate river, which had in it many rocks and broad stones, very hazardous to us and our horses." (Probably the Brandywine Creek.) "Thence we came to Christian River, where we swam over our horses, and went over ourselves in canoes; but the sides of this river were so bad and miry, that some of the horses had like to have been laid up. Thence we came to New Castle, heretofore called New Amsterdam; and being very weary, and inquiring in the town where we could buy some corn for our horses, the governor came and invited me to his house; and afterwards desired me to lodge there, saying he had a bed for me, and I should be welcome. So I stayed there, the other Friends being taken care of also. This was on the Seventh-day of the week; and he offering his house for a meeting, we had the next day a pretty large one; for most of the town were at it. There had never been a meeting here before, nor any within a great way of it; but this was a very precious one, many of the people were tender, and confessed to the truth; and some received it; blessed be the Lord for ever."

William Penn landed first at New Castle upon his arrival on the ship Welcome, in 1682, and on the site of the old Court House now standing "produced his deeds of feoffment from the Duke of York" and "the possession and seisin of the New Castle grant were formally given him by the attorneys of the Duke of York," symbolized by a piece of turf, a twig and water.

This site has been marked by a tablet erected on the old court house by the Colonial Dames of Delaware.

Upon the arrival of our party at New Castle, we were met by Henry Hanbey Hay and some of his neighbors, who gave us a hearty welcome. They proceeded in a most hospitable manner to conduct us to many fine old residences of much interest, and also to the ancient Court House and the "Immanuel Church." (Episcopal.)

The residences have interesting old doors and doorways, and attractive old-time gardens. Their fine large fire-places have beautiful, hand-carved mantels, and hearths built of the old square bricks, probably imported from England or elsewhere.

The associations with visits from George Washington and Marquis de Lafayette in some of these houses were related to us.

The churchyard visited contains many graves marked by elaborate tombstones, some of which are quite old.

We were invited into the old church, where some information in regard to its history and that of New Castle was presented by Richard Rodney, of New Castle.

We were privileged to partake of our picnic supper surrounded by the beautiful trees and flowers on the attractive lawn of S. S. Deemer, who most kindly and generously opened his house and grounds for our accommodation and entertainment.

MARY S. ALLEN,
Secretary.

YOUNGER FRIENDS.

GIVE HIM A HAMMER AND SAW.

Don't buy him a sword and a gun,
Whose purpose on earth is to kill,
Don't teach him that murder is fun,
Or something the hosom to thrill.
Don't send him to valley or hill
To slaughter the dove or the daw,
A lesson in youth to instil,
Just give him a hammer and saw.

Just give him some lumber of pine,
Just give him a bundle of boards.
And teach him to follow a line,
And teach him a builder's rewards.
Oh, better than rifles or swords,
Than stilling a song or a saw,
The thing that he fashions affords
The boy with a hammer and saw.

He'll work like a heaver, the boy,
He'll learn like the wisest among
The tree of the woods to employ.
He'll fashion a house for the wren.
He'll make you a trinket, and then
He'll figure and study and draw—
He'll learn all the lessons of men
If you give him a hammer and saw.

So teach him to work and to plan
The pleasure that laboring brings.
So make him a builder, a man,
And not a destroyer of things.
For closer the artisan clings
To family, country and law
Than soldiers or swordsmen or kings—
So give him a hammer and saw.
—DOUGLASS MALLOCH, in American Lumberman.

MEETING AT MEDIA.

A meeting was held at Media Meeting-house on the afternoon of the 10th inst. (Sixth Month 10, 1917), in accordance with a concern originating in the meeting of Ministers and Elders of Concord Quarterly Meeting, and united with by the general Quarterly Meeting, held Fifth Month 15, 1917. The purpose in view was that in these momentous times the older and younger members of the meeting might draw together in clearer understanding and closer sympathy. At the same time, there was a desire to promote a more sympathetic attitude on the part of older Friends towards the young people.

In order to preserve the informal character of the meeting and to emphasize the group spirit, the seats in the meeting-house were arranged in somewhat of a quadrangle, the Ministers' gallery not being used. Approximately two hundred persons were in attendance, many of whom were under thirty years of age. After a period of silent waiting, the Chairman of the Committee on Arrangements stated that the purpose of the meeting was: "That we might all be more closely knit together in the bonds of Christian fellowship and stand firm in our united determination to demonstrate practical Christianity to a world that lacks confidence to lay hold on the means of its redemption."

An elderly Friend offered prayer for wisdom and strength; many impressive expressions of religious concern from older and younger members followed. The spirit of the occasion was one of precious harmony and simplicity in speaking.

The meeting lasted about two hours, without lessening in the life and power. It was felt that the occasion was a great blessing to all who were present.

An outstanding conviction of Friends is that in the reconstruction of Christian ideals that must follow the close of the war, there will come to them the greatest challenge to Christian service that has come to the Society since the days of George Fox. S. W. J.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Yearly Meeting of 1917 again made some changes in The Discipline. The book as a whole will not be reprinted at this time, but a folder has been prepared, showing all the changes since 1910. Efforts will be made to place copies of this folder in the hands of all Clerks and Overseers of Meetings. Additional copies are held in stock at the Book Store, and can be had for the asking. A convenient method is to fasten one of these folders inside the cover of The Discipline.

THE Canadian Friend says: "Gurney Binford writes that the past month has seen some actual progress toward the formation of additional Monthly Meetings, looking ultimately toward a Japanese Yearly Meeting of Friends and a Committee was appointed consisting of Gilbert Bowles, Gurney Binford, Edith Sharpless and Alice G. Lewis to formulate an address to the Friends of Minato, who proposed to set up a Monthly Meeting, and also to indicate financial and other arrangements regarding the move.

A GIFT TO THE CHILDREN OF EUROPE.—Henry H. Collins, Jr., of Bryn Mawr, Pa., in a letter to the Advocate of Peace as a constructive step in organized good-will suggests "a definite kindly act to all the nations at war on such a generous scale that the very idea of its size, object, and lofty aim would enthuse our nation more than any military measure or mere talk on peace could ever do." He adds:—

"The sympathies of our people toward the nations of Europe have been somewhat divided, although now they are almost universally opposed to the ruthless warfare recently inaugurated by the Imperial Government of Germany. On one phase of the war, however, I think all Americans could unite in deep sympathy, regardless of nationalities. This is sympathy for the little children of Europe.

"Let America's men, women, and children, rich and poor, unite in a magnificent gift to the children of Europe—a gift worthy of our national greatness, not counted in millions, but in billions—the greatest gift ever made in human history. Let Congress decide upon a just form of conscription—not of men, but of money—not to be used for ourselves, but for others. Those who give voluntarily should be accorded some special honor, even as is done to volunteers in the army, but all should take part in the gift; no one should be exempt.

"Every country now at war should receive a share of this gift in such proportion as a committee selected from neutral nations may decide is best. Remember, this is not a gift to the government of any country, but a gift to its children, given in the hope that we may, in part at least, lessen their sufferings and make life more joyous for them, as children's lives should be; and then, perchance, when they have grown to manhood, they will think kindly of the great Republic across the seas which remembered them in their childhood and will strive to imitate its generosity and its high ideals."—Copied from The Intelligencer.

PROFESSOR WEISS inaugurated the Bootham School's reply to the cry of "back to the land," with an able lecture on "The Food of Plants." It gave a stimulus to the course of educational gardening begun a year ago, and in the strength of it the boys, divided into ten squads, prepared half an acre of the football field for potatoes. Some of the plots involved hard digging, as foundations of walls, observatories and sheds had to be removed, resulting in a couple of thousand cubic feet of broken brick. Amongst the unearthed relics were a stone roller and a surveyor's chain, both prehistoric in appearance. The ten plots were treated in six different ways, and received their seed potatoes before the end of term. The vigorous exercise took the place of some football. All matches involving school traveling were, of course, cancelled.—The Friend (London).

DURING the winter months twenty-eight meetings arranged by the Peace Committee of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting have been held at Devonshire House. Except on five occasions, the addresses were delivered by well-known Friends. The evening meetings numbered 12, and the subjects dealt with were International Relationships, Disarmament and National Service. The audiences varied from 50 to 200. Throughout the whole series entire harmony prevailed, keen interest was manifested in the discussions, and a high spiritual level was maintained. Sixteen half-hour mid-day meetings were also held and were greatly appreciated. Nine were devoted to the detailed exposition of Quaker principles and Quaker views of Social Reconstruction. At the remaining seven meetings graphic descriptions were given of the Relief Work of the War Victims' Committee and of the Emergency Committee. The lectures were delivered by prominent workers, whose vivid accounts of their operations were eagerly listened to and excited much interest. The Committee feel that there is cause for great thankfulness that the whole series was permeated by a markedly devotional spirit, and a desire to know and obey the will of God in the present crisis of the world's history.—The Friend (London).

SIXTH MONTH 11, 1917.

Under this date a draft is forwarded to Isaac Sharp, London, covering contributions received to date by the Committee of the Representative Meeting on behalf of war sufferers as follows:—

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

Governor Martin G. Brumbaugh, of Pennsylvania, has done the expected thing by reappointing Dr. Nathan C. Schaeffer State Superintendent for another four years. Dr. Schaeffer has already broken all records in length of service in any State.

"The New York Evening Post" says: "The Society of Friends, including all branches, will take over the grounds of Haverford College and the equipment of the Emergency Unit, and will mobilize at Haverford to prepare for reconstruction work in the devastated sections of northern France. Morris E. Leeds, '88, and J. Henry Scattergood, '96, have sailed for Europe, together with Grayson M. P. Murphy, '00, Vice-President of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York, who represents the Red Cross Society. These three gentlemen, though not definitely connected with the Government, are approved by the Government. They will make their report as soon as they have conferred with the authorities in France."

More than one million individual gifts have been made by the Children of America's Army of Relief in pennies, nickels, dimes, earned by the children themselves or given from their "movie" and candy money. Their organization is now keeping more than 15,000 children alive each day.

It was reported from Butte, Mont., on the 9th that about two hundred men were believed to have perished in a fire at the Spectacular Copper Mine.

A despatch from Phoenix, Ariz., said that 300 Russian colonists, Transcaucasians, settled near Glendale, nine miles west of Phoenix, declined to register. They are members of a religious order, the Holokans, a branch of the Doukhobors, and had taken a vow against warfare.

A Boston paper says: "It was learned at the Smithsonian Institution that the temperature of the earth is materially affected by the variation of the sun's output of radiation; that is, the daily change in the radiations from the sun, which become heat when they reach and penetrate our atmosphere, indicates forthcoming changes in the temperature of the earth for the next few days. By taking into account, therefore, the solar changes observers will soon be enabled to predict with greater accuracy meteorological or weather changes."

The more reassuring crop report by the government for last month has an international bearing. Spring wheat promises to yield 283,000,000 bushels, compared with 158,000,000 bushels last year, and a five-year average of 233,000,000. Winter wheat has about gained 7,000,000 bushels in the month, so that a total wheat harvest of 656,000,000 bushels is now indicated.

An imposing memorial to Jefferson Davis, President of the short-lived Southern Confederacy, is to be raised at Fairview, Ky., his birthplace.

The encouragement for the national prohibition movement given by Dr. Charles H. Mayo of Rochester, Minn., the newly-elected President of the American Medical Association, was a notable feature of the Association's convention in New York City. Dr. Mayo was unqualifiedly opposed to the use of alcohol in medicine, but he attracted the most attention by his declaration that "national prohibition would be welcomed by the medical profession."

President Wilson is in favor of American colleges and universities continuing their sessions, according to a telegram received from him by President W. L. Brynan, of Indiana University, and made public there.

A daylight-saving plan was adopted recently at the University High School in Madison in order to give the students more time for gardening. School begins at seven, an hour earlier, and is dismissed at noon.

A Congressman asks why a 25-ounce loaf is sold in France for eight cents, while a 14-ounce loaf from the same flour sells in Washington for 10 cents.

FOREIGN.—Captain Charles Bathurst, British Parliamentary Secretary to the Food Control Department, speaking at Guilford, said the immediate danger of national starvation had been removed, thanks to the prompt and generous assistance of the United States.

Reports of renewed activity in mining, oil, and industrial circles continue to be received from all parts of the Republic of Mexico. Most of the large mining properties are now in operation, some of them to a greater extent than ever before.

The Central Powers now hold nearly 3,000,000 prisoners of war, according to official figures published in German newspapers. Germany has 1,690,731 prisoners, including 17,474 officers; Austria-Hungary 1,092,055; Bulgaria, 67,582; and Turkey, 23,903.

THE COURAGE OF A GOOD CONSCIENCE.

In the face of the sacrifice and suffering which is now confronting our beloved country, it is essential to maintain a common ground of fellowship upon which differences of view and of feeling can unite in working for the one great end of advancing the world's good.

Patriotism at this time is assumed to express itself above all else in the one quality of courage, and many of those who have volunteered for military service believe that they are offering their lives to their country. The millions who have registered know that sacrifice of life is a possible issue of this service. Their courage is hailed as the chief capital of the nation in its extremity.

In considering this situation it is well to remember that the courage of the "silent masses" of humanity not so directly involved in the conflict should be fairly appraised and no injustice be done to those who express themselves in terms which do not agree with the ordinary patriotic standards. The limited class who cannot in good conscience respond to their country's call with any form of military service may yet be found to be equipped with courage of the highest order.

The religious bodies whose membership has been exempted by the Government from active military service appreciate this regard for conscientious scruples and desire to take no advantage of this action in shielding themselves from any dangerous service or sacrifice which may express their sense of duty to the cause of humanity.

In the conflict in Europe, some of the most perilous work in mine-sweeping in the English Channel has been voluntarily assumed by men of this class, often called by the rather vague term, "pacifists." Their valor in the face of danger has been inspired by the desire to save life. Their efforts have been commended as equal in courage to any of those manifested on the battlefield.

The ambulance work of non-combatants who have declined to carry any weapons of defense, has also won the highest recognition from the President of France and from the King of Italy. More than two thousand of this class have been engaged in ambulance work and in efforts to rebuild the desolated villages and the country-side in northern France. They have not been daunted by the perils of bursting shells or lurking fevers. We cannot as good citizens safely ignore them in the claim that courage in this crisis shall be accepted as the measure of a man.

The supreme example of courage in the history of the world as recalled by the words, "Even Christ pleased not Himself," shines forth as a perfect expression in this extremity. He made this sacrifice of life holy that we might know how to make ours holy. He gave courage a new content and an infinite value. He made it sacrificial. In that path we are called to walk and it may lead us in divergent ways, but as our eye is upon Him, we shall at least be preserved from reproaching one another.

THE VOLUME.

With this number THE FRIEND concludes its ninetyeth year. Readers will observe that this is No. 53 in the volume. The additional number for the year is in order to make the volume and the financial year (which begins Seventh Month 1st) coincide. We trust there are many other evidences of a "green old age," more positive than an added number. Most grateful of these evidences we may record the receipt of numerous appreciative letters during the year. These have been from young and old, from widely separated portions of the country, from readers of many points of view. They stimulate us to press on in the effort to make the paper bright and fresh, as well as positive and strong for the "service of Truth." In order for that we realize the necessity for the co-operation of forces apparently very diverse. Our success must therefore lie in disclosing the unity behind what at times seems like bewildering variety. This quest for unity is fortunately just now much "in the air." We should be blind not to recognize that it has helped our enterprise. We trust we have not been wholly useless in advancing it.

In circulation the growth of our paper has not been remarkable, but it has been steady. It now requires 2500 copies to meet the demands of a weekly issue. The weeks of the Temperance number more than 2800 copies go out from the office. Under the ordinary advertising calculation of four persons to a subscriber, our weekly audience would average about 10,000. That number of people interested in religious subjects is no slight leaven even in a population of one hundred million! We always think of them with a profound sense of responsibility, and also of privilege. It is well, perhaps, to emphasize the point of view of privilege for it represents the only recompense we can offer to the many kind contributors of articles to our columns. If they have no pecuniary return for their service, they at least have the satisfaction of writing for an unusually thoughtful audience.

The past year from the material point of view has been most difficult for the religious press. Some worthy weeklies that have been coming to our table for years have been obliged to make reductions in size, in quality of paper, and in general appearance till they are hardly recognizable. Now two or three of them represent their condition as quite desperate. THE FRIEND has felt this pressure of advancing cost. The supply of paper for next year represents an advance of fifty per cent. Some other items of expense have increased as much.

We have put in type on other occasions a plain statement of our means of meeting these necessary demands. There may be a point in our doing it periodically. First of all, then, THE FRIEND has the nucleus of an endowment. It amounts now to about $12,000, having been increased latterly by $2,000, in two very welcome gifts. It is estimated that $30,000 properly invested would be a fair capital for a paper like ours. As that is not in hand, a number of kind friends make it good to us annually by contributing $1000 in sums varying from $150 to $25. Our late dear friends, T. Wistar Brown and Joshua L. Baily, were interested contributors to this amount. They both generally accompanied their donations with practical business suggestions that in the course of several years have been an important factor in increasing our circulation about twenty-five per cent.

In addition to this item of resources another participated in by a much larger number of friends is of the greatest possible value. Instead of paying a single subscription these pay from two to ten; in one instance as many as thirty-two. This is done in two ways. Some furnish the names of the subscribers; others send the money to the office with instructions to apply it to worthy subscriptions not otherwise possible. How valuable such assistance is can be illustrated by a single instance. We hear from an old-time subscriber that the pressure of the times makes it necessary to stop a subscription. We are able at once to say that we can provide for it from cash in hand. In return we not only have an appropriate expression of gratitude, but learn that for years the paper, after having been read in the one family, has been passed on to another.

There is liberal opportunity in hand for the expansion of our circulation in this way. We have a list of several hundred names of members who would appreciate the paper, but can not well afford to pay for it.

One other item that counts as resources may claim brief mention. The experiment in advertising has been a financial success. The two pages yield about $1000 a year. We have had some excellent evidence recently that as an advertising medium we have unique value. Some of our advertising patrons are plainly helping THE FRIEND by their continued patronage, but it is a satisfaction to believe that we in turn do actually help the advertiser.

This brief recital makes it clear that a considerable number of Friends are combined to make our paper a business success. Their interest and co-operation, we are pleased to believe, symbolizes that unity in diversity for which we are pledged to work. Not only do we desire a growing subscription list, and so a growing field of service, but most of all we wish to make our paper one of the forces for furthering both a wider and deeper sense of the Divine mission of live Christian disciples in the sorely tried world. A PRAYER.

[Written in Wormwood Scrubs Prison and recurring to the writer on reading the Yearly Meeting article by Anne W. Richardson in The Friend.]

Bear with our questionings and doubt,
Thou patient Son, the Christ Divine,
And to our earnest cries, devout,
Thine ear incline.

Temptations thick assail the mind,
And pride would check the upward glance,
Yet thro' our tears we seek to find
Thy countenance.

The things we taste, and touch and feel
Refuse to satisfy our need;
Before Thy power we humbly kneel
Our wants to plead.

Baptize our spirit with Thy fire,
A Pentecostal feast outpour;
Our sinful hearts Thyself inspire
To love Thee more.

Thyself within our hearts, we find
Sufficient answer to our fears,
The ling'ring mists within our mind
Thy sunlight clears.

Thy Cross sublime doth conquer sin,
May it our ev'ry passion sway,
Grant we may help to usher in Thine endless day.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS AND THE WORLD CRISIS

E. A. WRIGHT.

(This paper was read at a recent conference of Friends in California, as noted in our paper a few weeks ago.)

I cannot speak as representative of the Society of Friends— not having the necessary qualifications. For half a life-time I had nearly forgotten them; and even now, know but little of their condition, thought or trend. This paper, therefore, may seem to have been written, from a somewhat detached point of view; and, though I should hope we shall find ourselves in substantial unity, may not receive the endorsement of all our members.

Our subject is, essentially, two-fold; correlated, indeed, yet separate; intertwined, yet distinct. Each branch covering many sub-divisions. Before we can teach, we must be taught, before we can guide others, we must know the way ourselves. "For if the blind lead the blind, shall they not both fall into the ditch?" Vague and general talk, about "the Truths committed to us," about "Standing as a light in the world," about "Our members forming a Spiritual priesthood," will avail nothing, and bring no healing to this sorely distressed world, unless we, ourselves, are at least in some degree, living in the Light and Freedom of God.

It will not be denied that this is an unbelieving age. Professing to be followers of the Lord Jesus, we surround His teaching with question marks!

"Did He really say what is recorded of Him?"

"Is our translation of the Gospels correct?"

"Times have changed, you know; would He not have taught differently to-day?"

"Don't you think it is a beautiful ideal? but not practical on this earth?"

"The world is growing towards it, and, perhaps, some day, we may reach the ideal of Jesus." And this spirit is by no means confined to those outside our Society.

Now the teachings of our Lord are not ephemeral or transitory; they are not a visionary ideal; an opinion, or a guess. To regard them in any of these lights, is to miss their true nature altogether. He taught unchanging principles of truth. "Heaven and Earth shall pass away; but my word shall not pass away." Why? Because it is essentially and universally true.

In the natural world we recognize unchanging law—gravitation, for instance. We know we can always rely on it, that it will always work. It is not a matter of opinion. It is not a matter of authority. It simply is.

Jesus Christ knew what He was teaching. He spoke as one having authority, because He had experienced Himself, that which He taught. For many of us—for most of us, I hope—His authority is enough. But, the final justification of any teaching, is not in authority, however high, but in the truth of the thing taught.

The world to-day is suffering from just one thing—that it believes in, and acts from, false principles. And a false principle, whether in the world, or man, or a steam-engine, can never fail to bring forth unsatisfactory results.

But how can we know that the principles of the Master are true ones? In the same way that we can know anything else—precisely the same way—by trying them; by experience. We shall never know them by argument, by description, or by tradition. The only way to know what love is, is to love. The only way to know the taste of anything, is to taste it. The cooking book may make our mouths water; but until we have tasted the dish, what do we really know of its flavor?

Hence, when our Lord said, "If any man will do my will, he shall know the teaching." He was not putting the cart before the horse, but stating a law of life, true on all spheres. I desire, therefore, that we as individuals, and as a Society, lay hold with renewed faith, and a better understanding, of the unchanging truths that He gave, that they become vital in our lives, and that we apply them with confidence. This, to me, is the most important preparatory work before us to-day. It will restore our virility and stamina; and, if the Lord should entrust us with a message, to the world, it will have a different ring from anything which can go forth from Laodicea.

Those of us who were brought up amongst Friends are aware of the long and honorable testimony our Society has maintained against war, and the illuminating experiences which have accompanied it. For two hundred and seventy years we have remained at peace, under all sorts of test conditions. To use the modern phrase, we have "demonstrated"—not once, but over and over again—that it is practicable, and safe to obey literally, the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount. But why has this wonderful experience not had more influence on the world? Something may be due to sheer ignorance. The Society is not keen on propaganda and what little has been done may have fallen on deaf ears. But the harvest fields are now white; for whatever else the great war has failed in, it at least has made us all sit up and take notice! Something also may be due to the way the subject was presented. My youthful recollection of the teaching I received is of great stress laid on certain passages of Scripture and on the "remarkable" deliverances of Friends who were faithful. We had also "Dymond's Essays," where the teaching is put in the strongest and most logical form—that war is wrong because that which is inseparable from it is forbidden to the Christian.

The sentiment that supports war springs from various sources. Orderly logic has, I think, very little to do with it. Probably the first of all is the thought that war is inevitable, and the second most prolific source the false glamor that always has been, and still is made to surround it.

A many-sided problem like this must be attacked from many sides.

"God fulfills Himself in many ways," so must the promise of a peaceful earth be fulfilled.

Second in urgency only to the war question—some would say equally urgent—and entwined with it inextricably, is the great menace of wealth, with all its trail of industrial and economic problems. There is no doubt that if Mars does not destroy this civilization, Mammon will, unless our race finds a solution of this burning question.

What has the Society of Friends to offer in the way of guidance, example or light? I cannot think our position equally satisfactory, on this, as on the problems of Peace and War.

It is true that individual honesty has been the rule amongst Friends; that many who became wealthy have used their money wisely and with liberality. It is also true that the great urgency of the question is largely of very recent growth; yet we must not forget how deep a concern John Woolman had, one hundred and fifty years ago. The poor ye have always with you, but not the multi-millionaire. The ideal of the Society seems to have been, so far as it had an ideal, a comfortable sufficiency; neither poverty, nor riches, yet leaning a little heavily on the side of riches. But this cannot, for a moment, be thought of as offering to the world a solution for its problems; and can we truthfully call it the ideal of the Lord Jesus?

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth." "Consider the flies of the fields how they grow." "Behold the fowls of the air, which neither have storehouse nor barn." "Go sell that thou hast and give to the poor." "How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of Heaven."

These words of Divine wisdom we ought not to pass by lightly. They go to the very root of things; and we may profitably ask ourselves the questions:—"Are we living in their spirit? Have we any real understanding of their essential meaning?"

Far be it from me to dogmatize; still less to lay down the law for others; but my personal conviction is that, right here, we lay our finger on one of the main causes of weakness in our Society.

The world believes in getting and holding. Christ teaches us to give forth fully and freely. The world believes in property, and houses and lands. Christ had not where to lay his head. The world has made money its master. Christ would teach us to realize what is meant to be a servant; and we will become such if we do as He says.

I am well aware that, living in this imperfect world, we have at times to pay a little tribute to Caesar. There are positions in life where it is almost impossible not to become rich. If we are so unfortunately situated we can at least regard ourselves as merely stewards of wealth; but those who have been spared that temptation ought to think themselves fortunate. And if we will begin to follow the Master; just a little way, in the path that He has so plainly proposed, we shall, very soon, begin to understand the eternal law on which it rests.

Modern business, industry and commerce are so vast, so complicated and so strenuous, that we are apt to be puzzled, and feel as helpless before the problems they present as before those of a great cataclysm of nature. Yet the principle that ought to underly all such transactions is so simple that we may call it a truism, being neither, more nor less than a fair exchange, a giving of value for value.

The very fact that this principle is so self-evident may cause us to think it unimportant. But, on the contrary, it is most sorely needed to-day, and if generally adopted would transform the whole face of the industrial and social world. Just think, it cuts at the root of all endeavor to get the "better" one of another, of all looking for "bargains"; of "speculations"; of "corners"; "watered stock"; "get-rich-quick schemes"; "undue interest"; "exploitation of labor"; "starvation wages"; the "boosting of land and home values"; of all dishonest tricks; of quack remedies; of false advertising; and about a thousand other practices, some of which we have perhaps looked on as "part of the game"; and never thought to question.

The old political economy of John Stuart Mill and his contemporaries, which looked on the wages of labor simply as incidental in the production of wealth, is no doubt dead or dying. But the habit of mind it fostered, is still rampant, and a truer ideal is urgently needed.

On both these vital points—the principle of a fair exchange and the placing of the man above the dollar—I am glad to believe the Society of Friends is even now ready to take an advanced position. Some may say they have already done so. I shall not dispute the matter, "but if the trumpet giveveth forth, an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for the battle?"

In order that the Friends may play a strong part in the period of reconstruction ahead, the co-operation, if not actual unity, of its different units is imperative.

The old fable of the bundle of sticks comes to mind. In the call which has gone forth from the London Friends we see they are alive to the issue. We all hope that the time is opportune, and that the straws which we have been watching show how the wind is blowing. The historical aspects of the divisions amongst American Friends is almost unknown to me, and the differences of belief only vaguely understood. But I venture to say that a working together for common objects will bring them together; and that a truer understanding will tend to heal the breach. It cannot be otherwise, for practically all the sages the world has ever had have taught the one grand truth—the unity of all life. In appearances we are separate, having different and apparently warring interests, in essence we are all one. Thus:—

Paul says, "One Lord and Father of ALL, who is above all and through all and in all."

Isaiah says, "I am the Lord thy God and beside me there is none else."

Buddha says: "Go practice the truth, that thy brother is the same as thou."

The Bhagavad Gita says: "There is only one actor in all actions."

And we know how often our Lord refers to the same; as, for instance, in all those passages proclaiming the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man; implying of course one and the same life in all.

This, to me, is the final and unanswerable reason why war, injustice, oppression and cruelty must be condemned. They are contrary to the very nature of life. Yet there is even a higher testimony—if we may say so with reverence—than that of the sages.

George Fox based his refusal to fight on no authority even that of Scripture, but on the state of his own soul. The "occasion" for war had ceased for him, because he was living in the actual love and knowledge of God. And this should be the goal of our lives, too.

In the past some of us, I myself for one, while holding the theory of Divine guidance, have too often acted and felt like Tennyson's "Infant crying in the night, an infant crying for the light," which although it may not be a bad state for an infant, is far from the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. But if we hold firmly to the principles of Jesus, and do not mix them with worldly maxims, and are living so far as we can in harmony with them, we shall assuredly grow into His likeness, and have little difficulty in discriminating between what is true and what is false. And then if occasion arises, we may be used by God as an instrument to forward the coming of His Kingdom on earth.

DUBLIN YEARLY MEETING.

The concluding sessions of Dublin Yearly Meeting were reported in THE FRIEND of Fifth Month 18th. Points in the discussion on the subject of education will interest our readers. A brief selection from the reported discussion on Peace is also included herewith.

Dr. Joseph T. Wigham, in opening the deliberation, said Friends of a former generation, with the Moravians, had done a good deal of pioneer work in education, but the present state of educational affairs in this country was not altogether satisfactory. The great educational advances in other lands and probable conditions after the war accounted for the great interest now widely shown in the subject. In this Yearly Meeting there were four schools, at all of which a large proportion of the pupils and teachers were not Friends. Under these circumstances it was difficult to preserve the Quaker atmosphere and training, which was the primary object of maintaining the schools, so that good Friends and faithful followers of Christ may be the result. Yet somehow the education given seemed to fall in imbuing the children's minds with an intelligent understanding of our principles. As regards general education the schools were doing good work, but they hardly seemed able to carry the education far enough for modern needs, for which a good equipment was necessary. Adequate remuneration for the teachers was also essential, if the best were to be attracted to this honorable calling. The number of children of Friends in Ireland is not more than would fill one good school, properly equipped and staffed. Such a school, in which, at any rate, the great majority of both scholars and teachers were Friends, could be managed more economically, and at the same time carry their education further. Such a school might be either completely co-educational, or educating boys and girls separately in the same building, or in separate schools working in combination. The stronger Quaker atmosphere of such a school should yield results in Friends who would worthily uphold the Quaker tradition and become good citizens alike of their country and of the Kingdom of God.

John B. Pearson agreed. Leaving out Brookfield, the returns showed in the three provincial schools 72 members or connected with the Society and 109 quite unconnected. Of the teachers 14 were Friends and 18 not. Financially there had been a net loss of £245; subscriptions had amounted to £444; so £689 had had to be raised for the schools. Such a situation surely required serious consideration. As regards the sexes, his ideal was complete co-education and he would give the girls as good an education as the boys. Regarding general education, he thought the teaching of science should receive more attention, though he would not exclude the humanities. Up to sixteen education should be general, after that specialized. The main aim, he thought, should be to incline the boys to become manufacturers and producers, rather than, as at present, to pass certain examinations in order to qualify for certain fixed situations. The advantages from the point of view of the Society itself of having an exclusively or almost exclusively Quaker school would be very great. He suggested that the Educational Committee should be asked to look into the matter, and if found possible make some recommendation to the next Yearly Meeting.

Dr. James Clarke urged that if the number of Friends on our teaching staffs was to be increased, more sacrifice was required from our membership. The work of teaching was one of national importance, and of great importance to the Society. It was a work entailing continuous self-sacrifice. Could not some of our prominent Friends sacrifice their sons to the work of education, and so give the benefit of the acquired hereditary Quaker character to the teaching profession?

In resuming a second time consideration of the State of Education in Friends' Schools in Ireland, Hilda Bell, by request, gave a resumé of the previous discussion. For her own part she agreed in the main with the contention of the openers. In the changed and changing conditions of life which were likely to make it harder, Friends' children must receive the best possible education. It would be a great advantage to have a school entirely or mainly of Friends' children. At present the schools seemed to be largely carried on for the benefit of outsiders. She would suggest the appointment of a committee to examine the whole subject and report next year.

Edwin Squire held that any central school should be located either in Belfast or Dublin, so as to have the advantage of University associations. Under present conditions teachers would not generally come from England. It should not be impossible to raise the funds necessary, say £10,000, judging by the large sums contributed by Friends for the Prince of Wales's Fund and the Strength of Britain Movement. Probably £5,000 would suffice.

After some other Friends had spoken briefly, the matter was referred to a committee, of which the Central Education Committee, with some exceptions, was to form the nucleus, additional names to be proposed at a future sitting.

OUR PEACE TESTIMONY.

Marian E. Ellis urged that in discussing this question each member should try to bring a fractional contribution to the great whole, each helping to build up a new vision, a new conception of God's purposes for the world, and so arrive at a point of unity. She believed the Society had a message which would break down the barriers of race and nation, and make plain that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither Englishman nor Irishman, bond nor free, and so prepare the world to enter into a living, enduring peace. The world's need to-day, was peace, for which she desired to work, in the spirit that animated the men in the trenches. It would be the tragedy of all tragedies if this war should end, as all previous wars had, without really settling anything, and that all the suffering and sacrifice of life had been in vain. Did not a call come from God who suffered with His creatures, from our brothers dying and our sisters suffering, to consider our duty individually and to try to find a point of essential unity from which all could work together, remembering the overpowering might of God to lead and guide,—that inner light, that seed of God, that spirit of Christ which could be raised up in the hearts of all men? God would bring this war to an end when, in all nations, there were enough waiting souls looking for His revelation. Prayers were ascending to Him from other nations; should we not unite with theirs, that He will incline the hearts of the nations to disarmament and to full reliance on Him?

Without prolonged discussion a minute was read and approved as follows:—"We have been enabled at this time to discuss the subject of Peace in great unity, and we again maintain our adherence to the principles on this subject which our religious Society has always held. Sympathy has been expressed for all who are seeking to serve God by following the teaching of conscience as they have apprehended it. We pray that they may be guided in all their actions, and that through their obedience, they may come to a deeper and fuller knowledge of the will of God."

THE WORK OF THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

(The following paper was read at the annual meeting of the above-named Committee, held at Philadelphia, Fifth Month 15th.)

"Many reports of the past, to this Association and for various other Indian occasions, would seem to limit freshness in another presentation, the history of the last year having close similarity to many others.

"Nevertheless, two radical facts engage my thought, viz.: (a) There are still many Indians in need of our quiet, earnest presentation of the Gospel message, and (b) we have the appealing duty as an associated Friends' work in connection with the larger association of American Churches to be faithful to our Lord and Master, not only historically and as of the past, but as of to-day and for the future as ability is granted.

"The monthly reports have given to each of us their paper presentation twelve times, since our last conference; we hope they have had, all of them, careful and interested perusal; and as so often suggested in them, that we have not neglected to reach out to our Lord in earnest consideration of the needs and trials presented and in thanksgiving also, for what may have been accomplished and for the fact, too, that we have had the privilege of exerting some co-operative measures at the several missions.

"Another journey to our field having been much in mind for over a year, a too hurried, but ever interesting, and, I trust, profitable visit, was finally accomplished in the late autumn of 1916. Eighteen days only, between insistent duties in Philadelphia, could be devoted to it. As a sixth trip the trail seemed well blazed, and barring much barbed wire and other modern conveniences of a hindering character, the round was made; though with regret, Seneca was eliminated from my itinerary, but the thirty-six hours allotted for it gave time for a look at our Ottawa property and a useful visit to Miami and later a valued renewal of acquaintance with Chiloco, where the sojourn in Oklahoma was closed with a very inspiring and valued opportunity during eight hours between trains.

"Upon the courteous invitation and kind arranging of Superintendent Allen, whom I had known years past, when he was in charge at Wyandotte, and as assistant to General Pratt at Carlisle, came the privilege of facing the entire school gathered in their fine new auditorium, and of addressing them for fifty minutes.

"The student body now numbers between five and six hundred, amongst whom are a number of our own members and others who had been identified with our mission influences before entering Chiloco.

"The survey, taken as a whole, gave satisfaction and encouragement, though all parts of the field are not always and equally bright, nor does the efficient work cease to be difficult.

"Recalling our Missions at the three Government Boarding Schools, viz.: Wyandotte, Shawnee and Otoe, the two first-named having been established as of the Central Superintendency allotted Friends under President Grant and his 'Peace Policy,' we have had, and still hold, a continuing opportunity for Gospel service and influence amongst the Indian children, as they come and go.

"Otoe of a later date may claim a generous share in the general Christian advancement of this tribe; our mission having been active at the school and with the adult Indians also the past eighteen years.

"All such work is probably liable to 'fits and starts,' times of uplift and times of discouragement. These have both been displayed at Otoe, and following a recent season of depression with some such influences still at hand, I record with satisfaction having left that cheery little mission home, out on the prairie, with fresh courage and gladness at what had been attained, and at the Christian influence which is emanating from it.

"When our friends, Isaac and Laura Frazier, told me their fixed desire to close their satisfactory work at Wyandotte, it was a satisfaction to be able to turn to old missionary friends, viz.: Omar and Miriam C. Mendenhall, then resident in Southern California, with some hope that they would feel drawn to again take a post under our Committee, and I think we may feel satisfaction and thankfulness that these tried and earnest workers came to Wyandotte in good time to assume duties there before our other Friends retired on the first of Second Month.

"The other main posts now under our Committee, viz.: Seneca, Kickapoo, Big Jim and Hominy, established some years apart in the order as named, have had to deal in each case without an Indian school as a centre of helpful influence, but, on the other hand, with ultra conservative people, who can be led only with extreme patience and tact, much persistence and a deep praying faith in the Gospel message. Some of the Indians of these tribes are very poor; some have neither poverty nor riches, while others have been sadly depleted morally by abnormal incomes, periodically paid to them from royalties, grazing, gas and oil leases, and to such the example and teaching of the lowly Nazarine does not seem just now to appeal.

"Some years ago this Committee authorized its Chairman to take such steps as should lead to the preparation of a book concerning the activities of Friends on behalf of the Indians. After considerable delay it was arranged that our Friend Rayner W. Kelsey, Ph.D., of Haverford College, would undertake the work. Dr. Kelsey has now given much time to research over a wide area and with much care has effected the purpose of his engagement, and his manuscript now presented, if accepted by our Committee, calls upon it to arrange for payment of his compensation as agreed, and also for the book's publication.

"Other and more detailed reports will follow, and some items not herein noted should have our care in course. A remark may refer to a recent pronouncement of policy of the Department, as issued by Indian Commissioner Cato Sells, in which comes the cheering word that looks with some definiteness towards increased citizenship for competent Indians with individual responsibilities and privileges, rather than a continuing tribal system, which in many cases has been already too long continued.

"In conclusion, as we confer and discuss the work, and later when we return to our home meetings, and to those who have delegated us to care for this particular mission work, may it be our earnest desire to have our relation to the service very prominently before us and endeavor to follow this Indian Mission duty with earnest zeal and strong faith in the Master's service.

"E. M. WISTAR, Chairman."

FRIENDS' AMBULANCE UNIT.

[The sensitiveness of our English Friends not to let ambulance work involve them in military operations is disclosed in the following.—Eds.]

In view of certain changes which the authorities have made in regard to the work of hospital ships, the Committee have had under consideration the position of the Unit on the Western Australia. They have with great regret come to the conclusion that they cannot any longer be responsible for the continuance of this work, and have therefore given notice of their withdrawal from the duties they have gladly undertaken hitherto. The ground for this withdrawal is solely one of principle, and has nothing to do with the risks and danger of the work, which have been incurred for fourteen months, and are indeed now, in some ways, less than formerly. On all grounds except that of principle the Committee and the men themselves have been most anxious to continue this service. Both Committee and men, however, are agreed that circumstances have arisen which make it necessary for them to withdraw. They are unwilling to modify the principle that they should serve under the Red Cross, in a non-military capacity, and on the business of life-saving only. The Committee desire to record their appreciation of the service which the men have rendered,—industriously, unostentatiously and with courage,—a gallant chapter in the history of the Unit. In particular they recognize the exceptional service of Crofton Gane, the leader of the group. They know with what acute regret the men withdrew from the ship, in which they have rendered aid to so many thousands of wounded men. The Unit, however, stands for a great principle, under which alone it is prepared to serve. The men withdrew on the 12th ult.

The Chairman and T. Edmund Harvey, M. P., went to Southampton last week to visit the Unit on the Western Australia. This was a belated visit to commemorate the completion of a year's work on the ship.—From The Friend (London).

UNITY IN TRINITY.

Lord, let there be no room within my heart
But for these three:
My work, my love and Thee,
Of each a part.

For if I do my work as in Thy sight,
And love all men
That Thou hast loved, sure then
I shall do right.

—LOUISA BROOKE, in the Churchman.

POCONO NOTES.

Old Mother Dewees,
Like a sweeping north breeze,
She bangs all the doors about,
And her plump-looking maids
In their homespun plaids
From kitchen to garret cry out,
"Pray! What's to be done?"
In a splutter cries one,
To which the good mother replies—
"Let a chicken be killed,
And the tea kettle filled,
And a spiderful hastily fried,
For some travelers have come,
Nell, don't look so gium,
Box about, box about—and look smiling.
Here's the beefsteak,
The butcher knife take,
Stop! Stop!—Cut that slice rather thinner,
And bring out the cheese,
I'm sure it will please
For Governor Shultz thought it good.
We'll trim off the mold,
Twill never be told
How long on the shelf it has stood."

This doggerel, written originally in praise of the bustling, and hospitable "Mother Dewees," of nearly a century ago—hostess of an old-fashioned inn—was repeated at our dinner table to-day, when the little maid announced the remaining fragment of cheese to be moldy.

So rain and its effects persist, and happy the soul that rises triumphantly above both rain and mold. The ever-returning showers during the past month have produced a luxurious vegetation, with superb ferns and wild flowers, freedom from insect life and fire in the woods—filling our lake with an overflow that is most picturesque in the Tobyhanna River, but making trout fishing a forlorn possibility in that stream. The birds, however—and frogs—are nothing daunted by moisture, so we have revelled in their love songs, morning and evening. But other satisfactions were obtained from a choice visit with our own dear children just before they sailed for France on the 9th inst.—to do reconstruction work. It is an interesting fact that eight out of the fourteen young people entering upon such service in Europe have been more or less identified with Pocono Lake—our pioneer life evidently favoring the initiative and vigor needed. Another visit we greatly enjoyed was from Dr. Henry Davidson and his wife, Laura, who are now on furlough, en route to England from West China. These dear Friends entertained and instructed us by an account of their educational and medical work among the Chinese at Suining Sze-chwan, where it was the good fortune of the writer to spend several days two years ago, when visiting the Missions of English Friends in that distant land.

Nothing broadens one's sympathies or strengthens one's faith in humanity more than to learn how the fears and prejudices of an ignorant people have been overcome by love.

One small Chinese boy came to the hospital, of which Dr. Davidson has charge, and seemed terror-stricken for some time, whenever the doctor or his wife appeared in the ward. But Laura Davidson set about to win that lad and finally succeeded by giving him a doll, with eyes that open and shut. This constant companion received such attention and affection that only another doll—to be given to his little sister—could reconcile him to returning to his home—protesting with tears all the while—"But I don't want to go home."

If the nations only would try "the better way" as Dr. Davidson said he did toward a patient, who was wounded by a rifle, and who swore and ranted against everybody and thing for many days, but after a serious, kind talk, suddenly ceased, so that it seemed almost a miracle, what a different result would be in evidence!

There was such a sense of fellowship with the whole world, on a spiritual plane, pervading this gathering around our open hearth, both on this occasion and during the meeting for worship, earlier in the day, that our hearts were greatly comforted.

As an organization the Preserve has grown perceptibly within the past year—eighteen new buildings being added during this season—and few things give the pioneers in this community greater pleasure than the large proportion of children who come both as renters and permanent residents, and their quiet conduct at our meetings has been most gratifying.

The winter was exceptionally cold and the natives report ice twenty-six inches thick on the lake.

William B. Bell has entered upon his duties as Superintendent with marked success, and not a few are seeking this retreat from the war spirit which so unhappily prevails in the world to-day.

Sarah B. Dewees has had her neighbors gathered round her always charming camp-fire this very evening, where old and young come into the most helpful intercourse.

POCONO LAKE, Sixth Month 18, 1917.

THE LURE OF ALASKA.

It is the old lure, the golden lure, the lure of romance and adventure. We felt it vaguely when we entered Skagway with its ramshackle log cabins, but very keenly when we struck the trail of '98. Up, up, up, the faint white path led, between granite-ribbed mountains, through mighty valleys "plumb full of husk to the brim," past flashing glaciers and gleaming waterfalls. Here and there were skeleton cabins with only the sides or the ridge pole standing; sometimes the train whirled by a lonely grave. Even the names were significant of hardship—Dead Horse Cañon, Rotting Row, Last Hope Pass. You may say "What's in a name?" but in Alaska there is a great deal! Therefore it was rather disconcerting to find that the boat on which we were embarking was called "White Horse" and that the supply of meat for our journey was hung directly beneath this sign instead of being tucked discreetly away in a refrigerator. It was a matter of ignorance plus bliss. Chickens, too, were on deck, but they were alive—very much so; in fact, every evening their crates had to be covered up with canvas to signify that "black night" had descended—otherwise they never would have been aware of the fact, for the midnight sun flushed the sky a burnished gold. All through the night passengers read on deck, or watched great mountains slide by, and speculated dreamily on the treasure hidden within. With the coming of dawn, they had proof of this mineral wealth, for occasionally the ship passed some grizzled prospector rocking "pays dirt" in a hand-made cradle, by the water's edge, or steering a crude row-boat along in the swift current of the Yukon. The river was majestic, but busy sawing through mountains here, or building up sand-bars there. It was turbid with silt, always swirling, always undercutting banks frozen solid as adamant even in late summer.

Frequently the boat passed fish-traps looking like mammoth pin-wheels of net, which scooped up salmon and deposited them, flopping futilely, in a trough where they were kept alive until wanted. The Indians, who own these, split each fish open and hang it up to dry for their dogs; some of the better specimens they smoke for their own use, but all of it seems equally objectionable when you are to windward of a village. During the summer these natives let their huskies forage for themselves; in consequence their teeth and ribs show always. As soon as the steamer whistle blows, a chorus of dismal howls floats on the heavily scented breeze, and when the ship draws up to the shore, a hundred or more snarling, snapping brutes line the river bank, and with the eagerness bred by starvation, watch for stale flap-jacks which the cook throws out. If perchance he favors them with a bone, there is a battle royal from which the scraggly victor emerges foaming and bloody.

The little villages are terribly isolated, and they must be intolerably lonely; perhaps a dozen scattered log huts with caribou skulls above the doorway, a general store where you can buy anything from baby ribbon to bear traps and dog harness, and a saloon—the social center of the community. Here and there are card tables, snowshoes along the wall, skins and mounted animal heads. Instead of a cash register there is a pair of scales on the bar to weigh out gold dust. "Old timers" still tell of how the man behind the counter earned a tidy little sum every evening by putting glue on his fingers before handling "the dust." However, that was long ago, during "those wild Dawson days," so vividly described by Robert Service.

Dawson itself still bears the scars; there are scores of empty saloons and dance halls, hundreds of abandoned cabins, and, I suppose, hundreds of miners who have lost everything except hope, but the city also reflects its ancient glory, and still justifies its claim to fame. The days of privately owned mines have passed, as all the good prospects are being worked by corporations. Great dredges suck up the hidden wealth from the muck of swamps, slowly advancing upon the land, eating their way forward like giant caterpillars, and piling up heaps of boulders (tailings, they are called) in back of them. In other places hydraulic mining is employed. A huge stream like that from a fire hose rips out the side of a mountain, and as the sand caves over hurls it swirling through long boxes where the heavy gold sinks to the bottom, caught between cross-pieces of wood or iron. There are various ways of mining, but, although the old-fashioned method of panning is less economical, it is by far the most fascinating. After experiencing the thrills of "getting color" myself, I can fully appreciate why men spend their whole lives hunting for the precious metal, often to die penniless. There are many miners now working as common day laborers who "came in the rush" and staked claims worth millions. This year they are earning $3.50 a day, felling trees in the "right of way," "filling in" swamps where mosquitoes make life unbearable, or laying tracks for the new government railroad. This is to tap the wealth of the vast coal fields so long hidden away in the blue mountains. Lack of fuel, by the way, or rather inaccessibility of fuel, has been the one thing that has paralyzed the growth of Alaska, but with the opening up of this region, so rich in anthracite and copper, will come a tremendous boom. Nenana is to be the terminal, and Nenana, although a town of three thousand souls, is still a tent city, flashing spotless white in the sun. It is also a city entirely of men, and the ordeal of walking ashore over a narrow board gang-plank is worse than "running the gantlet."

However, the visitor in Alaska gets hardened to such experiences, the whole population of every village comes down to the wharf, partly through hospitality, partly through—well, for other reasons, and the farther north you get, the more eager the waiting crowd is and the more wistful the expressions on all faces. At Fort Yukon, which is beyond the Arctic Circle, the people as well as the dogs seemed hungry, but their hunger was of a haunting kind.

The scenery, too, was desolate, with long bleak stretches of flat tundra, very like the marshes of New Jersey. For days the ship cautiously wound its way along the flats. Once in a while it would get stuck, then the "stilts" would be lowered and the great flat-bottomed craft would be lifted off the shoals by its own power. Occasionally the monotony was broken by the sight of a huge piece of the bank caving over. Once the passengers thought they saw a bear swimming across the river, but, anon, it climbed upon a sandbar and wagged its tail! These are bare facts of the case. You may judge for yourselves.

And then there were the Esquimaux! They are a jolly people, but none too clean. The least little thing starts them off in a gale of laughter. One of the passengers had a pocket knife of alluring design. He held it up before a circle of admiring natives and opened the scissors blade. "Fine, cut fur," he announced proudly. His audience gurgled with delight. Then the can-opener was exhibited, and they were deeply puzzled until he went through the rites of opening a can of condensed milk, and pronounced the magic word "cow-cow." Still another was shown; this time the corkscrew. The resourceful exhibitor opened an imaginary bottle, with the usual noises, and one of the Esquimaux, laughing so that he was doubled up, chuckled "whiskey." Alas! They understood the potency of white man's "fire water" and linguistic fireworks. For example: If any passenger tried to "Jew down" one of the fat, brown salesmen, there was a moment of unspeakable guttural explosions. Then every Esquimaux solemnly picked up his baskets or ivory cribbage boards, climbed over the side of the ship into his frail kayak and paddled away. Time and again we saw these miniature strikes, and, although we regretted the loss of certain articles which we were about to purchase, we could not help admiring the team work displayed by these hardy little men.

At last we reached the Behring Sea, and our trip through Alaska was at an end. We were all very solemn. The land had cast its spell upon us with its majestic beauty, its picturesqueness, and above all, with its wonderful people. We longed to be poets, to give voice to the thoughts that were gripping like some great emotion, as we were almost incoherent. But as we watched the shore fade from view, we contented ourselves by quoting from Robert Service:—

"There's a land where the mountains are nameless,
And the rivers all run God knows where;
There are lives that are erring and aimless,
And deaths that just hang by a hair;
There are hardships that nobody reckons,
There are valleys unpeopled and still;
There's a land—oh, it beckons and beckons,
And I want to go back, and I will."

—MARGUERITA PHILLIPS, in The Westonian.

GREENWICH MEETING.

The following is the report of a committee to the Quarterly Meeting:—

On Fifth Month 27th, a beautifully rare and pleasant day, as compared with weather conditions existing during the period just passed, when young leaves on the trees were almost a translucent green, the scent of lilacs in the air and Spring was everywhere, a garden of resurrection, members of the Committee and other Friends motored to that historic little village of Greenwich bearing upon their minds the responsibility of holding a meeting for Divine worship in the fine old meeting-house standing near the banks of the placid Cohasset. As the Committee mingled with Friends and others assembling for the act of worship, the feeling came to the minds of some that the quiet placid waters of the river reflected the quiet, serene and placid life of the true Christian traveler. As Spring writes hope and joy over the whole world so the life of the true Christian should write hope and joy in the souls of all who know them. Under a feeling sense of this kind, the meeting soon settled into a worshipping state of mind with the seating capacity of the house comfortably filled except the gallery. This silent attitude of worship was broken with the query, "What wouldst Thou have me to do?" resulting in the declaration, "Seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." The vocal exclamation, "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not," being dwelt upon and the example of Saul of Tarsus being analyzed for our benefit with a message from the local minister who has always been with us at these gatherings. The meeting closed under a feeling that the Divine Spirit had overspread the meeting with a covering of its solemnity. As usual social greetings were cordially exchanged and the company dispersed, it is felt, under a sense of true Christian fellowship. The responsiveness of the local community and vicinity to the concern of this Quarterly Meeting, in the judgment of the Committee, warrants the continuance of these meetings. As this Committee has been an annual appointment and as there is a vacancy therein through the death of our dear friend, Richard H. Reeve, the Committee therefore suggests that a nominating committee be appointed at this time to propose the names of suitable Friends to have the oversight of these meetings and to act in an advisory capacity with a committee of Woodbury Monthly Meeting in the care of the property as heretofore and report to our next meeting.

FROM ENGLISH PRISONS AND PRISONERS.

Maurice L. Rowntree, in course of a letter from Wormwood Scrubs Prison, written 20th ult. (Fourth Month), said:—

"Let me assure you all that I am quite fit and in good form, and no one has the slightest cause to worry about me, but rather much to be thankful for. . . . Here in spite of prison walls there is the same blue sky and flying clouds, the same singing of the birds as outside, and last night there came to me, perhaps stimulated by the first real spring weather and the cooings and chirpings of the feathered brethren thereat, a wonderful sense of peace and joy, for which I cannot be sufficiently thankful. A thought that has come to me here often is that by getting into touch with the Great Heart of the Universe one does indeed get into touch with all humanity outside these walls. This thought I have attempted to express in the following lines:—

O Heart, that beats with every human heart,
O Heart, that weeps with every human tear,
O Heart, that sings with every human song,
Fill our slow hearts with floodtides of Thy love;
That they may beat with every human heart,
That they may weep with every human tear,
That they may sing, with every human song,
And thus through Thee unite with all mankind.

Thou by our sins art crucified afresh,
For men Thou mad'st are slaughtered hour by hour;
'Tis our self-seeking sends them to their doom.
O Love o'erwhelm in us, and every man,
The greed, the hate, the tyranny, the fear;
'Stablish Thy Kingdom through the whole wide world.

It would not be true to say that one has not had one's down's as well as up's, but there has always been the overshadowing mercy close at hand. . . . The food here is all right, and just enough for me: as to work, for the first month's solitary in cells it was all canvas (i. e., mail bags, patches, etc.); then I got outside about twice a week on a job shoveling coke,—fine exercise. Now I am transferred to the basket shop, making waste-paper baskets for the Government: quite interesting work. . . . I have been before the Central Tribunal and refused the Scheme.

"Life here is not always easy, but in the main runs smoothly enough, and the experience has been of real value to me. I don't know that I have ever enjoyed meals anywhere more. One can sit down in peace in one's cell; and I have taken to saying this grace: "Lord, whereas Thy Body was broken for man, and daily Thou art being crucified for man's sin, I thank Thee that I am being built up by this good food from Thee."

"We hardly see anything of other prisoners. The lack of news and of opportunity for self-expression are what one feels chiefly, though we get a brief summary of the week's news on the occasion of the week-day chapel. A fair number of the men here are known to me.

"Remember, that if we are doing the right thing, the Eternal Arms are ever around us!"

From a letter by Malcom Sparks:

"It has taken a good while to get 'tamed' down to prison life, and at first I found the time going very slowly. I have had practically no moments of depression, but very many of tremendous joy. . . . It is truly a wonderful experience to be here. P. B. says Wormwood Scrubs is a spiritual university, and that is profoundly true. It is more. It is a tremendous power house, in which a veritable Niagara of energy is being created and pent up, until it can be liberated for the service of God and humanity. The meetings for worship are simply glorious."

In the course of his (second) court-martial statement Roderic K. Clark said:—

"Any conscience worthy of the name, must be, not merely a negative veto, but a positive force enjoining action. As has been well said by W. Temple, 'There is no sin which you can commit so great as that of choosing your lifework on selfish grounds. That is a sin far greater than lapses into indulgence or vice, for it is the deliberate withdrawal of most of your life from obedience to God,' and I felt that to undertake special work as a means of obtaining exemption and not because I believed it to be my highest duty would be a violation of this principle. It was pointed out to me that I could not continue my committee work in prison, but Quaker traditions impel me to refuse to take any course that we cannot feel to be absolutely right, trusting God as to the consequences.

"I recognize that any punishment accorded me is not likely to be comparable to the sufferings of our soldiers, and yet only by accepting punishment gladly can I give the ultimate proof of my sincerity. I have always urged that pacifists should endeavor to understand and respect the sacrifices of many who consider it their duty to fight, and to realize a fellowship of purpose and ideal which unites us because it goes deeper than our sincere differences of opinion as to method. The realization of this has preserved for me the unbroken sympathy and respect of many close friends who are officers in the army, and I hope the Court may be able to regard us in the same spirit, whatever action they may feel legally bound to take. I sincerely believe that I am working for the highest interests of every soldier, as well as for the whole of humanity, by welcoming any punishment, if so I may more effectively point them to a new way of life in Christ Jesus which takes away the occasion for all war."

Roderic Clark was sentenced to eighteen months' hard labor, commuted to six, in Maidstone Prison.

A statement from E. B. Ludlam as follows serves further to show the inside of the C. O.'s feelings:

"To perceive the general truth of Christ's doctrine of forgiveness is one thing, to apply it to the complex theory of life is another, and to act faithfully upon it is again something far different. Many a better man than myself is engaged in killing Germans against his conscience, humbly aware that his life does not square with Christian profession. I feel this intensely, but none the less I find it utterly impossible to set out, in cold blood, on an enterprise to kill men whom we all know are the unfortunate tools of the military clique against which they had steadfastly contended for many years. It is futile for the human brain to suppose that it can understand what God is, but Christ taught us that He could be regarded as Father and humanity as His children. War can be superseded if Christian methods are adopted; if we go out of our way to do good rather than evil. Preliminary experiments have been performed, as by William Penn, for example, with conclusive and unquestionable success. Such an experiment is the work of the Friends' Emergency Committee and its success is also beyond all doubt. It aims at the removal of international hatred and the planting of seeds of international good-will, thus destroying the roots of war. I believe that this is the highest service which it is possible to render to our fellow-men, now, even more than at any other time."

"ALMOST everybody wishes to fly high, and spiritual vanity tempts a great many to aspire to a holiness that is only superficial."

NEWS ITEMS.

ALBERT J. LIVEZEY has been appointed agent for The Friend in the Barnesville, Ohio, neighborhood, to succeed Thomas Dewces, who has moved to Salem, Ohio.

TO THE FRIENDS OF TUNESASSA:—

Contributions towards the new cottage (to be called "Scattergood Cottage," in memory of the warm interest in the welfare of the Indians shown by our late friend, George J. Scattergood) now amount to $4,132.

WILLIAM BACON EVANS, Treasurer,
205 E. Central Avenue, Moorestown, N. J.

JOHN S. HOYLAND has been refused exemption by the Tribunal in India, but the case was to be reheard.

ON account of the compulsory training laws of Australia, and the possibility of still severer legislation, Francis Howie, a Friend, and dentist at Ballarat of many years' standing, has relinquished his practice and removed with his wife and five children to San Francisco. His whole life, says the Australasian Friend, had been spent in Victoria, but now that his sons are attaining the age when the law calls on them to submit themselves to military discipline, he felt that he must take them to other climes.—The Friend (London).

THE American Friends' Service Committee reported on the 15th as follows:—

The indications are that the applications will very greatly exceed the required number of 100. A very high personnel, however, is desired and there may be openings up to the time of beginning training. All who desire to enter such service are urged to make application at any time.

The keenest interest in this work is being shown among Friends the country over. It is also attracting the attention of scores of conscientious objectors who are not Friends. A few such may be chosen if exceptionally well qualified, provided the government will grant them passports.

The Committee has offered the Fellowship of Reconciliation at its request four members to be supported by that organization and arrangements may be made for a few Dunkards and Mennonites who have also been exempted in the conscription law.

The Haverford College Emergency Unit has donated its full equipment, including 150 uniforms, six automobiles, tents and camping outfit, and a sum of money. This gift is typical of the spirit that should pervade Friends' communities everywhere in rising to the support of this wonderful opportunity for service.

In addition to the four women for work with English Friends in Russia, announced in these columns last week, the Committee has arranged to send two others. The six workers are Amelia Farbejewsky, Esther White, Emilie Bradbury, Lydia Lewis, Anna J. Haynes and Nancy J. Babb. All are exceptionally well qualified for this work. The needs in Russia are greater than those in France, owing to the great lack of workers, but owing to difficulty of access and the great expense of transportation, the Committee feels limited to six workers in this field for the present. The party will sail Seventh Month 5th via the Pacific route.

The following sailed for France on the 25th for work with English Friends: Howard Elkinton, Mrs. Katharine W. Elkinton, Douglas Waples, Eleanor Carey Waples, Geo. V. Downing, Ernest Brown and Edith Coale. These workers are to be supported entirely by American Friends. We hope they can be released for a period to give our own Unit the benefit of their experience. Apart from this possibility we welcome this opportunity to co-operate with those who have so magnificently borne the burden for three years.

Two sessions of the Representative Meeting have been held this month. The following statement made by the Clerk to Monthly Meetings will give information in regard to two items of business. The only other matter not of routine character was the preparation of the paper on "The Courage of a Good Conscience," printed on the editorial page of this number.

The Committee to which was referred the matter of our duty to the young men of our membership liable to conscription, offered a report which was approved; their nomination of a committee comprising Samuel L. Whitson, Isaac Sharpless, Edward G. Rhoads, Charles S. Carter, Joseph Rhoads, Brinton P. Cooper, John L. Balderston, William Bishop, Isaac Powell Leeds and Alexander C. Wood is also satisfactory to this body, and these friends accordingly appointed to the service.

The Committee submitted blank membership certificates, which, with slight additions, were approved; it is continued to have a sufficient number of the certificates printed and forwarded to the Correspondents of all our Monthly Meetings.

NOTE.—It is important that Monthly Meetings should promptly authorize their Clerks and Recorders to sign and forward these membership certificates to their young men of conscription age.

The Committee appointed in the Tenth Month of 1914 to receive and forward funds intended to aid through English Friends, the sufferings caused by the European war, recommend that hereafter such monies should be forwarded to the Treasurer of the Peace Committee of the Yearly Meeting, Albert L. Baily, Jr., which recommendation is approved by this meeting.

After Seventh Month 1st, next, the Committees of Subordinate Meetings are likewise requested to forward their contributions to the same office.

The Clerk is directed to advise Correspondents of the Monthly Meetings of this action of the Representative Meeting.

From the Minutes,
WM. B. HARVEY, Clerk.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The resignation of Dr. Clara Marshall, Dean of the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, which held commencement exercises recently, has been announced. Dr. Martha Tracy, Professor of Chemistry at the college, has been appointed Acting Dean. She was graduated from Bryn Mawr and has won distinction in original research.

Herbert C. Hoover, National Food Director, has mailed a letter to 200,000 pastors of individual churches, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, calling upon them to co-operate with him and with the Department of Agriculture in urging the largest possible production of food and the smallest possible amount of waste. He estimates the annual waste of food at one billion dollars. He urges a larger use of corn and corn bread in the family ration.

Cormeal contains exactly the same amount of nourishment as wheat flour and is more than 25 per cent. cheaper. It is even cheaper than rice. One pound of wheat flour contains 1,675 food units, and costs 8 cents. One pound of rice (broken) contains 1,600 food units, and costs 7 cents. One pound of cormeal contains 1,680 food units, and costs 5 cents.

Cottage cheese is one of the important meat substitutes, say specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture. It contains a larger percentage of protein (the chief material for body building) than most meats, and furnishes this material at a lower cost.

In the United States alone the annual loss from weeds has been estimated at $400,000,000. In the face of these startling figures we can well realize the importance of protecting the useful seed-eating birds, one of nature's best means of checking just such losses.

William A. Sunday has this to say of his New York campaign: "The whole campaign from start to finish has been simply amazing to me. Not a thing about it has been done on a narrow or contracted basis. Our building, accommodating over 20,000 persons, has been filled every day from the start. Ordinarily there is a drop or a sag in attendance along in the middle of a campaign. There was nothing like that in New York. Folks kept coming right along. It was all the more wonderful because they had to come long distances, and the city was filled with war preparations and excitement to distract their attention."

The International Committee, Y. M. C. A., raised $3,000,000 in one month, for work during the war, and immediately announced its need for an additional $2,000,000 to carry on work to the end of this year. It also states that, with the war at its present intensity, not less than $5,000,000 will be needed in 1918.

The effect of the war on the larger colleges and universities of the United States is reviewed in an article in the Daily Princetonian. Academic work has suffered because of military activity and many institutions are said to face a financial crisis.
